Mr. LABOUCHERE. — Sir, the question before us is one of such paramount importance, that I cannot, notwithstanding the impatience of the House, consistently suffer it to be put from the chair without saying a few words upon it. I believe that, after all, this is a very simple question. We are agreed that it is desirable the House of Assembly should again be called together, and have an ample opportunity of retracing the steps they have taken, and of proceeding to discharge their duty towards the colony of Jamaica. But, then, we are also agreed that the House of Commons should maintain the ground it has always asserted; especially, as, in the last Assembly of Parliament, it was resolved that measures should be taken, in case the House of Assembly should persist in the course it had commenced, to provide that the interests of the colony of Jamaica should suffer as little as possible from their conduct. The House has, therefore, almost unanimously agreed on that which is the most unconstitutional part of the Bill, and which provides for those annual laws in Jamaica, among which are the Bills called "Money Bills." Sir, I agree with my Noble Friend, and with the agent of Jamaica, who addressed the House from the bar, that that was by far the strongest part of the Bill before the House. I must say, in reference to the slighting manner in which the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite spoke of Mr. Burge, who represented the interests of the House of Assembly, that I am much more inclined to bow to the opinion of their representative than I am to the opinion of the Right Honourable Gentleman. The question is, whether we can, consistently with our duty, allow no legislation whatever to take place in the Island of Jamaica for a year? The Honourable Member for Kilkenny has declared that the island is in a state of tranquillity; and I am happy to be able to add to his testimony, this; that, from all the accounts received by the Government, that tranquillity, it appears, still continues. I am glad to have this opportunity of stating my conscientious belief that the peaceable and orderly state of the island, which is almost unexampled, is a phenomenon to be attributed to the services of a body of men, who have, unfortunately, been very much calumniated, — the ministers of religion in Jamaica, who have obtained a great influence over the minds of the people there, and who exercise it in a very proper and salutary manner. But are we to rely upon this extraordinary kind of means for maintaining the peace of the island? Is it not necessary that measures should be taken to secure the three objects proposed in the Bill before the House? We have a distinct admission of the House of Assembly, that the laws for the regulation of contracts for hired service in agriculture or manufactures, the prevention of vagrancy, and the prevention of the illegal occupation of lands, are urgent and necessary. By the Bill before the House, the Assembly will be enabled to pass those laws themselves, if they choose to embrace the opportunity. There is nothing unusual in the course which has been pursued by the House. We have reason to believe that the Orders in Council, sent out, contained the principles of good laws; and I must say that I should regret the rejection of this clause. Looking at the conduct of Parliament last Session, — and remembering the resolution which was come to, to continue their vigilant watch over the Assembly, — I should consider that the House has abandoned their position, if we do not pass this Bill.

The House divided: — Ayes 267; Noes 257; — Majority 10.

Baring, —

On the motion of Mr. LABOUCHERE, verbal amendments made; Bill passed.

SUPPLY — NATIONAL EDUCATION.

The Order of the Day for resuming the debate was then read.

Question again put.

Mr. WYSE. — In resuming the debate, which has, now, occupied so much time, I beg, first, to thank the two Noble Lords opposite, who have taken so large a share in the debate; for it would be difficult to select from the speeches made avowedly in support of the measure, two more calculated to advance it, than the speeches of those two Noble Lords in opposition to it. I am willing to give every credit to the Noble Lord who preceded the last speaker, for the exertions he has made on behalf of the factory children, — exertions which have secured for him the approbation of every right-thinking man. I am also willing to give the Noble Lord credit for the utmost benevolence; but I must be allowed to say that the honesty of opinion to which he lays claim seems to me to be of the kind which arises from a careful exclusion of all the arguments on the other side, — to spring from conclusions obtained by a careful avoidance of all examination of the question under discussion. Through the whole of his hydra and chimæra speech, the Noble Lord seems to have raised up for himself a phantasmagoria of evils which have not the slightest foundation in reality. If the Noble Lord had examined the subject, he would have seen that the horrors and desolation consequent on the spread of education, which he seems so much to fear, have heretofore arisen from a want of general enlightenment. Education has, in fact, always been the only agent by which such horrors and desolation could be neutralised and prevented. If the Noble Lord were only to extend his view beyond his narrow border in this country, and were to inquire into the condition of the rest of the civilised world, he would find that religion, and not sectarianism, has been the source of all happiness to man. The Noble Lord apprehends much evil from the monsters which his fancy has conjured up; but he should recollect that there are other moral monsters much more dreadful in their influence on society. There is the monster of brute force, unaccompanied by intelligence; — there is the Polyphemus of physical strength, uncontrolled by moral feeling, —

Monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens.

To what are we to attribute all the domestic evils with which we are menaced, if not to the want of a sound education diffused among the masses? But if the Noble Lord of 1839 entertain the opinions he stated in the course of this debate, the Right Honourable Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland of 1831 is more than a match for him. If the Noble Lord now denounce this measure as unconstitutional,—as one that would be scouted by all society of a religious nature in the country, — what must be thought of the parallel measure introduced for Ireland by the Secretary in 1831? The objections to the present measure were surely quite as applicable to that. Now, the measure is described as pernicious on two grounds: first, the mode in which the board of management is constituted; and, secondly, the evil effect which is apprehended from it on the education of the children. In many of those objections which apply to the constitution of the board, I concur, particularly as regards the fluctuations in political and religious opinions, to which it must be liable from its connection with the Government. But if, as the Noble Lord argues, it be wrong for the Lords of the Privy Council to have, by this plan, the power of applying, in a manner distinctly laid down, the funds to be granted by this House, how much the more objectionable must be the power of the board in Ireland, according to the Noble Lord's own plan of 1831, which not only gave that species of control, but also an entire control over the religious books to be used in the schools. The Noble Lord now objects to the power given to the Lords of the Privy Council to erect schools, to confer gratuities on teachers, and to establish and contribute to the support of model schools. But the board in Ireland had full powers given to make such regulations as to matters of detail, which, while they were not inconsistent with the instructions given to them, they might think in accordance with the intentions of Government. The strongest ground of objection taken by the Noble Lord, however, respected the effect which this plan would have on the religious education of the people, arising out of the education of persons of different religious persuasions in the same schools. The Noble Lord expressed his belief that this was a system of education which would instil into the minds of the younger population a general belief that the Legislature attached equal authority to all versions of the Scripture, — that it was a matter of indifference what creed was taught to the people; and, by putting before the mind of the young, conflicting doctrines as of equal weight and authority, the foundations of all faith were to be gradually sunk, and thus the strongest ground of opposition to the scheme would be substantiated; for, through gradual doubt, it would lead to general scepticism, and from general scepticism the step was short to national infidelity. Now, Sir, if the mere circumstance of persons of different creeds receiving their religious education in separate parts of the same building in which they receive their literary education will produce all these lamentable results, what shall we say of the Irish measure, the object of which was declared to be, not only to include Christians of all denominations,—to unite in one general object children of different creeds, — but, to obtain the active co-operation of the clergy of all denominations? If it be wrong to encourage the Catholic faith in one instance, is it not equally wrong to do so in another? If, as the Noble Lord asserts, it is pernicious to bring the Protestants of this country in contact with the Roman Catholics, I should like to know why the same rule is not to apply equally to Ireland? If the adoption of a system of mixed education be right in Ireland, it is equally right and proper in England; and I cannot understand why it has been rejected or repudiated by the Noble Lord. Nay, if the Noble Lord's proposition — that it is pernicious to bring Protestants in contact with Catholics — be applicable to England, where the latter are in so small a minority, it seems to me to be much more applicable to Ireland, where the Catholics are in such a vast majority. I believe that the difference between the conduct that has been pursued by the Noble Lord in the two cases respectively, can only be accounted for by regarding the Noble Lord as he is, and the Noble Lord as he was. I regret to find that the opinions he professed, then, are not his opinions, now. I regret to find that I cannot recognise in the Noble Lord, now, the establisher of Irish education. If the creed the Noble Lord upholds be the only true religion, — if it be an honest faith, — I know no difference between England and Ireland; — what is right here, is right there. I make not these remarks in an unfriendly spirit to the Noble Lord; but it is essential the public should justly know the opinions of public men, and be enabled to choose between what the Noble Lord was and what he now is: and they may be assured that that conservatism or finality which looks to the permanence of the constitution is absolutely absurd, when men cannot be true to their own opinions. The plan of education which the Noble Lord introduced into Ireland was one step, certainly, in advance, to attain the desired end. But what was the Noble Lord's proceeding, in introducing that plan? In 1831, I proposed a plan of education for Ireland; and, on my doing so, the Noble Lord opposed the proposition; but, during the vacation, he prepared a plan, and, with the consent of the Government, he appointed a board to superintend the system, and shortly afterwards he submitted his plan to Parliament.

The Noble Lord complains of the proposed plan not being sufficiently definite; but that which he then brought forward for Ireland was much looser, and more vague in its description, than the one recently set forth in the minute of the Privy Council. I do not blame the Noble Lord for having brought forward or carried his plan into effect: on the contrary, I think that, by doing so, he has conferred one of the greatest boons on that country that ever was conceded to it by a Government: and with respect to the vote, some consideration must be had for the peculiar circumstances of the case, and the difficulties with which her Majesty's Ministers have to contend. But, with respect to the vital question, itself, all considerations of party should be laid aside, — all baneful influence of passion and prejudice should be dismissed from the mind, — when so great and solemn a thesis comes under the deliberation of the first Assembly in the world. Sir, we must look at the position of the country, the evils of that position, the remedy for those evils, and the means by which that remedy is to be applied and rendered efficacious. And when I say we must look at the condition of the country, the first question is, what is the state of the people with relation to the subject now under consideration? What is our moral condition? Are we such perfect beings, that we are susceptible of no improvement? Have we found, by contact with other nations, that we are the objects of envy to the civilised world, and regarded as models and criteria? Sir, our position, moral and physical, is one of the greatest anxiety to the philanthropist, and of deliberation to the philosopher and statesman; and while it has been a common boast that this is the first country in the world in the point of civilisation, it is astonishing to perceive how little has been done in the way of diffusing general education, and a knowledge of the first principles of science. The defective state of education in England has been productive of the greatest evils; and it is felt not only in our moral and social relations, but also in our physical condition; and, instead of standing the highest in rank in point of civilisation, this country may be regarded as being almost the lowest, in comparison with other European nations, in the general diffusion of knowledge amongst the people. The evils of want of education in the elements of science, in matters of every-day life, and in the pursuits of industry, are hourly experienced. For instance, it is scarcely possible to enter upon any investigation in connection with agriculture, without finding it connected, more or less, with the doctrines and elucidations derived from chemistry; and yet, in the agricultural districts, we find little knowledge of the first principles of chemistry — of all those grand discoveries which have been the wonder and admiration of the world; and, for want of such knowledge, we find it stated in the most able agricultural reports, that by the injudicious use of lime many thousands of acres in various parts of the kingdom, which would have been fertile, have been reduced to a state of almost total unproductiveness and sterility. Again, with respect to manure, Mr. Malcolm complains that he has not, in any one instance, been able to find anything like system in the mechanical arrangement of the components of farm-yard mixings, which he generally found put together as they had been first deposited, according to circumstances, and without any regard to rule. A great ignorance of the principles of mechanics is also constantly manifested in harnessing horses, and in other simple processes of a similar character. With respect, also, to the ignorance that prevails with regard to planting, Mr. Falkner says, —

Thousands of acres of woods and plantations were utterly ruined from a want of knowledge of the process of vegetation; gross neglect was the rule, and tolerable attention was the exception.

What, as a body, do we know of the chemical properties of the various soils we cultivate, or even of the different manures most generally used and approved of by farmers to assist production? Positively nothing. We are compelled to admit that, as a science, agriculture is even now but in its infancy. Mr. Lowe, chairman of the Sevenoaks union, says,—

That the farmers, for the most part, keep indifferent accounts, and many of them none at all, — which is a state of things utterly incompatible with any systematic improvement. He has nothing to look to which will indicate with precision the calculations which he has made. Again, in geology, "that fashionable road which leads to damnation," immense errors are constantly being committed. Lavoisier, even without a minute knowledge of farming, by following an enlightened system, is said, in good years, to have doubled the produce in grain of his lands, and to have quintupled his flocks.

Farmers are generally found, at present, to be jealous of their labourers; but if education were more generally diffused amongst them, confidence would in a great measure be restored, and they would be most anxious to promote and encourage education amongst the labourers and their children. They would feel convinced that the stupid and brutalised hind was not to be depended on from one moment to another; that as soon as the eye of the master is off him he relaxes in his exertions, and that he only differs from the slave in this, — that the slave starts into activity upon the apprehension of the whip, while the labourer does so at the impending loss of his wages. The master would feel that he could not be everywhere, and that he constantly sustained losses in consequence, and that it was impracticable to introduce many improvements which he otherwise would adopt. If he were better informed, he would be convinced that the only means of remedying these evils and inconveniences, to which he is daily exposed, is by diffusing knowledge, and improving the condition of his labourers, both socially and mentally. Shall I be told that men, in the state they are in, in agricultural districts, are not to have knowledge communicated to them, and the means afforded of bringing out their powers to the best advantage?

Let us go further, and look through the towns. — There we find the grossest ignorance of the first principles of the preservation of health, such as ventilation and cleanliness; — we find the most unwholesome employments and habits persisted in; — and such is the intensity of the ignorance of the people, that when means have been proposed for ameliorating their condition, they have been not only opposed and rejected, but with feelings of animosity and ridicule against the philanthropist who has had courage and humanity enough to interfere. And then the deficiency of knowledge that prevails in the application of the elements of art to manufactures is strikingly obvious, when the productions in several branches of industry are contrasted with those of the schools of Lyons and Berlin. This is particularly obvious in the printing of cottons; and the late Sir Robert Peel attributed many of our great manufacturing losses to the inferiority of the taste of our workmen to that displayed by those of the Continent. The inferiority of our population is not less striking as regards the social condition of the lower classes. This is peculiarly obvious in the places of residence of the lower classes in the district of Manchester and its neighbourhood. I find from a Report laid before the British Association of Science, that the proportion of the population of Manchester who live in the cellars was 11¾ per cent.; of Salford, 8 per cent.; of Bury, 3¾ per cent.; of Ashton, 1¼ per cent.; of Staleybridge, 1½ per cent.; of Dukenfield, 1¼ per cent.; and of Liverpool, 15 per cent. Taking the whole of the working population of that large town, 20 per cent. lived in cellars, or, in round numbers, 31,000 persons so resided out of a population of 230,000. The Report I have referred to states —

That the great proportion of the inhabited cells were dark, damp, confined, ill ventilated, and dirty. The numbers residing in each cellar varied from four to seventeen. As in many (perhaps in the majority of cases) there are only two beds to a family of five or six persons of both sexes, the inconveniences and evils which must arise from this deficiency of accommodation are too obvious to require further remark.

This is a striking illustration of the condition of the working classes in the manufacturing districts; and there is much additional evidence to show a similar state of things in other places. For instance, in the Report of the Central Society of Education, it is stated, that out of 66 families in Norfolk, in 24 instances the whole of the children occupied the same bed-rooms as their parents, and in 86, boys were not separated from girls. It also appeared that in Dukenfield, Staleybridge, and Ashton there were 2057 families, in which more than 3 and less than 4 persons slept in one bed; 632 families, in which more than 4 and less than 5 persons were similarly situated; 180 families, in which more than 5 and less than 6; and 330 families, in which more than 6 persons slept in one bed. The children in most of these families were employed in the coal mines in the vicinity of these places. From the same Report I find that the number of beer-shops, public houses, &c., in Bury, was in the proportion of 1 to every 122 persons; in Ashton, 1 to every 113 persons; in Staleybridge, 1 to every 200; and in Dukenfield, 1 to every 254 persons. In the evidence taken before the commissioners appointed to inquire into the condition of the handloom weavers, the following striking facts were stated by one of the witnesses; —

I have seen human degradation in some of its worst phases, both in England and abroad; but I can advisedly say, that I did not believe, until I visited the wynds of Glasgow, that so large an amount of filth, crime, misery, and disease congregated in one spot in any civilised country.

Again, the want of education of the working classes is strikingly manifest in the strikes that take place, which generally arise from a gross ignorance of the laws which regulate the rate of wages and the interests of the labourers. It often happens that 50 men in a manufactory compel 1500 to stop work. The best paid workmen are often the movers and instigators to these strikes; but the inevitable effect is, to abate all motive to pre-eminent skill. They are often directed against the employment of machinery; but machinery generally leads to an increased demand for the manufactured article,—and thus an increased number of workmen are employed, and the amount of wages is increased. By strikes, however, the consumption of goods is diminished, and wages are ultimately reduced. On this subject, the following remarkable evidence as to the effects of one of these strikes was given before a committee of the House. It relates to a strike in the manufactories at Preston, which lasted from October, 1836, to February, 1837.

While the turn-out lasted, the operatives generally wandered about the streets without any definite object. Seventy-five persons were brought before the magistrates and convicted of drunkenness and disorderly conduct; twelve were imprisoned and held to bail for assaults; and about twenty young females became prostitutes, of whom more than one half are still so, and also two of them have since been transported for theft. Three persons are also believed to have died of starvation; not less than 5000 must have suffered from hunger and cold; and in almost every family the greater part of the wearing apparel and household furniture was pawned. In nine houses out of ten, considerable arrears of rent were due; and out of the sum of 1600*l.* deposited in the savings bank by about sixty spinners or overlookers, 900*l.* was withdrawn in the course of three months, and most of those who could get credit got into debt with the shopkeepers. The trade of the town suffered severely, — many of the small shopkeepers were nearly ruined, and some completely so.

Again, the evils of the want of education are manifest when the moral and religious condition of the people is regarded. On this point, I would refer to the evidence that was given as to the classes who were generally the inmates of prisons and houses of correction. It was stated at a late meeting of the British and Foreign School Society at Cheltenham, by Mr. St. Clair, a deputy-lieutenant of the county of Gloucester —

That two thirds of the youth in Gloucester gaol were the most ignorant of society. There were at present on the treadmill of that place, 120 men who had been convicted of small felonies; five out of six were under twenty years of age; nine out of every ten could not read a single word.

It appears, from Returns on the table, that, in 1837, not less than 20,000 persons were tried for offences in England and Wales, and that 15,000 were convicted, while the number of criminal commitments to gaol are 100,000 annually. The Report of the commissioners appointed to inquire into the state of the rural constabulary, gives many instances of the barbarous habits of the people of this country on the coasts where wrecks occur, — and more especially in Cheshire, Wales, Dorsetshire, Hampshire, and Kent, in which counties the deficiency of education is most obvious. It is also stated, in the evidence of Messieurs Burt and Elliot, that England, in respect of the state of the roads, follows next after Italy and Spain; but that, in respect of crime, cunning, here, generally supersedes the place of violence. The latter, however, often predominates in the country districts. It is also stated, in the same Report, that there are 6000 thieves at large in the metropolis, and within the metropolitan police districts there are 10,666 depredators. In page 79. of this Report it is stated that —

The majority of crimes which are attended by violence are now committed in the rural districts, although the population and property in towns have increased in a far greater proportion.

Digitized by Google

Again, in page 50., it is said, —

Dupin graduates the increase of crime in a direct ratio, according to the condensations of populations in towns.

The following Return is also given, on the same authority, of the proportion of bad characters to the population: — In the metropolitan police district it is 1 to 89; in Liverpool, 1 to 45; in Kingston upon Hull, 1 to 64; in Bath, 1 to 37; in the county and city of Bristol, 1 to 31; and in Newcastle, 1 to 27. It is also stated that prostitution was as great in London as in Paris. The Report of the Committee on the Central Society of Education states, —

Your committee are fully persuaded that to the want of education is to be chiefly attributed the great increase of criminals, and, consequently, of cost to the country, — namely, in twelve years, from 1 to 10; and while the population increased only 32 per cent., the committals had increased fourfold.

Now, Sir, with relation to religious education in this country, it cannot, surely, be contended, that the amount of it afforded is anything like equal to the demand; and the manner in which the Bible is read in our schools is far from being calculated to promote any good. If we recur to the recent lamentable occurrences in the county of Kent, we shall find that Bible reading — instead of being necessary — instead of being a security to the country for the good conduct of the people — is, if unaccompanied by proper instruction and general education, productive of evil rather than good. Look at the state of those parishes in which the ignorant impostor Thom had obtained so many followers, — namely, Herne Hill, Dunkirk, and Boughton. The inhabitants of those villages were induced to believe that Thom was the Saviour and Redeemer, and to imagine that disobedience of his mandates would entail on them eternal damnation. It appeared that he gave them the sacrament, anointed himself and them with oil, and told them that no bullet could touch them. He showed them the marks of the nails; and assured them, if they doubted that, he should call them to judgment. He threatened, also, to rain fire and brimstone on them if they left him, and, at the same time, blessed the little children that were brought to him. This was in the midst of a beautiful country, in which there was no hostility to the poor laws, where the peasantry had good wages, and where the poor rates were comparatively low. Yes, Sir, the populace received these fanatical doctrines, and exhibited these deplorable proofs of superstition and barbarism, even under the very spires of Canterbury cathedral, — a district thronged with ecclesiastics; — and all these deluded and ignorant people were possessed of a Bible and Testament, but no other books, nor any means for obtaining a liberal education. The state of education in these districts, I believe, is as follows: — At Herne Hill there are 51 families, in which there are 45 above the age of 14; and of them 11 can read and write, and 21 can do so very imperfectly, and the remainder not at all. There are 117 children under that age: and of these, 42 are at school: most of them make little or no progress, and they are generally taken away, at an early period, by their parents. Many of the children who had been two years at school, were frequently found unable to read. The reading of the children in these schools is confined to the New Testament. Many of those who had been educated stated that they could read the Testament once, but that they could not do so now. It was found that the Sunday schools were insufficient, as the children could never be brought to connect what they learned in schools with their practice in life, and remained as idle, mischievous, and vicious as before. In Dunkirk, there are 118 children; 10 of them can read and write, 13 can do so a little, and the remainder cannot do so at all. In Boughton there are 119 children under the age of 14, and 32 attend school. Only 7 attend school where writing is taught; the remainder only go to a Sunday school. These facts prove that merely religious instruction of the kind obtained by these villagers is not, of itself, sufficient to fit men to discharge their duties to society. It is shown by the foregoing statements, that the majority had been at Sunday schools, and were in the habit of attending church, and most of them who could read possessed only religious books; so that not only the instruction they received, but the only kind they had the opportunity of gaining, was wholly of a religious cast.

Now, Sir, the effects of this system — its utter and total inefficiency, or rather its evils — are sufficiently exemplified by the lamentable incident to which I have referred. But it is not to these districts in Kent that the evil is confined. There is a similar general defect of education throughout the country. For instance, in Manchester, in 1834 and 1835, there were 232 schools, and 56,189 scholars, — being 22 per cent. of the population; and of these were 29,529 who only received Sunday tuition. In Liverpool, in the same years, there were 766 schools, in which there were 33,183 scholars, — being 14 $\frac{43}{100}$ per cent. of the population; and of these, 3,719 received only Sunday tuition. In Salford, there were 211 schools, and 12,838 scholars, — being 23 $\frac{4}{100}$ per cent. of the population; and of these, 6344 received only Sunday school tuition. In York, there were 150 schools, and 5591 scholars, — making 19 $\frac{17}{100}$ per cent. of the population; and of these, 842 received Sunday school instruction only. In Bury, there were 79 schools, and 5727 scholars, — making 28 $\frac{43}{100}$ per cent. of the population; and of these, 3102 attended Sunday schools only. In Newcastle, 49 out of every 100 of the youthful population between the ages of five and fifteen did not receive any instruction whatever. At Gateshead, 12$\frac{1}{2}$ of the juvenile population attended schools. Thus, in seventeen of the chief towns in this country, the average of those who receive daily instruction is only 1 in 12; while in Manchester the proportion is only 1 in 35, — while, according to the conclusion I have arrived at, it ought to be 1 in 8. The result is, that there are 3,000,000 children in England to be supplied with instruction, half of whom are left in a state of complete ignorance. The population of children under fifteen is about 4,000,000: deducting those under two years — about 500,000 — there were 3,500,000 to attend school; and from this number 500,000 should be deducted as receiving private instruction. Taking the returns in other countries, it appears that in the United States, in eleven states, the education is 1 out of 5; in seven other states, 1 out of 6; in three others, 1 out of 7; in two, 1 out of 8; and in two others, 1 out of 10; while in England and Scotland the proportion is as 1 in 11; in Lombardy it is 1 in 12; in France, 1 in 13. The evils that result from this defect of general education for the people are obvious in the extent to which numerous depredations, petty thefts, and misdemeanours are carried; and these are, often, to such an extent as to put a stop to cultivation and trading in many places. In 1836, 700,000*l.* were lost in Liverpool by depredations. The causes of this state of things do not arise from want. One of the chief causes is the want of steadiness in early occupations; for the want of this is one of the most powerful temptations to a career of crime, instead of a career of industry. The effects of prisons on early delinquents is most striking. Mr. Chesterton, the governor of Coldbath Fields Prison, stated, that nearly in almost all cases of juvenile offences, there was an ignorance of religion which amounted to almost perfect heathenism. The effect of this ignorance on society is, that there are large masses of the population either actually in the commission of crime, or preparing for it. There is also an envy, and a desire of enjoyment, both of which lead to enormous abuses in the various relations of society; and the inattention of the upper classes leads to the dissociation of the lower classes from them, and they are often induced to adopt Chartism and infidelity. In some other countries, the state of things is very different, for robberies are scarcely ever heard of; and Prussia has been marked as a country, in this respect, very favourable for a traveller to pass through. In a recent volume of travels in Germany, published by Mr. Chambers, entitled, "The Tour of an English Traveller in 1837," it is stated, —

> I have not seen three individuals drunk in Germany in three months.

Again, it is stated in the same work, —

> The Catholic churches in both the towns and villages are crowded by worshippers by five o'clock in the morning, not only on Sundays, but on week days, and the priests are in attendance to perform their duties at that hour.

In Switzerland, also, there is an abstinence from wine. In that country, there is a perfect freedom in trade, and a constant attendance on the offices of religion, and a morality superior, perhaps, to that of any other community; and such a feeling of equality prevails between the rich and the poor, as recognises, on both sides, the common humanity in which consists the true dignity of man. Sir, it is the bounden duty of Parliament to put an end to the existing state of ignorance among the lower classes in this country, which is productive of so frightful an amount of crime. Nine tenths of the inmates of prisons throughout the country are unable to read. The voluntary system has been found to be a total failure. Already has it been abandoned in the case of the poor law and police, and organisation substituted in its stead. It must likewise be given up in the education of the people. I would ask, is the education of the people of a great country — education which ought to be based upon permanent and enduring principles — education which ought to grow with the growth, and strengthen with the strength, of the nation — to be left to the contingencies of the voluntary system, and the uncertainties of private subscription? When I conceive the idea of a public school, I consider that it ought to be a school properly and truly belonging to the nation at large, and not belonging to this or that clergyman, or this or that sect. I consider it, not in the light of a nobleman's park, into which a few favoured individuals are admitted, but in the light of the highway, along which the public have an undoubted right of way. Now, the institutions which have been so much referred to, — namely, the National and British and Foreigh Societies, — besides being inadequate in other respects for the purposes of general instruction, have, both of them, the defect of adopting exclusive systems. The National Society excludes Protestant Dissenters from the benefits it affords to members of the established church; and the British and Foreign School Society excludes Roman Catholics, by enjoining the Scriptures to be read without note or comment in its schools. Therefore, there is no complete system, or such as can be regarded in the light of a truly national education. Some persons wish to place the education of the entire people in the same hands in which partial education now reposes; others wish a national system to be established on a broad, liberal, and comprehensive basis, which should exclude none — no, neither the Catholic nor the Dissenter, the Protestant nor the Jew — from being instructed in the performance of his general duties. The Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire has contended that we should place the entire system in the hands of the church, and has cited certain authorities in support of his opinion. But, Sir, those authorities are derived from times, the circumstances of which are wholly out of the pale of comparison with the present. They are derived from the dark ages, when the entire population of Europe was divided into two classes — the men of war and the men of peace, — the latter, men who devoted themselves to the studies of law and religion, and, very often, of both combined, — ages in which learning was almost completely confined to the priests. But will any man tell me that now, when literature and science are no longer confined to the church, — when learning has gone abroad amongst other classes, — that that church shall assume to itself the management of secular as well as spiritual education? God forbid I should seek to deprive the church of her due influence in matters of religion — matters over which her control appears both just and natural! for what is the duty of the church but to afford religious instruction? But it does not, by any means, follow, as a just conclusion, that the church is, therefore, able to afford the best instruction in physical science or secular affairs. And I would inquire whether, because it is the duty of the church to diffuse her doctrines, and instruct the people in a knowledge of them, it is likewise their duty to take means to prevent any other faith being adopted? If the church is to lay down the position that she is to be the sole manager of the education of the people, I maintain that she lays claim to a power which it is utterly impossible, under existing circumstances, she can ever possess. If she lay claim, on the ground of being the national church, we must then inquire what is signified by the word "national." If the faith and doctrines of the church were the faith and doctrines of the entire nation, then, indeed, the claim might be tenable; but, unless that can be clearly demonstrated, I apprehend the claim must fall to the ground. Surely it cannot be maintained by the Church of England that she is to assume the management of the education of the dissenting portion of the population, having no communion whatever with her, and repudiating her doctrines. But, suppose for a moment we admit the claim of the church in the abstract, will Honourable Gentlemen opposite say that the church has administered the duties of education, which have hitherto devolved upon her, with a zeal and energy so warm and exemplary, as should render us anxious to place in her hands increased power and more onerous duties? On this point, however, I am glad to add, that of late she has certainly manifested some increase of attention to this momentous matter.

I have already quoted, and expressed my opinion of, the second plan, which limits the grant to the two societies. I will here observe, that it is not sufficient that you come to the House of Commons and ask for a grant, to give greater effect to your intentions. The moment the money is granted, this House acquires a responsibility as to its application, and a right of superintendence. Now, the question arises, How has the Treasury applied this money? and also, whether the Treasury is the proper depository for the application of this money? First, the Treasury merely limits itself to the plain and obvious arrangement, that the amount of private contribution should be taken as a test or proportion for, and should govern the amount of, public money to be granted. That arrangement is good, so far as it stimulates private bounty; but then it has likewise this disadvantageous effect, — that the richer districts receive the larger share of assistance, whilst the poorer, which are so much in need of schools, receive no benefit. That is my first objection, as to the mode of applying the money. My second objection is this; — that it is not sufficient, when you talk about applying money to the extension of education, to confine your views to the mere building of school-houses. The very essence and mind of the school is the master; and this plan contains nothing for securing good and efficient teachers, — without which, no system of national education can be considered as complete. It is also necessary to establish a system of inspection; for those upon whom the responsibility will rest — and from the moment the public money is granted, such a responsibility is incurred — cannot account for the application of the grant, without the aid of inspectors. That which appears to be the plan best calculated for this country, as for every other, is to unite the central and local powers; the former, for taking charge of and transmitting the funds — the latter, for applying them. Such is the system acted upon, I might almost say, throughout the civilised globe. It was adopted in Greece, immediately after the revolution; it has existed in Naples since the year 1806; it was established in Rome under Leo XII.; in Tuscany, it was introduced still earlier; and it obtains in the confederation of Switzerland; — all these have their boards, their councils, their ministers of instruction, and their local committees. France, by the law of 1834, adopted the system; it was in use in all the states of Germany, from 1802 to 1834; in Russia it has been advancing stage by stage. Sweden has her local boards and committees; Denmark her councils, inspectors, and secretaries. In Holland the system has been put into action; and in the United States of America it has been found to work as well as in Europe, to the satisfaction of the population. In a Report on the state of education in the State of Kentucky, the reporter says: —

In the first place, the experience of those states whose systems I have examined, recommends very clearly that popular education be taken under legislative patronage and control. It cannot be denied that, in some cases, legislative effort has not been crowned with all the success desired; yet it is also true that the general diffusion of education has never been effected in any age or country, except by governmental aid and direction.

And again, in more detail, —

If every parent in the state could and would educate his children, and educate them well, nothing more could be desired. But as it is essential to the wellbeing of society that all its intellectual capital should be employed, if any member of the common family cannot educate his children, he should be assisted; if any could, but will not, they should be impelled to it, by authority or inducement; —

(This comes from America, not Prussia) —

— if all or any are disposed to do it, but to do it imperfectly, they should be overseen. The great object of legislative superintendence, therefore, is to see that all the children in society are educated, and educated well. That these ends cannot be attained without the direction of Government is demonstrable from the experience of New York, shown in 1816, when the Legislature assumed the control of public schools, the number of children was reported at 140,000; whereas at the present time it cannot fall far short of half a million.

Sir, my grand object is education — a united system of education. Now, the plan of the Government has been objected to, because the different sects will be brought in contact in the same schools; but the Government merely requires that they should receive their literary education together, and their religious instruction apart. I cannot see, therefore, what difficulty there is, in the way of religious education; or how it would be, in the slightest degree, changed or interfered with under the plan which is proposed. Now, with respect to the versions of the Bible, it is universally admitted that the Protestant version contains numerous errors and imperfections. Would it not, then, be better that the Catholic child should be allowed at school to read some version, or extracts from some version, rather than that he should receive no biblical instruction whatever? Honourable Gentlemen, who take a different view of this great and important subject from that which I entertain, are much in the habit of anticipating the most alarming evils from the practical application of those principles of popular education of which I have ever been the humble but earnest and sincere advocate; but if these evils are so likely to occur in England, I should like to know why they have not happened in Prussia, in Holland, or in the United States of America? The state of morals in those countries is such as the people of England might well desire to see established in their own land; and I do not hesitate to say that the superior state of morals is to be attributed to a superior state of national education.

Among the objections urged against the system which I advocate is this, — that it tends to promote the ascendancy of the Roman Catholic church. Now, I cannot see that it has any such tendency; and if I could think for a moment that it would be attended with such a result, I sincerely declare that it would receive no support from me. I am not more opposed to the ascendancy of Protestantism, than I am to the ascendancy of any other particular class of religionists. I am opposed to every species of ascendancy. I am as much opposed to Catholic ascendancy as I am to Protestant or any other ascendancy. There is no effort I could make — there is scarcely a sacrifice I should consider too great — for the purpose of preventing any ascendancy of any creed whatever; but it is in the confident belief that the great ends of education may be fully and completely attained, without, in the least, promoting the ascendancy of any class in the community, that I venture, earnestly, to press upon the Members of this House the necessity of giving to the children of those they represent a sound practical and religious education; and, at the same time that it is religious, protected from the dictation of any class of the community in matters of faith. It is impossible to look abroad without becoming sensible of the fact, that there is a deplorable deficiency of education in every quarter of the country — a deficiency, I may say, in almost every species of useful instruction; but I venture to hope that the time is not far off when this stain and reproach will be removed from the land.

Mr. COLQUHOUN. — I trust the Honourable Member who has just sat down will not impute it to any disrespect on my part, if I do not attempt to follow him through the details of his speech, and the documents he has quoted, — as, to do so would lead me away from the question before the House. I must say, however, that I scarcely think it correct that the Honourable Member should bring forward against the people of England the sweeping and general charge which he has done, — that they are lower in the scale of civilisation than any country in Europe, — that they are lower in the scale of civilisation than the people of Rome and Tuscany; and I cannot allow such an assertion to pass without protesting most strongly against it, as an assertion based, not upon a comprehensive view of the character and condition of the people of England, but upon statements referring only to the inmates of her criminal prisons. Sir, the point before the House for decision is not the establishment of a spiritual yoke, of the ascendancy of the Church. That is not the object of my Noble Friend, — but, the maintenance of a system which has been established, now, six years, with excellent effect, and the rejection of a new system, quite alien to the constitution of the country, and hitherto quite unknown to it. That new system, which was attempted to be introduced by a Committee of the Privy Council, has been, for the present, given up; but if they had the power of introducing it at all, they still retain that power, and they may at any time resume the scheme which they have just abandoned. So long as they retain a power of this kind, — a power giving them so extensive an influence over the religious and moral instruction of the nation, — the people of England will be justified in viewing it with jealousy. The scheme has not given satisfaction to any party, — to the Dissenter any more than to the Churchman. I will quote the authority of a Dissenter — a voluntary and a liberal — upon this point. Mr. Dunn, the secretary of the British and Foreign School Society, asks why we should betake ourselves to measures so foreign to the habits and feelings of the nation, and so liable to abuses, tending directly to the worst of all tyrannies — a tyranny over the minds of the people. Mr. Dunn further says that there is no imaginable reason why we should give any Government an amount of moral influence which, under some circumstances, might lead to the most destructive consequences. There is another reason why the people of this country should feel strong apprehensions with regard to the proposed plan. There is a curious coincidence between the steps pursued by the Noble Lord and the advice tendered by the Central Society of Education, of which the Honourable Gentleman opposite (Mr. Wyse) is so distinguished a member. The Central Society avows, as I understand, that the object to be aimed at is to establish, in this country, education which shall not be "sectarian." There is, perhaps, some difficulty in saying what absolutely comes from that society; for, after the example set them in very high quarters, they have a great many "open questions." Each person speaks for himself. They have somewhat of a Liberty Hall. But if any one can be considered to speak authoritatively the sentiments of the society, it is the secretary, Mr. Duppa; and it is the opinion of that gentleman that the state ought to separate secular from religious instruction. He says, in distinct terms,—

> To effect this object, it is only necessary that instruction of a purely scientific character should be separated from that which is religious.

There is another gentleman, who may be considered the peculiar missionary of the Government, inasmuch as, during the lectures recently delivered by him in town, he was patronised by several of its member'—I mean Mr. Simpson, — who says, —

Children are to be educated in the national schools from two to fourteen years of age. . . . The Bible (he said) should not be taught from two to fourteen. Masters should be dismissed for meddling with the subject of revealed religion. "I would prohibit the teacher from any reference in his lessons to Christian doctrines or Christian history. The Bible had better not be placed in the secular school at all. Without this, we shall never carry into effect a system of national education."

These are the sentiments plainly avowed by Mr. Simpson. I would ask the House, is it not too much to require that I, and those who think with me, should abandon the opinions which we held last year, merely because others have given up theirs, —that we should join in denouncing, now, those principles in conducting the education of the country, which we formerly gave our consent to when supported by the Noble Lord opposite? The Noble Lord has strangely departed from the wise course in which, last year, he so earnestly engaged. There has been a great change in his conduct.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — None whatever.

Mr. COLQUHOUN. — I repeat, that the Noble Lord and the Honourable Gentleman opposite by no means hold the same sentiments, in the present year, that they did in the last. On that account, as well as for other reasons, I shall take the liberty of calling the attention of the House to a short extract from a speech of the Honourable Gentleman who spoke last. It is in these words: —

The great defect of English education is the total want of a national organisation. There is not, as in all continental countries, a Minister and Council of Instruction — but a wandering voluntary system of instruction. If the State is to touch our public schools at all, she must do it through a proper department: no more grants, or a Minister and Council through which they are to come. Difficulties there may be, but none which good sense and strong will may not beat down. There is no possible reason why Government, in the case of England, should not act as in the case of Ireland. Is a Home Secretary, here, of shorter arms and poorer courage, than a Chief Secretary, there? A letter of instruction may fairly anticipate an Act of Parliament. What we want is the organisation — a board of education for England.

These were the sentiments of the Honourable Gentleman. What did the Noble Lord do? In February, out came his letter of instructions; in April, the National Board was constituted, following, step by step, most marvellously, the "instructions" of the society. The next measure was the erection of a normal seminary. This, also, was insinuated by the Noble Lord into one of his schemes. And what was the end which the Central Society had in view? The Honourable Gentleman (Mr. Wyse) has, to-night, pretty strongly intimated that the object was to give the board full inspection and control over all the schools in the country, and thereby to oblige them to alter their system according to such a plan as they should think proper to suggest. Sir, I have stated that this board does not give satisfaction to the Church of England, the Wesleyan Methodists, or the great body of Dissenters. But does it give permanent satisfaction to the gentlemen of the Central Board itself? No such thing. It is merely to be preparatory. They represent the Board of Privy Council as overloaded with business, not permanent in their constitution, and little versed in systems of instruction, and utterly unfit to superintend the national education. But the Central Society do not wish the Noble Lord, all at once, to grasp at entire domination over national education; but, by and by, a proposal will be made for appointing three paid commissioners, as a Noble and Learned Lord suggested in another place, with powers more absolute even than those of the Poor Law Commissioners, —powers to visit every school in England, to establish what was called a national school in every parish, and to compel every child, from two to fourteen years of age, to attend them. It is perfectly obvious, then, that we are now entering upon the first step of the plan, as developed both in the publications of the Central Society and in the elaborate evidence given before that committee, of which the Honourable Gentleman (Mr. Wyse) is chairman; and the House must be prepared for the results. The Noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland, and the Honourable Member for Lambeth, tried, the other night, to persuade us that our fears as to the results of this system were chimerical, —for that, in fact, it was only a recurrence to the old system, which had been in operation for the last six years. But if that be indeed so, —if there be no difference between the present plan and the Treasury scheme of Lord Althorp, — why does not the Noble Lord at once relieve the excited apprehensions of the country, by acceding to the motion of my Noble Friend the Member for North Lancashire? For this Board of Privy Council, so long as it exists, will possess great powers and great discretion, which it might abuse? All I ask is, that you should revert to the rules laid down by the Treasury. But are the rules laid down by the Board of Privy Council really the same as those of the Treasury? They are as different as possible. The rules of the Treasury secured to the country the guarantee of two established societies both for the character and the permanence of the schools to which money was voted; but, under the Board of Privy Council, any school, however recommended, — whether they had ascertained its character, or not, — whatever that character might be, — whether it taught the most absurd or the most offensive doctrines, — however ephemeral its existence might be, springing up to-day and disappearing to-morrow, — every such school may receive a portion of the public money. The Treasury scheme possessed another very great advantage; — it called forth, from the different localities in which a school might be established, a large amount of private subscriptions. The Privy Council Board presented no such guarantee for the judicious and proper application of the public money. It is true, no doubt, as the Honourable Member for Lambeth has remarked, that there are districts in the country so poor that they cannot afford to raise any local subscription. That fact is deserving of the utmost consideration. But let us, at least, supply those cases whose destitution the Treasury has examined, and which have not yet been relieved, before we are called upon to reverse the system on a mere theoretical objection. Besides, there is a great number of new district churches building throughout the country; and, if the Treasury grants be continued, a school will be established in connection with every one of these. Within the last six years, 120,000*l.* of public money has been expended for educational purposes; it has called forth no less a sum than 230,000*l.* in the shape of local subscriptions, and secured education to 230,000 children, and covered a population of two millions and a quarter. Thus have schools been erected with a perfect guarantee for both character and permanence; and it is hardly reasonable to call upon us to retrace our steps and reverse our system, because it has not effected all that some Honourable Gentlemen may desire. If enough has not been voted, why do you not increase the Treasury grant? You have, through the National Society, applications from no less than 168 places, giving education to 32,000 scholars, drawing out of local contributions 55,000*l.*, and receiving only 16,000*l.* from the Treasury. Here is a practical case, — a tangible and substantial good to be accomplished. The Privy Council Board allow the greatest possible latitude as to who should apply for a grant, and who should receive it: but they are very stringent in one rule; — they insist on a pledge to conform to the discipline and the rules laid down by the Privy Council.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — No; their own rules.

Mr. COLQUHOUN. — I beg the Noble Lord's pardon if I am wrong. I regret, however, we have not yet heard the comments of any one of those four members of the Board of Privy Council, in explanation of this very obscure and very important document. We were told, a fortnight ago, that papers should be laid forthwith on the table, which would remove the gross misrepresentations which had been circulated respecting the Noble Lord's scheme; but up to the present moment no explanatory document has been presented, — nothing to correct misapprehension, nothing to obviate perversion, nothing to clear away the mist which envelopes this important minute. When we came to the discussion, however, we were told by the Noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland that there should be a conformity to the regulations and discipline established in the several schools, with such improvements as from time to time might be suggested by the board. I will venture to say that no member of the Church of England, no Wesleyan Methodist, no evangelical Dissenter, would put himself in connection with this board, under a system so constituted as to require from them a conformity quite inconsistent with their principles and conscientious opinions. The plan, therefore, of the Noble Lord would exclude from any participation in the parliamentary grant all who were attached to the Church of England, and those large classes of Dissenters who never would consent to the condition so unjustly imposed of opening their schools to the visitation, control, and capricious improvements of a board whose plan is not yet matured, which is yet only in the womb of time, and which, so far as it has been developed, never can give satisfaction to the great bulk of the people. But it seems, after all, that the most obnoxious feature of the former scheme, the erection of a normal seminary, has not been abandoned; it was only postponed. What mode of instruction, then, does the Noble Lord propose to introduce in the normal school? Is it to be connected with the Church of England, on the system recommended by the British and Foreign School Society, which the Noble Lord has admitted to be the best? The Noble Lord's scheme is to lay aside all the special points of religion in which each sect differs, and reserve those general points in which they all agree. The Central Society represent the British and Foreign School system as essentially sectarian; conscientious Unitarians and Catholics are opposed to it. The Bible must be taught regularly and systematically; its doctrines must be engrafted on the minds of the children before any good moral result can be expected. On this subject I beg to quote the testimony of a distinguished philosopher and statesman. M. Guizot says, —

> It had been sometimes thought that to succeed in securing to families of different creeds the reality and the freedom of religious instruction, it was sufficient to substitute for the special lessons and practices of the several religious denominations, some lessons and practices susceptible in appearance of being applied to all religions: this would not answer the wish either of families or the law; they would tend to banish all positive and effective religious instruction from the schools, in order to substitute one that is merely vague and abstract.

The Noble Lord's panacea of special and general religious instruction must, therefore, be a complete failure. I hope, the Noble Lord, referring to the document which has lately been placed on the table, and which enumerates no fewer than twenty-five different sects, will place on record those doctrines in which they agree, and those on which they differ: the result will probably satisfy most Honourable Members that a system of instruction projected on such a basis must fail of its intended effect. Then, Sir, there must be a master: abstract rules, mere idle regulations, can effect nothing. The master must form the habits and minds of the scholars. Now, what religion is the master to be of? If he be a member of the Church of England, all the other twenty-five sects will clamour against his appointment; and if he belong to one of the twenty-five sects, the other twenty-four will clamour as loudly against him. If he be a man duly impressed with a sense of the religious principles of the sect to which he belongs, he will, of necessity, impress upon his pupils those religious principles which he himself conscientiously believes; and if he be a man of no religion, will the moral and religious people of England submit to have their children exposed to his tuition? What, then, are you to do with your model school, and with your rector, who is to initiate all the other masters, who are to be appointed to regulate all the other schools in England? M. Cousin has observed that children judge of the value of the instruction which they receive in schools from the time and attention devoted to it. If, then, religion were to be excluded as a subject of instruction from these schools, what would children think of religion? They would regard it with indifference: and therefore this system is setting up a series of schools which would train up tutors and children in indifference to all those great and eternal truths which are essential to the maintenance of peace and order in society. I therefore protest against this system, from which practical religion is absolutely excluded, — a system fraught with blunders, as the Noble Lord himself admitted, when he abandoned his first scheme.

[Cheers from the Opposition, and cries of "No, no!" from the Ministerial benches.]

What am I understand from those cries? That the first scheme is not even postponed? We heard a good deal last night about open questions; — is this to be another of them? The Noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland said, on the former night of this debate, that that scheme was abandoned. "But, no," says the Noble Lord opposite; "the scheme is not even postponed."

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I said nothing of the sort.

[Cheers from the Ministerial benches.]

Mr. COLQUHOUN. — I beg the Noble Lord's pardon, then; but some one said, "No!" and I conceived that the cry came from the Noble Lord; and the Noble Lord will forgive me if I attribute more of meaning to the Honourable Gentlemen who sit behind him, than I do to the Noble Lord himself. Sir, when I remember how often the Noble Lord has brought forward and abandoned schemes which he described as well considered and deliberately arranged, — and remembering, too, that it was only last year that the Noble Lord abandoned his education scheme, in deference to the opinions of those who usually sat behind him, — I must say that, if the negative which I just heard came not from the Noble Lord, but from some of the Honourable Members behind him, it affords me great room, at least, for comment. Will the Noble Lord, then, allow me to consider the last edition of his education scheme as the type of his meaning? Why, it was only last year that the Noble Lord declared, in his place in Parliament, that he could not discover any mode of reconciling religious differences on the subject of education; and that those differences were so wide and irreconcileable, that he despaired of being able to present to the House any united scheme of education. The Noble Lord, resting upon the petition from Manchester, signed by 22,000 persons, in support of the Government plan, and upon the petition presented by the Honourable Member for Staffordshire, which was not against it, will, perhaps, argue that there is now a greater concurrence in its favour than he had been led to anticipate, and will therefore be for introducing his postponed plan. I am, therefore, bound to come to the same conclusion to which my Noble Friend arrived on a former night, — that, as long as this board is to be constituted with unlimited discretion, and is to have power to deal as it pleases with the moral and religious education of the people, and, therefore, to tamper with those important elements of national prosperity, so long must I join with him in praying that that board should cease.

Mr. C. BULLER. — I must frankly admit that I am one of those unfortunate Members whose levity has called forth so much eloquence and so much indignation from the Honourable Member for Kilmarnock. I am sorry that I should have said anything to force the Honourable Member from his usual placidity and serenity of temper; but all that I meant to do was to contradict the assertion that the first scheme of education had been postponed on account of its blunders. There is, at least, one result from this debate, on which the friends of education have just grounds to congratulate themselves; and that is, that all the arguments against this plan resolve themselves into nothing else than a determined hostility, to every plan for the general education of all classes and sects of the people of England. I am not going to defend the defects which may be found in the Government plan, and which have given the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire another opportunity of treating his former colleagues with those courtesies by which he is accustomed to awaken the tender recollections of bygone friendships, and of expatiating on a subject on which no man has had greater experience than the Noble Lord; — I mean the most convenient mode of abandoning a course upon which a person has once entered.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

I admit that the first plan had this fault, — that, whilst it was liberal enough to excite the hostility of the thorough-going friends of the established church, it was not liberal enough to excite the sympathies of the masses. There was, however, this of promise in that plan, — and there is also in the present, — around which the friends of civil and religious liberty ought manfully to rally, — there is in both plans a recognition of the principle, long adopted by the other enlightened Governments of Europe, but never till now advanced by our own, — that the business of education ought not to be left to the voluntary principle, or to the whims and caprices of individuals; but that it should be conducted as a matter of vital importance to all the best interests of every class of the community. Honourable Gentlemen opposite must recollect that it was their own imprudent zeal which promulgated the important declaration, — that the House must annul the business of education, on the ground that the state only could administer education under the superintendence of the established church; and that, if it might not so administer it, it ought not to consent to administer it at all. That is a proposition which I will always resist; and which I am certain will be successfully resisted, if I do not entirely mistake the spirit of my fellow countrymen. I will not venture to deal with the antiquarian lore in which the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire has indulged on this occasion. I will leave the Noble Lord with all the credit which he may wish to obtain from his acquaintance with the obsolete maxims of the Chief Justice of Henry IV., — for I will not enter into the question, whether the education of a Protestant, in the nineteenth century, should be regulated on the principles of a bigoted old barbarian.

[Ironical cheers from the Opposition.]

Yes; I say, a bigoted old barbarian, whose chief employment was the burning of Lollards. I will leave the Noble Lord to enjoy all the credit which he may think due to an example drawn from "the pure wells" of bigotry, "undefiled," — an example taken from the worst times of our Popish ancestors.

LORD STANLEY. — I never said any such thing.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

Mr. C. BULLER. — I am not pretending to repeat the Noble Lord's words; but I appeal to any Honourable Member who heard the Noble Lord, whether what I have now said is not justly applicable to the spirit of his remarks. I am well aware that Noble Lords and Honourable Gentlemen in this House are far too cunning to commit themselves, here, to the same formulæ of bigotry to which their supporters commit themselves out of doors. But I would ask the Noble Lord whether he has not advocated the bigoted doctrine that there should be no education except under the superintendence of the Church of England — that doctrine from which he now seems willing to withdraw?

I wish, Sir, to examine this doctrine, and briefly to state my objections to it. First of all, I think, that to consign the business of education to the established church is tantamount to throwing it away altogether, for the established church has no machinery for conducting it; and when you talk of placing education in the hands of the established church, you can mean nothing else than leaving it to the voluntary contributions of its members. I call upon Honourable Gentlemen opposite to tell me what funds the established church, or the hierarchy of that church, have ever set aside for the purposes of education? I will say more, — I will say that the endowments of the Church of England, which were set aside at the time of the Reformation for the purposes of education, have been grossly perverted by that church, and have become mere sinecures. I did not expect to hear that assertion denied by any of the supporters of the diocesan schools, as they were the first persons to point out that perversion. But what, I would ask, has been the effect of leaving education in the hands of the established church? Am I to judge of the perversion of that system, from what takes place daily in the public schools, and parochial schools, and charity schools of the country, or from the state of various wide districts which are left entirely destitute of all moral and religious instruction whatsoever? What are we to think of that system of education, which has given to our country the greatest proportion of thieves and prostitutes of any nation in Europe? I believe that we may safely intrust the education of the people to the established church, whenever we see an earnest of a desire on the part of the church to devote its funds to the purposes of education, and whenever we see its honours and emoluments conferred on those who will apply their energies and knowledge to the instruction of the poor; — but not till then.

My second objection to the Noble Lord's proposition is still stronger than my first. In this country, liberty of conscience has been more completely vindicated than in any other country in Europe; and therefore our population is divided into a greater number of sects than are to be found elsewhere. If you offer education to our numerous Dissenters through the agency of the established church, and through its agency alone, they will be certain to refuse it. You may, indeed, say that that would be a strong proof of sectarian feeling; but still you would not be able to overlook the fact. What would be the effect of it? Not that you would give them religious instruction, but that you would debar them from all instruction whatever. My object, however, in rising to address the House this evening, is, to state an opinion with which I have long been impressed, — namely, that we shall never rightly appreciate the value of education, so long as we speak of it as a charity or as a premium, to be doled out with a bountiful or a niggard hand, on condition of conformity with the faith of the established church. Education is, indeed, one of the highest rights and privileges of a freeman; but I contend that the Legislature is bound to look at it in another point of view. The Legislature is bound to look at it as a precaution for the safety of all classes of the community, — as a precaution with which the poor and ignorant ought to be provided for the security of the rich and enlightened, — as a precaution most peculiarly necessary to be taken here, where society rests on an artificial basis, and is exposed to imminent danger, from the inequality of our social condition. This is a topic on which, for many reasons, I touch with alarm; for I must say it is with deep alarm that I take a view of the present condition of our labouring, manufacturing, and agricultural classes. Sir, when I look upon the precariousness of their condition, and the deep and dark gulf which separates them from their superiors in fortune, — when I look to our ignorance of their influence on society, and to the slight hold which we have on their affections, — it is with unfeigned terror that I observe the wild passions by which they are swayed, and the dense ignorance under which they labour. Look at a great portion of them, immersed in the most lamentable ignorance, and spending in the lowest and most profligate debauchery the few hours they can steal from their daily employment. Among another and yet wider class we may observe the spread of thought yet more pernicious, and the intercommunication of sympathies yet more menacing. Sometimes the murmur of their discontent and ignorance assumes an articulate form, and speaks in the accents of the disciples of Thom, the followers of Stephens, and the millions whose creed is Chartism; for such are the instructors to whom you leave the minds of the people.

[Cries of "Hear, hear, hear!"]

Some learn their religion from a lunatic, in whose resurrection they believe; others are taught that every man has a right to what wages he thinks reasonable, and that he may enforce his right by the dagger and the torch. Others are told that rents and profits are fraudulent deductions from wages; and, consequently, believe that the owners of land and capital are the plunderers and oppressors of the workman. These doctrines advance, unencountered by the morality or the simple political reasoning which would dispel their influence. This bad instruction is allowed to be the only instruction of the poor; while you, the enlightened rulers of this country, whose property and lives will be the first victims of these terrible delusions of the masses, spend in a squabble about creeds the precious time which is rapidly bearing us on to the dark catastrophe of your culpable folly and neglect. And when the Government — the last of civilised Governments — awakes, from its torpid neglect of the minds of the people, and proposes, at length, to send the schoolmaster among these dangerous yet teachable masses; — then come forward the Noble Lord, and the church, and the aristocracy, and the great Conservative party, arrayed in all the panoply of bigotry, and bar its passage with the Thirty-nine Articles!

I will take one practical instance of the evil I have mentioned. A large proportion of the population of Manchester consists of very poor, ignorant, and, I believe I may say, demoralised, Irish Catholics. They are people who not only suffer from the ills of want and precarious employment: they suffer from dense ignorance — they suffer from bad habits of depredation and drinking, and they have introduced, with all its horrors, into England, the peculiar vice of their own country, — that of illicit distillation. Such a community as this menaces property where it exists; and the greater their numbers, the more formidable is the combination. A wise and patriotic Government would make such a body of its people the first objects of its care — would use every endeavour to change their character, by instruction, from dangerous neighbours into good citizens. Their priests tell these people that they must read the Scriptures only in the Douay version. The Noble Lord opposite has found, on examination, some score of passages in which the Douay translation differs from the authorised version of the English church, and therefore refuses to permit the use of the Douay version. What is the result? Education is altogether denied to the unhappy Catholics. What is gained by the refusal? Does it make them a bit more inclined to Protestantism? Does it induce them to read what Protestants consider the true version of the Bible? Does it free them from that priestly influence so much deprecated? On the contrary, it merely rivets their chains more closely, and confirms the authority of their ghostly instructors; they are not induced to read the true version of the Bible, for they are not enabled to read any version at all: entire ignorance is added to the unfortunate nature of their religious opinions. Will any one maintain that the Catholic religion is so corrupting in its influence, that no difference can be perceived between its votaries in one country and those in another? Can any one imagine that the Roman Catholic of Lucerne is not a very superior person, in point of religious and general knowledge, to the Roman Catholic of Spain or Portugal? Are they not as far removed, in the scale of civilisation, as any human beings can well be? And what is the result of that reverence for religion boasted by Gentlemen on the other side? To keep the Catholics of this country in the state of the Spanish and Portuguese, rather than that of the Swiss or Germans, and to afford another illustration of the maxim, "quam parvâ sapientiâ regitur mundus!" The Honourable Member for Kilmarnock, in an ingenious and eloquent argument, has endeavoured to show that there could be no common instruction for people of different religions. This is a mere play on the words "instruction" and "education." Using the word "education" in the sense of wholly bringing up a child, I will concede that it would be a mere abuse of terms to say that there can be a sound scheme of domestic tuition without a basis of religion; but, taking the word "instruction" to signify the communication of knowledge in different branches of art and science, it would be an equal abuse of terms to say that there can be no such instruction unconnected with religion. Every man, in his own walk of life, is perfectly willing to receive or communicate instruction without reference to religion. I studied law in a conveyancer's office, but never thought it necessary to make any inquiry as to his religious opinions; and I believe I may safely say, it is not the custom of law students in general to do so. The most staunch Protestant on the opposite benches, in teaching his daughters music and French, does not think it necessary to proscribe all preceptors who may belong to a different church. I have, indeed, heard that some parents are so scrupulous as to teach their daughters the most villanous Swiss French, in order to have them taught by Protestants; but, much as I may respect this paternal conscientiousness, I hope I may never be subjected to the infliction of hearing those young ladies talk French. It may be said that these are but minor accomplishments; but I maintain that, in this respect, they stand on exactly the same footing as more useful branches of knowledge. The same principle extends to arithmetic, geography, history, and every species of information with which it is important for the poor man to be acquainted. If Gentlemen would attend to the influence of a common education, they would see that it is likely to produce a most desirable change in adding strength to the feelings of mutual charity implanted by nature in the human breast. Is it not enough that the people of this country should be split into so many various sects, taught to keep aloof from each other, and to view one another with jealousy and dislike? Is it not a valuable object to establish a common bond of feeling, by which the asperities of after-life may be softened? If the friends of the Church of England were wise, — and I say this without any fear of infusing suspicion into the minds of the Dissenters, — they would see that community of education must tend to the benefit of the church of the majority. How does it tell among the upper classes, of whom a decided majority belong to the Church of England? It generally turns out that the sons of Dissenters sent to Oxford and Cambridge, where the religion of the established church is that of the majority, conform to the established church. I have not the slightest doubt that the influence of a common education would greatly swell the numbers of the established church; but I must say that it is vain to expect any such wisdom from those who at present direct the counsels of the Church of England. I desire to speak with very great respect of the clergy of the Church of England.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — Oh! — Hear, hear!

Mr. C. BULLER. — I beg to tell my Honourable Friend, who cheers me in that sarcastic way, that, though I do not make many professions on the subject, I have, ever since I took any part in politics, been always sincerely desirous of upholding the Church of England. I have never been an advocate of the voluntary system in this country; therefore I wish that the clergy of the established church should entitle themselves to the respect of the people of England. But I am, with regret, compelled to say, that never, since the time of Sacheverell and the High Church mobs of Queen Anne's days, has the conduct of the clergy been more injudicious and offensive in political matters than it is, now; and never, since the time of Laud, have doctrines been put forward more alarming to the supporters of religious and civil freedom. Gentlemen opposite are in the habit of identifying those on this side of the House with all who promulgate wild or extravagant revolutionary opinions out of doors — with the Chartists, and such enthusiasts. I will not be so unfair to Gentlemen on the other side; but I cannot entirely dissociate them from a party out of the House, by which they are strongly supported, and which is considerable both in numbers and influence. I must couple them with the promulgators of the doctrines lately put forth in the universities. When I look at the tenets of the party which has lately sprung up in Oxford, — when I see that its supporters among the parochial clergy are increasing — that they have invaded the chairs of several professorships in the universities, have got into their hands the education of a great part of the youth of the country, and have many influential friends in this House, — I say that this is a time when it behoves the friends of liberty of conscience, as well as of civil freedom, to watch their proceedings with suspicion and distrust. I will not enter into the discussion of those points on which they have displayed a wonderful leaning towards the church they most revile. I will leave them to settle those points with their new allies, the Wesleyan Methodists.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

I would only beg the sincere adherents of that denomination to look carefully to the proceedings of the leaders who have brought them into such close contact with those who undisguisedly profess the obnoxious doctrines of absolution and penance; and, as if that were not enough, descend to the most absolute puerilities of Catholicism, and cry up the virtues of the sign of the cross! I come, now, to the political tenets which have been put forward by my Honourable Friend the Member for Newark; and all will admit my candour, I trust, in taking for the object of my attack the able work which has emanated from so respectable a source, and endeavouring to excite the reprehension of doctrines supported by a Gentleman of whom I cannot speak without congratulating him, that he, almost alone of his age, has the fearless intrepidity to avow unpopular doctrines, and exhibits an intrepidity also of logic, very little imitated by other Gentlemen on the other side. I would only ask them to look at my Honourable Friend's arguments for his system of religious favouritism, or, rather, religious intolerance, and say whether one additional step, in logic, would not conduct them to persecution. The humanity of my Honourable Friend has caused him to pause before taking that step; but similar meekness, I am afraid, is not to be expected from many of those heated persons with whom he is leagued. How has my Honourable Friend treated the great bulwark of Protestantism — the right of free inquiry and private judgment? My Honourable Friend has made it dwindle away to the right of agreeing with the Church of England in all the doctrines she teaches. I ask the Members of this House — the guardians of religious as well as civil liberty — to look carefully to those doctrines, hostile to freedom and to Protestantism, which are now making such rapid and dangerous progress. If the arguments I have used are not sufficient to induce them to refrain from placing education under the control of the clergy of the establishment, they should, at least, insist on a sufficient guarantee that, in so doing, they be not favouring the propagation of doctrines, than which, I deliberately assert that Papacy, in its worst day, never advanced any more degrading to the human mind, and more inconsistent with human liberty.

Mr. T. D. ACLAND. — After the speech of the Honourable and Learned Member who has just sat down, I may be excused, perhaps, for trespassing a short time on the attention of the House. I am not, however, disposed to follow the Honourable and Learned Member through many points on which he has touched; because, I think that, of all places, the House of Commons is the most unfit to be converted into an arena for theological disputes. On none of the few occasions on which I have addressed the House, have I ever sinned in this respect; and I will not now be led away from the important constitutional and political question before the House, by the temptation of going into such discussions as that to which the Honourable Member for Liskeard has invited us. I would refer the Honourable Member to the intelligent Cornish miners, whom he well knows, and amongst whom is so large a body of Wesleyans, and I beg him to ask them whether the feelings now prevalent among the working classes are to be allayed by the mere influence of intellectual education? That portion of the community are suffering under those evils that are inseparable from the state of transition into which this country has been conducted by the progress of manufactures. I believe that no description of education, dissevered from religion, would be acceptable to the working men of England; and I do not think they will be grateful to those who would involve them in the squabbles of politieal economy, on the plea of extricating them from those squabbles of creeds, which the Honourable Member seems to apprehend as in separable from a strict religious education, — but which are more fairly chargeable on the scheme of the Government. I shall not, however, discuss the merits of that scheme, but confine myself to the motion before the House for an Address to the Crown to revoke the Order of Council appointing the Committee on Education. I believe that the question really involved in the motion before the House is, whether we shall substitute, for the system which exists at present in this country, the principle of a state education? — in other words, whether, ten or twenty years hence, the people of England are to have an established church or a Minister of Public Instruction. Perhaps, however, as the arguments of the Noble Lord the Member for Lancashire, on the law of the question, were dismissed in a somewhat summary way by the Noble Secretary for Ireland, I may be permitted to allude to that point for a moment. I believe no lawyer will deny that some general superintendence over education does still vest in the heads of the church, untouched by the changes which have taken place with the extension of religious liberty. The Act of 1779, by which Protestant Dissenters first obtained permission to keep schools, contains a special limitation forbidding the appointment of Dissenters to endowed schools, unless endowed for the immediate use and benefit of Dissenters since the 1 Will. & Mary. The Act of 1791, extending the same permission to Roman Catholics, is in like manner limited; and since these Acts, namely, in 1795, a decision has been given, in the Court of King's Bench, avowedly on the principle "that keeping of schools is, by the old law of England, of ecclesiastical jurisdiction;" so that the taunts attempted against the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire, for quoting feudal law, are rather misplaced. Nor has the law been changed, by the subsequent extension of religious liberty. The repeal of the Test and Corporation Act does not touch the question; and the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, in a remarkable manner, leaves this principle of the law untouched. It contains this clause: —

Provided also, and be it enacted, that nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to enable any person, otherwise than as they are now by law enabled, to hold, enjoy, or exercise any place or office whatever, and by whatever name it may be called, of, in, or belonging to any of the colleges or halls of the Universities, or the colleges of Eton, Westminster, or Winchester, or any college or schools within this realm.

Then I come to the question, whether there are just grounds for supplanting the church in this general superintendence of education, however limited it may be, to which she is entitled, and delivering it over to a body unknown in the constitution of England? Now, inasmuch as all practical inconvenience to those who dissent from the church has been removed, the advocates of a state education are bound to prove either a necessity arising from neglect or from unreasonable exclusiveness on the part of the church, or at least to show that the object can be much better attained by the direct interference of the state. I will endeavour to show that neither of these positions can be maintained. It is not necessary to enter into details of a date antecedent to this century; but, as Honourable Members opposite are in the habit of speaking as if the initiatory step in the business of education had been taken the other day, I would just observe that those charity schools, which call forth the admiration of every foreigner who visits this country, date as far back as the year 1698,—Archbishop Tennison having founded one of the first of them. Then, again, not to mention the schools established by the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge about the year 1700, we have the Sunday schools, which were first established in 1781, by Mr. Raikes, of Gloucester, and supported by Bishops Barrington and Porteus; and yet arguments are constantly thrown in the faces of Honourable Gentlemen on this side of the House, which seem to proceed on the assumption that the church had never stirred in the education of the people before the year 1837! — at least, such was my understanding of the argument of the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department, who dated the activity of the church from the time of the appearance of his address to his constituents in that year. I do not mean to assert that the church has educated all who are worthy of education at her hands, nor to deny that there is a great deficiency of sound education; but I must say that that deficiency has been much overrated, particularly in the statements which the Honourable Member for Waterford is in the habit of making. Last year, according to the Honourable Member, the proportion educated was one fifteenth of the population; this year, it seems, things have somewhat mended, and the Honourable Member makes it one thirteenth. Now, what is the real state of the facts? The population of Great Britain is about 15,500,000: 1,000,000 poor children are educated under the church; and about 50,000 are educated in the weekly schools of Dissenters. It is stated that there are 750,000 children in dissenting Sunday schools: from these last heads, however, I believe, there is some large deduction to be made for double entries. There are 600,000 other children under education in schools conducted by members of the church, being children of parents above the class of the poor. So that it appears, from parliamentary Returns, that nearly 2,500,000, or something between one sixth and one seventh of the whole population, receive education to a certain extent. But allowing that there may be some inaccuracy in the Returns which I have quoted, I would rest my case, first, on the undoubted and rapid progress which education generally is making under the existing arrangements; and, secondly, on the share which the church has had in promoting this progress. It was stated by Lord Brougham, in his masterly speech in 1820, that the proportion of children receiving education, to the whole population, at the beginning of the century, was 1 to 23; that in 1820 it had increased to 1 to 16; and, I think, after allowing for all deductions, I may safely defy the Honourable Member for Waterford to reduce it, at the present moment, below 1 to 11; but I believe it is considerably higher. As to the share which the church has taken in this progress, I will first take the increase of school room for the poor. Let it be observed that, since 1826, the population has increased 25 per cent. The church educated in that year 550,000 children, and she educates now about 1,000,000; so that the number of poor children educated by the church has doubled since 1826, while the population has only increased 25 per cent. during the same period. But if we take the increase of the schools in union with the National Society, in which it may be assumed, as a general rule, that the most efficient church schools are included, the result is more remarkable. Since 1820, the population has increased 35 per cent.; during the same period, the children in national schools have increased from 200,000 to 597,000,—nearly 200 per cent. And now, I would ask, how are all these schools supported? The Honourable Member for Kilkenny said, the other evening, that the state of the education of the poor was a shame to the church; that the clergy were paid for it, but had really done nothing towards educating the poor. But, from an inspection of the schools built by aid of the late grants, made by direction of the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer, we come to a very different result. We then find that, in 376 schools, assisted by the grants of Parliament, on the recommendation of the National Society, 9381*l.* is paid in salaries, for which the clergy are mainly responsible. If these schools may be taken as a fair sample of church schools generally, the expense of school salaries coming out of the pockets of members of the established church cannot be less than 200,000*l.* And of this I am quite certain,—that, in 420 schools, the expense of salaries so paid is 10,591*l.* a-year;—and I leave the accuracy of the general estimate to be tested by Honourable Members. But I refer the House to a particular case, as stated by an unquestionable authority. At a meeting of the clergy of the diocese of Norwich, the right reverend bishop of the diocese, in the course of some remarks, is reported to have said that more than two thirds of the children of the diocese were educated by the clergy; and that, in the county, out of 1040 schools, he found that no fewer than 900 schools were maintained, supported, and attended solely by the reverend gentlemen around him; and the right reverend prelate declared his happiness in recording that fact.

I now come to the question of training masters, and am quite ready to admit that there is great room for improvement in this respect; but I am not less certain that the church has laboured anxiously to effect such an improvement: certainly, after the speech of the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire, the Government cannot venture to charge the church with delay on this point: but I must remind the Right Honourable Chancellor of the Exchequer, that he has never explained his assertion made in the debate on the 14th of June,—that the 10,000*l.* of the grant set aside for model schools had not been appropriated, because neither of the societies had asked for it. It will not now be denied that an application was made, in 1835, by the National School Society; and this House has never been informed on what grounds it was refused. It may be that the Right Honourable Gentleman had, in 1835, some vision of the normal schools of 1839; but certainly that application was made, and repeated, without success. Meanwhile, the church has set its own plans on foot; and a house has been engaged for the purpose in London. And with regard to the country, I am glad that the Honourable and Learned Member for Liskeard has witnessed the exertions that have been there made. Diocesan and training schools the church will have, whether aided by the Government, or not,—and they will be established on a far better principle than that which allows the children to be herded together in large numbers in the metropolis. These schools will be conducted on a far better principle; and on this ground I hope we shall have the support of the Honourable and Learned Member for Liskeard in our endeavours to render them what we desire, and what they ought to be,—the centre of an effective system of machinery for communicating instruction to the people of this country in those principles which are consonant with the views of that church to which the people of England are indelibly attached. I feel that I am unable to treat this important matter as it deserves; but I would beg leave to make one suggestion to those members of the Government who feel an interest in the improvement of masters and teachers of schools. I believe they are quite right in turning their intentions, in the first instance, to this point, but wrong in the course they have taken for the attainment of their object. If the Government, instead of attempting to take the education of masters into their own hands, which has led to all our present angry discussions on religious grounds, would consider the claims of those who have spent the greater part of their lives as teachers, they might, with very little difficulty, enable the different societies to obtain masters in every way competent to the required duties; and, by thus giving the help of Government, without interfering in the conduct of the school, would render greater service, without raising equal difficulties on account of religious differences.

Now, a word with regard to the subject of inspection. Last year, the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer directed an inspection to be made of the schools of the two societies; but the British and Foreign Society refused to undertake the inspection proposed; and I think that refusal will be best explained by a memorial that was laid before the Treasury by the society. But there is one fact connected with the subject of this inspection to which I would call attention, as illustrative of the impartiality of the Government. The Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer has granted 500*l.* to each of the two societies, — the National and the British and Foreign, — the first of which has received aid for 425 schools, the other for 117. Now, if 500*l.* be a proper grant for that society, which had to inspect 117 schools, then, in the same proportion, 1800*l.* ought to have been given to the other society, which had to inspect 425 schools. Application was made to the Right Honourable Gentleman, on the part of the National Society, to have the grant enlarged; but the request was refused. I have inquired into what the cost of the inspection has been to the society; and I find that it is estimated, on an average of three cases, that 1220*l.* will have been expended under that head, — and that sum includes no allowance for the parties who conducted the inspection: I believe it does include five guineas paid to an experienced schoolmaster, who visited and reported upon twenty schools, which would amount for the whole to 100*l.* The Honourable and Learned Member for Liskeard has said that the church has no machinery for education, and that all she does is done by means of voluntary associations. Now, that the National Society is a voluntary body is true, literally, but not practically; for it contains in it, by charter, the whole bench of bishops. I had wished to abstain from alluding to exertions which have taken place only during the last year; but I must state, in answer to the Honourable Member's remark, that, by means of the existing machinery, sixteen diocesan boards of education have been established for most important purposes, and eighty subordinate ecclesiastical districts been regularly organised, during one year. I am not without hope that the people will find, in their future happiness, as I am sure that they do in their earthly comforts, that the church has a machinery suitable for education, which she is doing her best to put in motion.

There is another point to which I would wish to advert. The church has been charged by the Honourable Member for Lambeth, and in no very measured terms, with exclusiveness in matters of education. He accused the church of shutting the doors of the schools on Dissenters. Now, in reply to that charge, I will recommend the Honourable Member to cross the Thames from Lambeth to Westminster, — the population of which has, of late years, increased from 8000 to 28,000; the number of schools has increased in proportion, and the children instructed therein, from 286 to 1646; — and he will find, in the Sunday schools, that out of 600 children, there are 22 Roman Catholics, and 40 Dissenters of other sects; and in the weekly and other infant schools, 45 Roman Catholics, and 50 dissenting children, receiving instruction.

I think, Sir, I have now shown that, if the church be, as I have maintained, intrusted by the constitution with the general superintendence of any system of national education, she has not, by unreasonable exclusiveness or neglect, in increasing the number of schools, or in improving the schoolmasters, or on any other ground, forfeited the trust so reposed in her; and that, consequently, no necessity has arisen for the adoption of such a scheme as that now proposed. Then we are bound to consider what are the grounds for the argument of expediency on which you propose to introduce a system of education, under the direct and immediate control of the House of Commons, to be executed by a board whose duty it will be to reflect the will of the House of Commons from year to year, or, as we have lately seen, from month to month. Perhaps we may be told that, by taking the education of the people from the hands of the church, and placing it in those of a Central Board, appointed by the state, security would be given for the extension and permanency of education. This appears to me to be a fallacy; for, supposing the economists of the day should be of the same opinion as Mr. Cobbett expressed when Lord Althorp introduced the system which is now to be abandoned, and say that they did not see the use of education, and refuse a vote of the House on its behalf, — thus you would at once take away all its support,—and its permanency would be at an end. Another argument proceeds on the advantage of uniformity of system. Now, I very much doubt whether, if you succeed, under the proposed general board, in bringing it to bear on the schools, you will ever obtain that uniformity and general good action which you appear to expect; but of this I am sure,—that if you do, it will be a great evil, and that far more good would result from the emulation of various bodies making voluntary efforts on plans somewhat different from each other. It has been stated that the control system of state education has succeeded in Prussia and in Holland. I must, however, beg leave to deny that fact. In Prussia, there is no such thing as a united system of education of various sects,—the church being always intimately connected with the schools;—so that, as a mixed system, the case is directly against you. And upon this subject I will just refer to the remarks of a profound philosopher of Germany, Professor Thiersch, who says, after visiting the normal school at Kaiserlautern, in Rhenish Bavaria, which is open to all denominations,—

The experience of other countries shows us that when seminaries are divided according to religious persuasions, peace is preserved both among teachers and communities; indeed, this happens the more completely any confession is allowed to follow its own course in supplying its real wants. Of these, one of the chief is the training of those to whom the care of elementary schools is intrusted; and the fact that this end cannot be attained without their being firmly rooted in the sentiments of a Christian confession, is a sufficient reason for dividing seminaries according to confessions, as is done in Nassau, Prussia, and elsewhere.

With regard to Holland, it is quite true that in the Batavian republic, under French influence, all systems of religion were put upon the same footing, and a system of education was devised in which all religious sects participated by the exclusion of all special religions. But in Holland, no one can teach in a school without a licence, and that licence it is extremely difficult to obtain. In England, the keeping of a school is free for all. In Holland, also, there is no vent for religious animosity,—which is not the case in this country. All these circumstances may tend to fit such a system for Holland, or to make it appear to succeed, though it might be very unfit for this country. But I know that this system has not given satisfaction in Holland. A sect called the "Separatists" has sprung up in opposition to the united system of education; and I am informed that a member of the Government, high in office, has resigned his situation in consequence of his objections to it.

[Loud cries of "Question!" and, "Order!"]

I will quote the authority of Mr. Brougham, in 1818, on the expediency of the direct interference of the state in the control of education: and let it be remembered that he was proposing a system of general education for the whole country. He proposed that the bishops should visit the schools, by themselves, their archdeacons, or chancellors; and that the visitor should have the power to remove masters, who might make their appeal, not to an educational board of laymen, but to the metropolitan. The visitor was to decide privately; and why? because, by the ancient law, he was privileged so to do; and in such a matter he considered it dangerous to innovate without absolute necessity. This was the system proposed by Mr. Brougham in 1818, as calculated to promote a sound and useful education.

[Loud cries of "Divide!" and, "Order!"]

Now, Sir, if neither the necessity nor the expediency of a state education can be established, what is the ground for departing from the present plan of giving assistance in proportion to voluntary exertion? The church has never set up an exclusive claim, nor objected to the grant, as proposed by Lord Grey's Government. But the British and Foreign Society, in their unparalleled memorial of the 14th of April, have perhaps disclosed the real origin of the Government plan. It seems that this comprehensive—this non-exclusive—society, finding they could not, on equal terms, obtain as large a share of public money as they wished, have actually set up a claim that their own system should, alone, be adopted, and that the only plan which could be satisfactory "would be one which should positively exclude, from all schools aided by Parliament, the formularies of any particular church:" it is they, too, who urge, "as preliminary to every other measure, the establishment of a Board of Education." Into the particular scheme proposed by the Government board I will not enter, because it has been more ably exposed by others, and because I wish to confine myself to the motion of the Noble Lord relating to the principle of establishing such a board at all. Meanwhile, I contend that the national church is the only authorised constitutional educator of the nation, as a whole; that, as the law now stands, it does not trench on the liberties of any class; and that, substantially, all restrictions upon education are removed. If any measure can be brought forward to meet the wants of particular classes, which does not directly contradict the principle of an established church, — if it be honestly intended to remedy a practical evil, and not merely for the sake of introducing a principle, — it will meet with candid consideration. I wish to see the subject dealt with practically. Let the plan, therefore, be distinctly stated; let the discretion of the Government be clearly defined, and its powers limited. This, however, I will say;—that I cannot consent to any plan which shall give the full sanction of the state to sectarian schools, — schools, I mean, under the direct superintendence of ministers of religious bodies avowedly hostile to the church, whether Roman Catholic, Unitarian, or Baptist: nor, on the other hand, can I consent to a plan which shall lay down the permanent separation of secular from religious instruction, as the basis of national education. Whether, between these limits, a better arrangement than the present can be devised, I cannot take upon me to determine. If you have such a plan, then, instead of asking us to place unlimited powers in the hands of Government, let its principles be openly avowed and fairly discussed; and then, but not till then, will this House believe — will the constituency of the country believe — that you are only actuated by a desire to improve the religious, the moral, and the intellectual condition of the people; and you will deserve and receive the support of all reasonable men.

Dr. LUSHINGTON. — Sir, the question now under discussion, in the form and manner in which it has been stated by various Honourable Members of this House, is not of a temporary interest, whatever may be the conclusion to which the House shall now come, upon it; for it has been discussed on great and important principles, — and by the determination arrived at, the nation must be guided. Sir, I, for one, rejoice in this discussion; I, for one, thank the Noble Member for North Lancashire (Lord Stanley) for having brought forward his motion.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

Yes; I thank him for having given an opportunity to the House to discuss this great and important question in all its bearings, and for bringing forward before the nation the highly important matter of deciding whether or not we are to have a national education? and if so, in what form, in what shape, and under what limitations? I thank the Noble Lord for another and not unimportant feature in this debate, because another Noble Lord who followed him — I mean the Member for the county of Dorset (Lord Ashley)— has promulgated the truth of this great proposition, — namely, that the education of the people is — to their interest here, and to their happiness hereafter — of the greatest consequence. I rejoice in that sentiment, because such was not, formerly, the language employed on that side of the House. I can well recollect when we were laughed to scorn, because we urged, for the lower orders of this country, their right of being educated to the highest pitch that the country could afford. I remember when it was argued in this House, that to communicate knowledge to the people would be to bring down the greatest and most alarming evils upon the country. But that day is gone by; and how stands the case now? Why, I have it conceded to me by the Noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire, that education is of the last importance to insure the happiness and comfort of the people here, and their salvation hereafter. I come, then, to this conclusion, that it is the duty of the state to confer the benefit, and that it is the right of the subject to have it.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

Well, if you admit the principle, can you deny me the consequence? If it be the duty of the state to educate, if it be the right of the people to claim education, then I ask you to tell me upon what principle it is, — upon what pretence of justice or expediency, — that you draw the line of exclusion as to any one sect or religion? Then say I to you, "Who has given you the power to take away that right which you have conceded to the public? What has enabled you to abandon a duty which I contend to be universal and without exception?" This is the doctrine which I will avow in this House. The Honourable Member who last addressed the House has denied the truth of that doctrine; the Noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire has impugned the truth of that doctrine. I seek the truth. I am deeply interested in education in this country, and deeply concerned for it, in the colonies. Let us seek the truth, and let it go forth to the people. I care not if I be not supported by one voice, so that I promulgate what I believe to be important truths. I believe that there is upon this subject of education a great diversity of opinion throughout the country. I believe, further, that the apparent uniformity amongst the parties whose feelings are represented by the Honourable Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House has, in a great measure, been obtained by the grossest and falsest misrepresentations.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!"]

I am led irresistibly to this conclusion, when I see the plan suggested by the Government paraded through the streets as a "Popery" and "infidelity" scheme. When I see such steps taken to create a prejudice against the proposition, I feel myself entitled to say that the people of England have been imposed upon.

[Cries of "Oh!" and, "Hear!"]

The two Noble Lords (Lord Stanley and Lord Ashley), although they differ in some very important particulars, are both agreed upon one point. I have heard, from both, the highest encomiums upon one great and respectable body, — separated from the Church of England, as I am told, by very narrow limits;—I mean the body of Wesleyan Dissenters. I, too, hold that body in great respect; I admit the weight which must attach to any opinions emanating from so large and respectable a religious sect; but if I find them putting forward sentiments which I consider to be utterly inconsistent with truth and justice, I hold it to be my duty to express my disapprobation of those sentiments. I find, from a statement put forth by the Wesleyan Methodists, that they look upon the Government proposition as one involving a violation of conscience. What is the meaning of that statement? It means one thing, or it means nothing: it means that you may take money from the pocket of the Roman Catholic to maintain a Protestant establishment, but that the Roman Catholic shall be denied the slightest participation in the benefits to be derived from that establishment.

If, then, the plan be objectionable as applied to the Dissenters, it is ten thousand times more objectionable as applied to the Roman Catholics. If it be in direct violation of the consciences of the Protestant Dissenters to be compelled to contribute to an exclusive plan, it is ten thousand times more a violation of the conscience of the Roman Catholics. The Honourable Gentleman opposite admits that education is necessary for the advancement of the welfare and happiness of the people, here and hereafter. Yet he would exclude the Roman Catholic from every participation in the advantage of education,—leaving him in the very ignorance which he admits to be the parent of crime and misery here, and of unhappiness eternal, hereafter. If the principle be worth any thing, it will go the whole length, without exception of any one species of religious dissent. I shelter myself under no ambiguity. I hold the right principle to be this,—that no man is a judge for another as to what is truth. A Noble Lord has asked, and asked truly, "Can a Protestant of the Church of England ask what is truth?" He never can. He who belongs to the Church of England must be supposed to be convinced of the truth of its doctrine. But what right have I to say that that which appears to me to be true must necessarily appear to others to be true? If I am in a minority upon the present occasion, I shall not therefore despair of one day seeing my principles adopted and carried out into execution. I have fought more hopeless battles in this House, and have lived to triumph. I will never despair in a good cause.

I will now offer a word on another topic. It is impossible that I should speak with disrespect of the established church: I do not disavow its recent exertions in the cause of education: I think that the church has awakened from its long sleep, and is now really zealous in the cause of education; but I cannot agree in the doctrine laid down by the Honourable Gentleman opposite, that the established church in this country has an exclusive right or control over the education of the people. I am aware that such a power was claimed in the time of James I., and that, in the beginning of that reign, an Act was passed prohibiting private schools from being kept without a licence from the bishop. That continued, down to the reign of George III., when Dissenters, for the first time, were permitted to keep schools. Up to that period they were, in fact, prohibited from doing so; but even this prohibition was exceeded in bigotry and intolerance by that Act—a disgrace to our statute-book—whereby a Catholic teacher could not instruct a Catholic without subjecting himself to the penalty of perpetual imprisonment. Could intolerance go much further? The Church of England has control over the education in the grammar schools—and very properly,—because they were all established under the Church of England; and, by the terms of their foundation, were specially exempted from the effects of all statutes to the contrary. Let it not be supposed, for a moment, that I am disposed to remove the control of that church over the religious education of the people who belong to it; that would be to fall into the sin which I condemn in others: but I will not admit that the proposed plan of education should be abandoned, because it cannot be reconciled to the claims of the Church of England. It is said that, by combined education, you are taking away from the Church of England, and adding to Socinianism and Popery. But, in point of fact, the plan, as proposed by the Government, does not interfere with any school now in existence; and yet, notwithstanding this, it has been held up to the country, through the press and other sources, as tending directly to support and encourage Popery and Socinianism, and to injure the Church of England; whereas, in fact, all that is sought is, the establishment of normal and model schools, — the want of which has not been denied by any. Was not one of the conditions of the application of the plan, that the schools, whatever might be the number of pupils, should be under the inspection of a chaplain of the Church of England? But it has been said that the education is promiscuous. That is not the case. The education is general and special: general instruction, such as might be given in the schools without offence to the consciences of any; and special education,—that which would be given as to religion, and which is to be strictly confined to those who profess religious principles different from those of the established church. And I put it to the Noble Lord, to the House, and to the country, whether it is just to denounce the Government plan as leading to the introduction of Popery and spread of infidelity, merely because it gives to the children of each religious class — to Churchmen, Catholics, and Dissenters — separate and adequate religious instruction, each at a separate time, and totally apart from other interference? The Government scheme has been exposed to the grossest misrepresentations upon this part of the question. It has been said that the Roman Catholic version of the Bible was to be read by Protestant children, and that their infant minds would be corrupted by coming into early collision with papistical and other unsound religious opinions. Nothing could be more unjust, or less in conformity with the principle and basis of the scheme. Other parts of the plan have been denounced by Honourable Members as despotic and tyrannical. Let them consider whether there are any grounds for such aspersions. One distinct feature of the plan is, that of inspection. And the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire has agreed that, when the money of the state is to be given for education, the principle of inspection is not objectionable; and I believe that the Noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire entertains something like identity of sentiment in that respect. Then what objection to the appointment of inspectors by the Government? Is it meant to be said that the inspectors would interfere with the duties of the clergy of the Church of England? Nothing can be more unwarranted.

I wish to make a single remark upon another point. It has been argued that the church has shown great liberality by consenting to allow a portion of the public money to be given to the British and Foreign School Society; — that the church has conceded so far, — she has given way to that extent, although it was a departure from her principles. But why did the church give way in that single step? Why concede anything that can be considered as a departure from a principle which ought to be maintained? Where can it be shown, in the constitutional history of the country, that the British and Foreign School Society is to be the impenetrable line of demarcation? There are thousands of schools conducted on the mixed principles of the National School Society and the British and Foreign School Society; and would you exclude those other schools, which are more favourable to the church than the latter? I think the Executive might be safely left with discretionary power in that respect; and I have every confidence that the Government, of whatever party they might be, would administer the grant fairly and impartially for the public good. The Honourable Member for Kilmarnock has talked of loose representations having been advanced as to the state of education in parts of the metropolis. I should like to know where he acquired his information? What has given him any pretence for such an assertion? The statements on that subject, which he impeaches, are the results of careful inquiry made by the Central Society for Education under the direction of Mr. Fowell Buxton, and have been sifted, for accuracy, in three different ways. In the district of Spitalfields, and within a radius of two miles, there are 10,000 children destitute of every kind of education, and there are no means available by which their ignorance can be removed. I would press this lamentable state of things upon the attention of the House, because destitution and ignorance here go together, and the evils of penury are aggravated by the entire want of education. The more such penury exists, the more it is the duty of the House to appropriate the funds of the country to supply the deficiency: and one of the best features in the plan of the Government is, that it provides means of doing so, by giving the proposed board of education a discretionary power to apply part of the public grant in quarters where aid is most required on account of the poverty of the inhabitants. I am not afraid of defeat; but of this I am convinced, — that if the House should declare to the country that they have resolved to act upon a principle of exclusion, — that they are determined to refuse essential aid to the education of the people in proportion to their contributions to the establishment, and to their wants and numbers,—it will be taken as a declaration of hostility against the great body of the community, and can only be viewed as a determination to condemn them to a continuance in that deplorable state of ignorance from which it should be our first duty to extricate them.

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

Mr. BROTHERTON. — I move that this debate be now adjourned.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I shall not object to the adjournment till to-morrow, as I understand there are several Honourable Members, who are anxious to take part in the debate, who have not yet delivered their sentiments.

Motion put, and agreed to. Debate further adjourned till to-morrow.

place, I am anxious that he should name a day for the second reading; for, inasmuch as the measure imposes an additional charge on the county rates, I now beg to inform my Noble Friend, that whenever the second reading is moved, I shall propose that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

LORD COLBORNE. — I will move the second reading on Monday, or any other convenient day.

LORD BROUGHAM. — A very important Bill — the Education Bill — stands for Monday.

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — Whenever the second reading comes on, I certainly shall oppose the Bill, because I find that, year after year, additional charges are saddled on the county rates.

LORD COLBORNE. — Say Tuesday for the second reading.

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — I should prefer Thursday.

The EARL of RIPON. — On Thursday I shall bring forward my motion relative to Malta.

The Bill was then ordered to be read a second time on Tuesday next.

EDUCATION (NATIONAL).

The BISHOP of SALISBURY, the BISHOP of GLOUCESTER, and the BISHOP of LONDON presented petitions against the plan recommended by the Privy Council, — of the Chancellor and Clergy of the Archdeaconry and Deanery of Carlisle: of Clergy of the Archdeaconry of Sarum; and Gloucester: of Clergy of the Deanery of Cumberland; and Westmoreland: of the minister and inhabitants of Egham: of the minister and members of the congregation of Fitzroy Episcopal chapel, Saint Pancras: and of inhabitants of Ruskington; Caynham; Stourpaine and Steepleton; Lyndon; Wanstead; Takeley; East Ham; St. John the Baptist and St. Aldgate, Gloucester; Great and Little Ilford; Ashbourne; Dagenham; Tarrant Gunville; Ashmore; Welton; St. George, Hanover Square; Nafferton; Hatfield Broadoak; Charmouth; Campden; Ryme Intrinseca and Hermitage; Barking; Leyton; Stow on the Wold; and Wrington. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

ber of Commerce of Newcastle on Tyne, praying for the adoption of some measure for establishing the freedom of commerce between Great Britain and Circassia. — Read, and ordered to be received as the petition of M. Plummer (the chairman), who, only, has signed it.

JAMAICA BILL.

Brought from the Commons; read a first time; to be printed, and to be read a second time on Friday, the 18th instant, and the Lords summoned.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.

The BISHOP of GLOUCESTER presented a petition for inquiry relative to the studies and discipline of the college, — of inhabitants of Colchester. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

ROMAN CATHOLIC RELIEF BILL.

The EARL of WINCHILSEA. — My Lords, I beg to give notice that I shall, to-morrow, present a petition which has been intrusted to me on a subject of great importance. It is signed by 3000 persons, and prays for a repeal of the Roman Catholic Relief Bill of 1829.

CORN LAWS.

LORD BROUGHAM. — My Lords, I hold in my hand a petition from certain inhabitants of the town of Cambridge, complaining that, on a late occasion, a Mr. Smith and a Mr. Shearman, having attended at the theatre, in that borough, to deliver lectures on the subject of the Corn Laws, were, together with the auditory, subjected to a very brutal attack, on the part of certain undergraduates and members of the university, by which their lectures were interrupted, and finally put a stop to by main force. The petitioners state that, to their great astonishment, they find that no steps have been since taken by the authorities of the university to punish the parties who were guilty of this breach of the peace. They therefore pray your Lordships to take the subject of the corn laws into consideration, and also to adopt such means as may be necessary for the good governing of the University of Cambridge, and such as shall enable the inhabitants of that borough to enjoy, uninterruptedly, the great and undoubted right of free discussion. These are high matters, no doubt; but academical discipline is a subject which I do not understand.

Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

TURNPIKE ROADS.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I beg leave to present a petition signed by seven individuals, who are creditors under the Manchester and Buxton Turnpike Road Act, and who are interested to no less an amount than 51,000*l.*, invested in turnpike trust securities. They complain that, in consequence of the multiplication of railways, they receive scarcely any return for their money, and they pray the House to adopt some measure for their relief and protection. There are upwards of 7,000,000*l.* of money embarked, it seems, in these trusts; and, as the subject is of deep importance to those who have thus advanced their capital, I shall draw your Lordships' attention to it at a future period.

Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

EDUCATION (NATIONAL).

LORD BROUGHAM presented petitions in favour of national education free from all religious distinctions, — of inhabitants of the city of Chichester; and Towcester. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Also, petitions of inhabitants of Saint James's, Clerkenwell: of the Westminster Reform Society: and of the Bridgewater Protector Society. — Read, and ordered to be received as the petitions of the chairmen, who, only, have signed them.

Also, petitions in favour of the plan recommended by the Privy Council, — of members of the Plymouth congregation of Unitarian Christians; of members of a Baptist congregation and other inhabitants of Southampton; and of inhabitants of Bath. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CHURCH AND STATE.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I beg leave to present a petition from landholders of Blackrath, complaining of the many evils which have been brought on the country by the established church, and they pray — and I was startled when I saw the prayer, for I, at first, thought it was that the church itself should be abated; but they do not go that far, they content themselves with saying they think it fit — "that the fatal alliance between church and state may be dissolved."

Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

JAMAICA BILL.

On moving the first reading of this Bill, —

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY said: — I should wish to fix the second reading for some early day in the next week, and to reserve the discussion on the principle to the question of going into the committee, which, in that case, I would fix for Friday, if it should meet the wish of your Lordships. I should be glad to name an early day for the second reading, as I am anxious that the House should come to a decision on the principle of the Bill.

The EARL of HAREWOOD. — As I have a very important petition to present against the Bill, I am anxious to have the opportunity afforded to me of doing so before the Bill shall have passed through another stage.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON. — Some delay will be necessary, moreover, as it is probable that counsel will desire to be heard against the Bill.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — Then I will fix the second reading for to-morrow week.

The Bill was thereupon read a first time; ordered to be printed, and to be read a second time on Friday, the 28th instant, and the Lords summoned.

RULES OF PROCEEDINGS (BOROUGH COURTS) (No. 2.) BILL.

Read a third time (according to order), passed, and sent to the Commons.

WINDSOR CASTLE STABLES BILL.

On the Order of the Day for the second reading of this Bill being read, —

LORD ASHBURTON said: — I cannot allow this Bill to be read a second time, without stating that I consider it very likely to deteriorate the property of the Crown; for it authorises the Commissioners of her Majesty's Woods and Forests to apply the sum of 70,000*l.* "out of the revenues that have already arisen, or may hereafter arise," from the sale of portions of the lands of the Crown. Why, I will ask, should not the repairs be taken out of the actual revenue of the Crown, without alienating part of the Crown lands, which are the capital, and not the income? You might as well, at once, sell or alienate part of the Crown lands for the building or repair of Windsor Castle, as for the erection of these stables.

VISCOUNT DUNCANNON. — This principle is not a new one, for it has been acted upon for the last twenty years. Thus, as to the improvements in the Strand, and in the rebuilding of Buckingham Palace, the greater portion of the expense of these was defrayed by the produce of the sale of Crown property; — that is to say, part of the capital of the Crown estates.

The EARL of RIPON. — I do not recollect that any moneys arising out of the sale of lands by the commissioners have ever been applied in the manner mentioned by my Noble Friend (Viscount Duncannon); but, as the sums required for the purposes stated were very great, — greater, perhaps, than the whole annual income of the Crown lands, — the fact probably was so. What I wish to know from my Noble Friend is, whether the annual income of the Crown estates is so charged with debts, from former or present improvements of Crown property, as to be unable to bear this additional 70,000*l.* for the erection of stables at Windsor? and whether, in consequence, it has become necessary to raise the money by the sale of certain further portions of the Crown lands? If the proposed sum is to be taken out of the general revenue of the Crown lands, the objection of my Noble Friend near me will not apply. The whole income of the Crown lands is about 240,000*l.* a-year. Am I to understand from my Noble Friend (Viscount Duncannon) that this income is already so charged as to be unable to meet the expense of these stables at Windsor?

VISCOUNT DUNCANNON. — Debts to a very considerable amount have accrued on the revenue of the Crown for the improvements in the Strand, in the opening or approach near Waterloo Bridge, and in the alterations at Buckingham Palace. These, however, have now been all, or nearly all, paid off, and there is, at present, a surplus revenue of about 140,000*l.*

The EARL of RIPON. — I think that the expenses of the erection of the stables

at Windsor ought to be paid out of that income, and not out of the produce of the sale of any part of the Crown lands.

VISCOUNT DUNCANNON. — I do not see why any lands should be sold for this particular purpose; but Noble Lords should consider that it does not follow that, because sales of some portions of Crown lands take place, there is, therefore, a deterioration of Crown property; for certain portions are sold for the purpose of investing the produce in the purchase of other property, which is considered more advantageous, and many of those sales have produced great improvement in the Crown property, — for instance, the purchase of some land at Pimlico; and the site for the stables at Windsor will be a considerable improvement to the Crown estates.

LORD ASHBURTON. — I still cannot see why the property of the Crown should be sold, while there exists an income from those lands sufficient for the expense required for the stables at Windsor. The Crown has only a life interest in those estates, and nothing should be done to deteriorate their value.

VISCOUNT DUNCANNON. — I repeat that the course pursued by the commissioners is one which goes to improve the property of the Crown, by selling, as I said, some portions for the purpose of purchasing others, more advantageously situated. The Crown will not be a loser by this operation.

LORD BROUGHAM. — The sale of any portion of the capital of the Crown estates will be a diminution of the interest which that capital will produce before it is reinvested. If there be not income enough, why not raise the sum required by loan?

The EARL of RIPON. — I am perfectly satisfied with the explanation of my Noble Friend: if property of one kind belonging to the Crown be sold for the purpose of purchasing that which is more advantageously situated, the Crown, certainly, cannot be the loser by it.

The Bill was then read a second time, and committed to a committee of the whole House to-morrow.

ASSIGNMENT OF ECCLESIASTICAL DISTRICTS.

The BISHOP of LONDON presented a Bill "to make better Provision for the Assignment of Ecclesiastical Districts to Churches or Chapels augmented by the Governors of the Bounty of Queen Anne, and for other Purposes." — Read a first time, and to be printed.

SUPPLY — NATIONAL EDUCATION.

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on amendment proposed to be made to motion (14th of June).

Mr. D'ISRAELI. — After the able speeches which have been already delivered, I am afraid I shall find a difficulty in recalling the attention of the House to the important question before it. I feel, too, that the disadvantages under which I always labour in addressing the House are increased, in the present instance, by following in the train of those who, on both sides of the House, have treated this subject with singular temper and ability.

Digitized by Google

But the great interest which I have always taken in this question, and the sincere conviction which I entertain that the determination to which this House may come must have a vast and incalculable influence on the character of the people, and, indeed, on the prospects of the country, have induced—nay, have almost compelled—me, to trespass upon the patience of the House. The Honourable Member for Waterford, in the able and temperate speech with which he last night opened this debate, laid it down as an indisputable proposition that the only efficient settlement of this great question will be by placing the education of the people in the hands of the state, by means of what he termed central organisation. The simple meaning of his speech, certainly, was, that education should be carried on under the superintendence, the interference, and the control of the state. I admit that this theory is specious; but I doubt whether it is authorised and supported by facts, and whether it is consonant with the experience of this country. I find this theory in the writings, as well as the speeches, of the Honourable Gentleman, and likewise in the papers of the society of which he is president; but when I come to examine into facts, I find that education does not owe much to the interference of the state. It appears to me that the state has done little or nothing, and that nearly all that has been done has been effected by public aid, and by individual enterprise. It has been remarked by a foreign writer, that the state in this country has not formed a single road, built a single bridge, or dug a single canal. The statesmen who preceded the present generation always acted on a system diametrically opposed to that of the Honourable Gentleman opposite:—they always held that society should be strong, and the state weak; and that to diminish the duties of the citizen was to peril the rights of the subject. To this principle do I ascribe the realisation, in this country, of the two greatest blessings of social life,—liberty and order. A despotic government may insure order; a republic may afford liberty: but the combination of liberty and of order—order not disturbed by national injustice, and liberty not disturbed by popular outrage—has been realised in England alone. I take it for granted that the Honourable Gentleman, the President of the Central Society of Education,—ready to do justice to the character of the people of this country,—will acknowledge that independence, self-reliance, caution, and enterprise form their chief characteristics.

I ask, then, to what is to be ascribed this quality of happy social order, except to that system of self-government which has always characterised England? It therefore becomes the House well to consider what effect a system of centralisation would have on the habits of the people of England. It seems to me, that the Central Society of Education, and that school of philosophers which is distinguished by great activity and great intelligence, are, with all their vaunted philosophy, learning, and enlightenment, fast returning to that system of society which is an indication of a barbarous age, but which has gained for itself the epithet of "paternal." Wherever we find a paternal government, we find a state education. The best way to insure implicit obedience is to commence tyranny in the nursery. There is a country in which education is the only qualification for office,—a country which will square with all the notions of the Honourable Gentleman, the President of the Central Society of Education,—which may be a kind of normal school or perfect pattern for this country; and that country is—China. Indeed, paternal governments are to be found in the East rather than in the West; they exist in countries where the rule is arbitrary, rather than in countries where there are free institutions. If the Honourable Gentleman, the President of the Central Society, were to ask me for the most perfect programme of national education,—if he were to ask me to point out a system at once the most profound, the most liberal, and the most comprehensive,—I would give the Honourable Gentleman for answer, the system at present prevalent in Persia. If we leave China and Persia, and come to Europe, where do we find the most perfect systems of national education? Why, under the paternal government of Austria,—the China of Europe; and under the paternal government of Prussia,—the equivalent of Persia. Where everything is left to the Government, the subject must become a machine. I oppose the system to which the proposition of the Noble Lord leads, therefore, on account of its tendency to injure our national character. The President of the Central Society for Education, and the school of philosophers to which he belongs, believe that the highest central organisation may yet be combined with the freest political institutions; but it is a fallacy to suppose—though it be one which has found a sanction in the writings of the Abbé Sieyes, in France—that all virtue is owing to political institutions, and none to national character. I hold it to be an indisputable truth, that the freest political institutions may exist in a country in which the people are enslaved. We may have a Parliament freely chosen; but if the electors be corrupt, that Parliament can exercise — as such a Parliament has exercised — a most grinding tyranny. I will take the instance of trial by jury, — the great bulwark of our liberties, the great guarantee of our rights. Of what use would that great and glorious institution be, where the twelve jurymen were base men? There have been times when the trial by jury was infinitely worse than the Inquisition in its darkest days. We had trial by jury in the same age with Titus Oates. I will take a period, distant, yet not very remote — not the age of bigoted barbarians, — by which name the Honourable Member for Liskeard designated the councillors of the conqueror of Agincourt, — but a period which produced men who were enlightened in every sense, — men who might well be called English worthies; — I will take the age which produced Pym and Hampden, Selden and Wentworth, — those truly English spirits: yet who would suppose that the Parliament, which was adorned by such men, could, in less than a quarter of a century, have sunk into the most degraded and most ignoble tyranny which ever sported with the destinies of a great country? But what took place during that time? The national spirit was destroyed; a great system of central organisation was established in the realm; the people had free institutions; — but their rights as subjects were destroyed. I know I shall be told that these observations are too general. I know the reluctance with which Honourable Members go back to first principles. We are practical men; but practical men, looking to the experience of the last ten or twelve years, — practical men in an age of revolution.

With respect to the state of education among the people of this country, there are many circumstances of a complicated character which must be taken into consideration before a decided opinion can be pronounced upon the subject; and we should recollect, that although the general state of education may not at present be all that we can desire, still that it may be as much advanced and improved in a quarter of a century as can possibly be effected by human means. But the question is not, whether the state of education be good or bad? but, to what power it shall be intrusted? We are not called upon to decide whether education shall be orthodox or latitudinarian, highly spiritual or purely moral? but, — "whose shall be the hands to which it shall be confided?" I am an advocate for national education; but it does not follow that I must also be an advocate for state education. There is a great distinction between the two. The object of the speech of the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire seems to me to be, to point out the necessity for national education, and to show that it ought not to be intrusted to the state. The Honourable and Learned Member for Liskeard, whom I regret not to see in his place, has detected a very covert meaning in the speech of the Noble Lord; but I am sure that it must have required the exercise of all that diplomatic experience which the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has so recently acquired, to discover any sinister or subterraneous meaning in that speech. I listened to the speech of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, myself, in the hope, if not of being instructed, of being at least amused, and I have often been both instructed and amused by him; but, in this instance, I could not discover what connection the speech of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman had with the question before the House. I confess I was at a loss, for some time, to discover the object in view, until, at last, it appeared that the Honourable and Learned Gentleman was desirous of raising a "No Popery" cry. I trust, however, that that cry will not be responded to; and I have such confidence in the tolerant spirit of the House, that I am sure the attempt of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman will not be allowed to disturb the calmness and moderation which have hitherto signalised the discussion of this most important subject. There is one point — second to none in importance, but surrounded with the greatest difficulty — on which I wish to make a few observations; — I mean the religious relations connected with this scheme for the establishment of a system of national education.

The Noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire has laid it down that the system of education brought forward by the Government must, if adopted, terminate in a state of national infidelity. I do not share in the apprehensions of the Noble Lord. I believe that the minds of the people of this country are not prepared for the seeds of infidelity, and that all the feelings of the human heart are opposed to such scepticism. I believe it probable that, by the united efforts of sectarians, the national church might be endangered, or, perhaps, destroyed; but I am sure that, in England, infidelity would not be the result; and that we should rather see reproduced a state of things similar to that which arose in the 17th century. In England, I believe, we are more likely to see the wildness of fanaticism than the rise of infidelity. I believe we are more likely to see, in this country, the violence, for a moment, of contending sects; — that we are much more likely to behold the rise of a new race of Fifth Monarchy men and the domination of the Saints; and that there is much more chance of having, for the nonce, the fury and violence of contending sects, as in the time of the Commonwealth, than the general spread of miserable, cold, and restless infidelity. The feelings of the people of this country are repugnant to infidelity; and although they might be led away, for a moment, from the faith of their fathers, and from the church where they had been wont to congregate, — although they might, for a time, yield to the influence of fanaticism, and absent themselves from devotion, — such a state of things would remain but for a moment, and they would soon again feel the necessity, and long for the consolation, of worship. That which is more likely to occur than general infidelity, would be, that when the moment of fanaticism and anarchy had passed away, the people of England would feel the want of that solace which religion alone affords, and that they would require, again, some standard of faith, and the establishment of some church distinguished by the learning and piety of its clergy and consecrated by charity. It would, then, become a question, to what church would they, in that moment, refer? — with what church would they seek to connect themselves? We cannot conceal from ourselves that the Church of England, under such circumstances, would be placed in a very different position, with regard to its rival, Rome, from that which it held in the 17th century. The Church of Rome — that church which appeals so strongly to the imagination and to the feeling of mankind, — whose priests are so distinguished by their learning and eloquence, — which is no longer kept down by those restraints by which she was fettered in former days, — which is enthusiastically supported by millions in a neighbouring country — has much more chance to rise predominant and supreme under the scheme of education advocated by the Central Board, and adopted by the Government, than that the inference which the Noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire has drawn should be realised. The Church of Rome has the advantage of being able to appeal to unrivalled antiquity; and appealing, also, strongly to the feelings and imaginations of men, there is a much greater chance that an ignorant and distracted people would seek to escape from anarchy by uniting themselves to such a church, practising charity, than by listening to preachers whose doctrines bring no consolation, and whose promises offer no joy. If, unfortunately, such a moment of confusion should arise, and should the people again seek a return to peace, they would, in that hour, revert to the church of their fathers, or to the Church of Rome. In such a period, you must either revive the national church, or restore that which prevails throughout the greatest part of Christendom. The choice of the people would, in such a period, be the Church of England or the Roman Church; but they would not plunge into infidelity, which is abhorrent to their nature, and at variance with all the better feelings of the human heart.

It may be asked, however, whether we ought, from the fear of realising such a state of things, to prevent the spread of education, and neglect the moral and religious instruction of the people? But the real question is, has education been so neglected as Honourable Gentlemen opposite wish us to suppose? The Honourable Gentleman the Member for Liskeard, last night, furnished us with a picture of cellar life in the great manufacturing towns, and described the people inhabiting those cellars as being in a state of semi-barbarity, and as being ignorant almost to the verge of brutality. The Honourable Gentleman inferred the neglect of education from the condition of those unfortunate persons. But was that inference correct? No: their condition in these cellars is not the consequence of the neglect of education; but it results from the peculiar circumstances which, in every manufacturing country, arise out of the vicissitudes to which trade is subject. But when the Honourable Gentleman pourtrayed the condition of those people, he forgot to make any allusion to the cellar schools; — he did not think proper to call the attention of the House to the fact, that, in those cellars, schools had been established; although, for their own purposes, the society over which the Honourable Gentleman presided had, on more than one occasion, brought those schools before the notice of the public. We have seen described one of those cellar schools in Manchester; and the picture presented to us has been held out as an instance of the miserable want of instruction which prevails in the manufacturing towns, and as a proof of the necessity for a system of state education. But from those schools I draw a very different inference. I look on the existence of these cellar schools as an evidence that the seeds of education have been widely sown, and that they will speedily fructify and become general. It is a fact, which none could have anticipated fifty, or even twenty-five years ago, that, in the cellars of Manchester, schools should be established; and that fact, so far from showing that education has been neglected by the church, indicates, in the clearest and most satisfactory manner, that a strong and unconquerable desire for education has been infused into the minds of the people; while it proves, almost to demonstration, that the seed which has been so widely sown will soon spring up to maturity. The Honourable Gentleman the Member for Waterford has said that the church has been tried and found wanting; but why did not the Honourable Gentleman take any notice of the arguments which had been adduced to prove the failings of the state? The arguments brought forward against the church told as strongly against the state. If the church has done nothing, what, I would ask, has the state done, for the education of the people? The Honourable Gentleman, when he left the manufacturing towns, took us into the rural districts, and detailed to us, as an instance of the neglect of education by the clergy, the outbreak which occurred in the county of Kent, eighteen months ago. Now, if I were called upon to adduce an instance in favour of parochial supervision, and of the excellence of the church as a vehicle of instruction, I would go to the very place mentioned by the Honourable Gentleman, in order to prove the value of the efforts of the clergy for the improvement of the moral and spiritual condition of the people. It is a remarkable fact, that the spot where the outbreak took place is extraparochial; and, from my own knowledge, I can state — for the scene of the unfortunate occurrence is in the vicinity of the town which I have the honour to represent — that the people are in a condition little removed from barbarism. It is a wild woodland district, peopled by inhabitants in the rudest state of society,—wild in their manners, — unsocial in their bearing, — setting the law at defiance, — and so profoundly ignorant as to be only entitled to be considered as a species of "squatters," carefully shunning all civilised humanity. Such places are not common in Kent; but we might, notwithstanding, find districts of a similar character in almost every county of England. Now, such is the place which has so often been described as the garden of England — as a rich luxurious rectory, slumbering under the shade of Canterbury spires.

[Cries of "Hear, hear, hear!"]

I do not say that the Honourable Gentleman the Member for Waterford was cognizant of the real facts of the case; and I only allude to the subject to show how carelessly, and with how little knowledge of the truth, statements might be, and often are, made; and how, what are adadvanced as facts in illustration of any position may be made the basis of a contrary argument. I believe the great object which every English statesman ought to have in view, is — to encourage the habit of self-government amongst the people; and it is because I consider the proposition which has been submitted to our consideration as hostile to the acquisition of those habits, that I oppose the scheme of the Noble Lord. I believe that it is an axiom in civil policy, that, in exact proportion as we curtail the duties of citizens, we peril the rights of subjects; and I believe we have done that, already, to some extent. We have already had recourse to a system of central organisation; and what has that system not produced? and what may it not yet produce? Let us remember, that the same system which tyrannised in the nursery under the pretence of education, may again make its appearance, and immure old age within hated walls, under the specious plea of affording relief. It is always the state, and never society; — always machinery, never sympathy. By our system of state education, all would be thrown into the same mint, and all would come out with the same impress and superscription. We may have a bloated mechanical prosperity; we may make money, — we may make railroads; but when the age of passion comes,—when those interests are in motion, and those feelings stirring, which will shake society to its centre,—then we shall see what will become of the votaries of state education! We shall then see whether the people have received the same sort of education which was advocated and supported so nobly by William of Wykeham, — by him who built schools, and founded and endowed colleges. Who, I would ask, built our universities? Did they spring from a "system of central organisation?" Who built our colleges, churches, and cathedrals? Do we owe them to a scheme of "centralisation" propounded and supported by the state? No; other principles actuated the men of former days:

and let us look abroad on England, and witness the result. Where shall we find a country more elevated in the social scale? Where, a people more distinguished for all that is excellent in the human character? The time will come, if you persist in your present course, when you will find that you have revolutionised the English character; and, when that is effected, you can no longer expect English achievements.

For these reasons, and because I believe that the system of education which the proposition of the Noble Lord goes to establish is alien to the habits and contrary to the genius of the people of this country, I shall oppose, to the utmost of my power, this rash attempt to centralise instruction. But, independently of these reasons, I object to the form in which the proposition made by the Noble Lord has been brought before us. The subject is one of the gravest interest, — leading, if adopted, to a great and important change; and, I would ask, is it decorous, on a matter of such moment, not to consult both branches of the Legislature? Is this House so superior in wisdom and knowledge, — so intimately acquainted with the state of the country — with the feelings, the wants, and the wishes of the people, — as to enable us to scorn the learning, the experience, the information, and the patriotism of the House of Lords? I will make no invidious comparisons; but the constitution tells me that the Lords and Commons are alike to be consulted in every change, affecting the welfare and happiness of the people, and the peace and prosperity of the country. On matters of minor importance, I do not contend for an appeal to both branches of the Legislature; but when the subject is one which has shaken and agitated society to its centre, and which has roused the passions of the people throughout the country, I must confess I am surprised that a proposition of such magnitude and importance should have been brought forward almost at the close of the Session, and in the languid months of summer. And how, too, has it been brought forward? Not directly, as it ought to have been, but indirectly, between a vote for the building of palace stables and a proposition for establishing a system of penny postage! Such is not the way in which a great national experiment ought to be introduced to the consideration of the Legislature. Then, again, it is said that this has been made a party question. I allow that it is extremely desirable that a subject of this character, and of such great importance, should not be dealt with as a party question; but the fault of its being so considered rests with those who have made it a stalking-horse for party purposes, and have brought it forward in a party spirit. If the discussion has assumed a party aspect, the fault is to be ascribed to the Government, who solicited support for their proposition from party considerations. This question has not been brought forward in a manner worthy of the Government of a great country. We ought to have come to the discussion of this proposition in a spirit of calmness and moderation, with a conviction that on it may depend results which all must fear What, then, have we in this case? We have the country in a state of provisional insurrection; and is it possible that our minds can be calm in the midst of the agitation which surrounds us? We saw, the other day, a document brought into this House, unparalleled in the history of Parliament; and that document so frightened us, that we broke through the rules of the House, and allowed the Honourable Gentleman who presented it to expatiate on the prayer of the petitioners. If you were not frightened, will Honourable Gentlemen opposite tell me why they did not perform their duty, and enforce the rules of the House in that case? The petition of upwards of a million and a half of the people is not to be despised; and, although Honourable Gentlemen opposite may disapprove the prayer of the petitioners, yet let them remember that we are, this night, to decide upon the education of those by whom it was signed. When, then, such is the grave and important issue which we have to decide, it certainly does not become us to act in the spirit of the Government, who brought forward this proposition, and to allow the discussion to degenerate into a mere party squabble.

[Cries of "No!"]

Well, then, let Gentlemen opposite, who dissent from me in opinion, vindicate the conduct of the Government, and prove that the manner in which this proposition has been submitted to our consideration has not been influenced by party considerations.

Mr. EWART. — Sir, I can assure the House that nothing but the very great interest I feel in this question could overcome my natural reluctance to address them. But I cannot conceal my surprise at the arguments of the Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down. If they are good for anything, they would go to restore society to a state of savage barbarity. The Honourable Gentleman has gone so far as to express a qualified opinion in favour of the condition of the unfortunate persons inhabiting the cellars of Manchester. These people are in a state of almost barbarian ignorance; and yet the Honourable Gentleman has said that they are actuated by the sincerest desire for that education which he, notwithstanding, would refuse to extend to them. The Honourable Gentleman has certainly thrown out some very ingenious arguments in praise of what may be called a free trade in ignorance; and has contended that every person ought to be left to himself to procure education. That is a new doctrine. Will the Honourable Gentleman deny that a system of centralisation has before existed in England? What does the Honourable Gentleman say of our universities? Do they not afford an instance of the system of centralisation? Let him look at the inscriptions on their ancient walls, and then tell us what inference he can draw from those inscriptions, if it be not—that their founders intended to establish a central system of education? The Honourable Gentleman has spoken of railways; but does it follow that, though the formation of railways should be left to private speculators, education should also be left without the aid or interference of the state? Does not the Honourable Gentleman admit that it is necessary to centralise justice; and, by a parity of reasoning, is it not as necessary to centralise education? The Honourable Gentleman has adverted to China; and has said that, in that country, a centralised system of education has long existed, and that the officers of the Government are promoted, there, for their educational attainments. But is that an evil? On the contrary, I believe that, by such a system, democracy has found a vent, and the country has, so, been saved from those convulsions which have distracted the kingdoms of Europe. The same system has been adopted in Prussia; and I believe that it will one day be adopted, also, in England,—and that day, come when it may, will be a happy day for the people.

Sir, the Honourable Member will excuse me if I decline going further into his arguments; as, in my opinion, they were more distinguished for originality than for soundness. All the objections which have been urged against the proposition of the Government, resolve themselves into two classes. The first class of objections is directed against the Board of Education, which it is proposed to establish. The Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire has asserted that this board will be an irresponsible and despotic body. But how can it be despotic, when it is subject to the supervision of Parliament? And how can it be called irresponsible, when its proceedings are annually to be brought under the consideration of this House? But, Sir, the Honourable Member for Kilmarnock objects to what he is pleased to call the despotism of the inspectors. The system of inspection has already been applied to prisons; and why should it not be to schools? Surely, no objection can be seriously urged against placing the schools under a vigilant system of inspection, when you, yourselves, will inspect the inspectors? The Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire has quoted many obsolete authorities in support of his particular views; and he has said that education is chose spirituelle,—meaning, thereby, I suppose, that it is chose ecclésiastique. The object of the Noble Lord has been to prove, not that education is a thing connected with religion, so much as it was to show that it is a thing connected with the sectarianism of his own church; and therefore it was that the Noble Lord brought forward, as illustrative analogies, the dogmas of the church,—such as the baptism of infants, and the doctrine of the holy eucharist, and other matters peculiar to that church. The system of combined education without religious distinctions has been tried in Liverpool, and has succeeded. I will not trouble the House with complicated statistics on this point; but I will refer to the statements of a converted opponent to this scheme, who watched its progress in Liverpool, amongst a population of 200,000 persons. There are two great schools established in Liverpool under this system. The first is at the north end of the town, which was visited by the gentleman in question; and he put various questions to the master, who informed him that he was an Independent, and that he had two assistants,—one of whom was a member of the Church of England, and the other a Roman Catholic. The number of children was nearly 500, and consisted of members of different religious denominations; including members of the Church of England, Methodists, Baptists, Independents, Presbyterians, and Roman Catholics. The result of the observations made by this gentleman was so satisfactory to his own mind, that, from being an opponent, he became a friend to the system; and although the orthodox party at first raised an outcry against it,—and actually beset the children on the road, to such an extent that the police were called in, — yet, subsequently, the people were convinced that it was a most advantageous plan, and a general conviction prevailed that schools opened for all sects were public benefits. In the south end of the town the school is conducted by a master who is a member of the Church of Scotland, with two assistants, — one of whom is an Independent, and the other a member of the Church of England. The Gentleman from whose statements I quote found the school going on well. The number of children under instruction in it, and the several denominations, were as follow: — Of the Church of England, 294; Roman Catholics, 325; Church of Scotland, 12; Independents, 15; Baptists, 20; and Methodists, 48. Facts, then, prove the administration of education under a combined system to be quite practicable. The Noble Lord opposite (Lord Sandon) can contradict me in these facts, if they are unauthenticated. I believe that the object of the Noble Lord (Stanley) is to maintain the ascendancy of the state church. But I will tell the Noble Lord, and I do not care who knows it, that I am determined, in matters of education, to maintain the ascendancy of the state over the church. I think the time will come when that will be found to be the most constitutional doctrine, and one which it will be impossible to gainsay, without taking away the very bulwarks and foundation of our freedom. It is only by giving the state the opportunity of educating the people, and of throwing open the public institutions of the country for their benefit, that the people can become universally instructed. The public libraries, the public galleries of arts and sciences, and other public institutions for promoting knowledge, should be thrown open for the purpose of inducing men, merely by the use of their outward senses, to refine their habits, and to elevate their minds. Although something of this kind has been accomplished, much remains to be done. There remains to be achieved the complete education of the outward man; and I do not despair of its accomplishment any more than I do of the education of the inward man, notwithstanding the futile opposition of the Honourable Gentleman opposite. I hope to see the time when there shall be a system established for combining physical, intellectual, and religious education; and I think the day is not distant when Honourable Members opposite will regret the part they have taken on the present occasion. Of this I am sure, — that, whether or not the friends of popular education succeed in reclaiming or converting Honourable Gentlemen opposite, the adoption of such a system will be the glory of the age; and whatever may be the futurity of the present reign, the origin of this scheme of national education will be one of the brightest objects that distinguished and adorned its dawn.

Mr. PLUMPTRE. — I shall most cordially and conscientiously support the amendment of the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire. I think it most objectionable that a board of Privy Councillors should be intrusted with the arrangement of plans, and the distribution of funds, on a matter of such immense importance as national education. Such a board cannot be satisfactory either to the members of the established church, or to those who dissent from it. The established church has no security in the constitution of the board, that all or any of the members of that board are to be members of the established religion. Besides, even if they be, they may yet be as ignorant and unworthy sons of the church as her Majesty's present Prime Minister, who, it is well known, and will be well remembered, has declared, in another place, that he sees but little difference between the tenets of the Church of England and those of the Church of Rome.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!"]

Neither can this board be satisfactory to the Dissenters of this country; for, whatever the present proposed board may be, if once the precedent of such a board be established, we may have a board, on some future occasion, of the most exclusive character, confining its benefits, perhaps, to the Church of England — or, it may be, even to the Church of Rome. I do maintain, therefore, that such a board cannot prove really and permanently satisfactory to any class of persons. Again, I must say, that I am strongly of opinion that any original grant on such an important subject as national education should be voted by Bill, and not by a single vote of the House of Commons. The question should be fully and fairly discussed in both Houses of Parliament, through those different stages to which a Bill, in its progress through Parliament, is so wisely and properly subjected. I may be told that sums for similar purposes have been already granted, in a similar way; and the grant to Maynooth College, and that for education in Ireland, may, perhaps, be mentioned as analogous grants. If this be so — (I am not sure how this may be) — if, however, it be so, I can only say, "more is the pity!" Neither of them, perhaps, would have been made, if they had gone through the proper trial and discussion. We are taunted, on my side of the House, as uncharitable, because it is said, by Honourable Members on the other side, that we are willing to avail ourselves of Roman Catholic sinews, and of Unitarian gold, ——

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

—and yet we refuse to give instruction to Roman Catholics and Socinians according to their own respective views and versions of the Scriptures. It does appear to me, that they who thus charge us, charge us most unjustly, and reason most illogically. All who will avail themselves of such benefits and privileges as we believe to be derivable from residing in this country, must obey the laws of this country, and contribute their share to its taxes. But if I am to be told that they who contribute to the taxes have a right to appeal to the Government, and call upon it to support them in any of their political schemes, however wild, or in any of their religious opinions, however heretical, I must reply, that I could never accede to such a doctrine. I should, by assenting to it, be opening the door, at once, to absolute anarchy in politics, and to destructive errors in religion. Much, also, has been said, on the other side of the House, against Members on this side presuming to judge others. Who wishes or takes upon himself to do so? Not I, for one. But, at all events, I suppose it will be granted to me, that we have a right to form our own opinions; and I will say that, if we were wise, we should seek to form them aright on the most momentous subjects, and we should seek to form them from true and legitimate sources. And if we do form them, and others, differing from us, plainly tell us, that they differ, are we to stultify ourselves and say, "Well, then, you are right, and we are wrong?" Sir, I know of no law, human or divine, — I know of no common sense or reason, — that bids us so to do. I will say, rather, that if the man who, for instance, denies the divinity of the Saviour, tells me that he does thus deny the very foundation of the Christian's faith, I shall grieve for him, and tell him my opinion, and my fear that, continuing of this mind, he would be holding a most pernicious and fatal error. If the Roman Catholic tells me [that he believes in the doctrine of transubstantiation, and in the efficacy of prayers and masses for the dead, — if he tells me that he holds the doctrine of purgatory] — that he thinks himself at liberty to put tradition on a level with the word of God, and to invoke saints and angels, — I will fairly tell him, in reply, that I believe these to be anti-Christian opinions; and that I am sorry for the man who holds all or any of these, and who teaches them to others, — whether he happen to live at home, or at Maynooth, or at Oxford.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from both sides of the House.]

And if either of these men were to ask me to support him in his errors, and to enable him to train up others in the reception of them, I should decline to do so, in faithfulness to my own conscience, and by no means out of any want of real charity to those whose wishes I refused to accede to. I believe Christianity to be the glory and security of the country; but not the vague and wild and undefined Christianity of those who would put the Socinian infidel, the blaspheming Jew, the sensual Turk, the self-righteous Pharisee, the cold-hearted formalist, and the error-holding Romanist on the same level with the humble and adoring believer in the Son of God. True Christianity is of a different stamp — formed by the Spirit and the word of God. I am thankful to believe that such Christianity is increasing in this country; it is my best and only sure hope for the country, amidst much that is dark and lowering in the aspect of its affairs, both at home and abroad. Such Christianity it was that rejected the first scheme for national education; and I trust it will be equally successful against that which is now under consideration.

SIR G. STAUNTON. — Sir, as I stand in rather a peculiar position, I am anxious to say a few words in explanation of the vote I am about to give. I feel that, whatever side I take, I shall be subject to misrepresentation; and therefore I can bear with perfect resignation any taunt or obloquy which may attach to the course of conduct I purpose to pursue. I may truly say that I have always been a warm friend to religious education, and have ever been desirous that it should be extended to every class and denomination in the country; nor have I ever felt it to be inconsistent with my religious duty to contribute as a private individual what assistance I could to the Roman Catholics and Dissenters for the promotion of those objects; for I have ever felt that I ought not to suffer my attachment to my own peculiar religious faith to make me forget that those classes are linked and joined together by our common Christianity. With these views I cordially supported the foundation of the London University, because it afforded to Dissenters the highest education, and enabled the Legislature to leave Oxford and Cambridge intact and unaltered. I give her Majesty's Government every credit for coming forward with a plan of national education; but still the plan proposed differs to a great extent from the mode of education now pursued by the established church; it places the direction and superintendence in a lay and political board, at which no member of the church is to sit; and I cannot think that conformists and nonconformists can be safely educated together. Therefore it is impossible I can support this plan. I regret that the matter has been taken up as a party question; but, for myself, I would say, that though approving generally of the policy of her Majesty's Government, and thinking that, so far from promoting revolution, that policy has a tendency to prevent it; still, on a question of religion, I cannot consent to any compromise, and therefore, with pain, I shall be obliged to vote in favour of the amendment.

Mr. G. KNIGHT. — Sir, my purpose, in rising, is not to answer the speech of the Honourable Baronet who has just sat down, but to express my entire concurrence in the statement he has made. He will, I trust, forgive me for saying that the sentiments he has expressed do him the highest credit; and that I trust so good an example as he has set, will be followed by many others on the same side of the House. I cannot but complain of the manner in which the plan first brought forward by the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department was first abandoned, and then renewed. By that course the country has been deceived; but now that it is known the scheme is to be persevered in, the more strongly and the more generally will it be opposed. I had an evidence of the way in which the country has been deceived this very day. I received a petition, which would not have been sent up, had I not written to the place from whence it came, informing the petitioners that the ministerial plan was not abandoned. I do not accuse the Noble Lord of wilfully taking the opponents of his plan by surprise; but, certainly, whether by accident or design, the country has been deceived. The opponents of the scheme in this House have been most unjustly taunted and charged with being the enemies of national education; as if the question were — education or no education. Such is not the case. We are not opposed to national education; but we are opposed to the Government plan. The Honourable Member for Lambeth has fairly and candidly stated that this is a struggle between the church and the Dissenters, and that as long as the Government forward such measures as the present, they will be entitled to, and receive, the support of the Radicals. But how can the struggle be justified? If we compare the numbers of the Dissenters with those of the Church of England, we shall find that the latter has a right to maintain her superiority. By a Report of the Statistical Society, it appears that the Dissenters are about 2,000,000 out of 16,000,000, and consequently stand in a minority of one to eight to the established church; and that being the case, they have no right to assert an equality with the church, even on pecuniary grounds. But with respect to the scheme itself, and the proposed mode of education, I must say that schools so conducted would reduce the Church of England to the level of the Church of Johanna Southcote. What would be the state of those schools? The teachers would assemble, of all classes, with a bearded Rabbi at their head; in one corner of the school there must be a little holy water for the Roman Catholics; in another a bath for plenary immersion for the Baptists; and religion, philosophy, reading, writing, and arithmetic, would be all mixed higgledy-piggledy together; and I am afraid, that when the children would become adults, they would contrive to dispense with religion altogether. It is true there is to be the superintendence of a board of four Privy Councillors; but in my judgment the effect of the appointment of that board is to proclaim to the people of England that the clergy of their church are no longer worthy of taking a part in the education of the children of that church. It would be a fluctuating and dependent board, whereas it ought to be an independent and a permanent body. On all these grounds I feel bound to support the amendment of the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire.

Mr. GIBSON. — Sir, the Honourable Baronet opposite, when he observed that in the Committee of the Privy Council there was no member of the church, seemed to draw a very singular distinction between the church and the clergy. The Articles tell me, that the church consists of the congregation of the faithful; and I cannot bring myself to suppose that four members of the church — for such, I believe, are the four members of the Privy Council Committee — would be hostile to the church, because they are not clergymen. I must also protest against one doctrine laid down by the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire, — that the schoolmaster of the Churchman's children ought, with regard to their religious education, to be under the regulation of the Ordinary. From this principle I wholly differ. I think the present duties of the Ordinary are quite extensive enough, without imposing an additional burden upon him; and, in the present state of religious feeling throughout the country, — and I speak with all respect when I assert that, — I should as soon think of putting the Ordinary under the schoolmaster, as the schoolmaster under the Ordinary. I am of opinion that the schoolmaster should, in all matters relating to the secular education of the children, be quite independent of all church influence, even though the children should be Churchmen's children. In these days, when so many sects are springing up even in the church itself, — when we hear daily of Evangelists, of Puseyites, and of those whom the former choose to designate as world-seeking Churchmen, — the office of the schoolmaster will be liable to be interfered with in the most unpleasant manner by the clergyman of the parish. The doctrine which the Noble Lord attempted to set up sounded very like infallibility; and I can tell the Noble Lord, that if once infallibility were set up as the guide for the people of England, it would be very doubtful whether they would not take the infallibility of Rome in preference to the infallibility of Oxford. For, be it remembered, the infallibility of Oxford is of comparatively recent date, while that of Rome has, at least, prescription in its favour. The Honourable Gentleman the Member for Somersetshire has also propounded that which I am compelled to differ from. The Honourable Member has stated that the working classes of this country are dissatisfied, because they have not enough of religious education for their children in the various schools established by the societies. My own experience does not by any means confirm that statement. On the contrary, to my knowledge, the working men complain that in these national schools nothing but religion is taught. They say, "Why cannot we teach our children religion ourselves, or send them to church on Sundays, and send them to these schools to learn something that will be useful in this world, such as reading, writing, and arithmetic?" So far from useful practical knowledge being conveyed in many parishes with which I am acquainted, nothing is taught at these schools but strange outlandish texts from the Old Testament, — in fact, nothing that can be of use, either in this world or the next. They are not taught their duties to God and man — to be honest and lowly and forbearing; they are not taught their duty to their neighbour; but they are taught a great deal about Moab, and the names of mountains in the Old and New Testament, and about the offices of angels. In fact, a variety of knowledge is conveyed to those children on subjects upon which, if similar questions were put to the Honourable Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford himself, I verily believe that the Honourable Baronet would be unable to reply.

But I really must say that I think all such questions as these are quite foreign the functions of this House. The Honourable Gentleman the Member for Somersetshire very judiciously observed that he thought the House of Commons a very unfit place for theological controversy. In this sentiment I entirely concur. I wish the House could see that we have to look to the maintenance of man's civil rights without reference to his religious opinions; that we ought to look at the subjects of this country as men, and not as separated into different religious sects. But, at the same time, I do not see how the Honourable Gentleman can reconcile that, his declared opinion, with the course he has taken on this question; because, if this House assume the right to interfere with the religious opinions of men, how can we avoid theological discussions? Such discussions may be all very well in proper places; but when I am called upon in the House of Commons to give my assent to a system of national education, to be paid for out of the public purse, I feel myself bound to see that neither the established church, nor any other religious society whatever, be enabled to put upon the grant of the House any restrictions which may have the effect of excluding any person from the civil advantages of secular knowledge. I understand liberty of education to mean that it shall be open to all sects, — to the Roman Catholic, to the Unitarian, to the Jew, or any other class of British subjects. I hold the meaning of liberty of education to be, that any man shall have the right to send his child to the National School, to avail himself of those civil advantages which are placed within his reach by the civil government of his country, and to have his child taught such peculiar religious tenets as he may think right, — of course provided the exercise of such a privilege involves no interference with the rights of others. Unless you separate religion from secular instruction, it will not be possible to make education general. Each man may wish to have both combined for the instruction of children; but it is clear to me that they must be separated in the national schools, if it be intended that they shall be general. If each class be anxious to give religious instruction, let them do so; but do not let them interfere with the secular teaching that is to be conferred in these schools. This, in my mind, is liberty of education. The Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire, however, says, virtually, by the course that he proposes to pursue, "Let us set up a monopoly for the church, and the Dissenters, if they please, may set up another." I therefore say that the education which the Noble Lord proposes is not liberty of education, but liberty to set up two monopolies of education. But this is not the system from which British subjects can derive corresponding advantages, as from a general plan, under which there would be liberty of education.

The Honourable Gentleman who spoke last alluded to the general instruction that was proposed to be given in the normal school, alluded to in the first minute of the Privy Council on this subject. I am aware that there are many objections to the system of general religious instruction which is referred to in this document; but the objections to it are not that it does not teach religion, but that it does not involve instruction in sectarianism. Most impartial men believe that there is a very wide neutral ground in the Christian religion, comprehending all the main principles of Christianity; and instruction in them may be considered as general religious instruction. Every man, however, must be aware that all sects seem to be anxious for the promulgation of their respective differences in their peculiar religious doctrines. Instead, therefore, of Christian ministers drawing attention to the important points on which they agree, they always direct it to the differences that exist. That distinguished philosopher, Mr. Locke, said, that sectarian teachers always endeavour to persuade their followers that the maintenance of every doctrine of the sect is of essential importance; and by this means they lose sight of the great and immense points of argument. I admit that it is a dangerous experiment to propose to maintain religious instruction in the national schools; for by this means we have raised a religious outcry throughout the country against their plan. There is a very appropriate expression on this point, which has been used by a certain reverend pamphleteer, who applies the term "fool-ometer" in reference to the proposal to teach the general doctrines of the church in their schools.

But, Sir, I was much surprised to find that a man of such high character and attainments as Lord Abinger should have used language which went to the extent of declaring that we should not give instruction to persons who were not members of the establishment. I repeat, this much surprised me, as coming from one who is a judge of the land, and who goes to the extent of asserting that if we cannot give them instruction in the doctrines of the church, we should not communicate to them any knowledge at all. I recollect when Lord Abinger was engaged in a controversy with Mr. Cunningham, of Harrow; and from what then took place, I had thought that such an impression had been made on the Noble Lord as to make him aware of the difficulties naturally attendant on getting into a controversy on general points. I should have thought that the Noble and Learned Lord would have stated that it would be unwise to take up matters of religious difference on general grounds. I do not think that any case has been made out to justify us in calling upon the Government completely to rescind the Order in Council. It is probable that the chief objection is directed against those who have been nominated on the committee to superintend the carrying out of the plan; but it appears to me to be composed of four gentlemen, as competent as any others to carry into effect a general system of education. I may be told that they are four Whigs; and no doubt this is a strong objection in the minds of many; but, believing, as I do, that they are as competent as any others that could be nominated, and finding them, also, all members of the church, I do not object to their appointment; and I confess that I do not understand the grounds of the outcry that has been raised amongst them. I think, therefore, that no case has been made out to justify such a very hostile proposition as that of the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire. Although I have been supported and voted for as a Conservative, I at all times declared to my constituents that I should always support any plan of general education on the principles of religious liberty. I can agree to a general system of education on no other principles than those I have heard propounded; unless, indeed, that in the schools we establish we consent to sever religious from secular instruction, and allow all those who desire it to absent themselves during the periods of religious instruction. By this means we should allow Jews, Roman Catholics, and other sects, the full benefit of secular instruction, without forcing upon them instruction in any peculiar religious doctrines or points. I protest against the doctrines laid down by the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire, and for the illustration of which he refers us back to the dark ages, and quotes a writer of the reign of Henry IV., endeavouring to support his opinion by the later authority of Chief Justice Holt. He referred to the church, as if the church had the sole and exclusive right to take possession of the minds of the children in this realm, and as if it were entitled to the monopoly of education. I, for one, cannot concur in such a doctrine, nor can I conceive on what grounds you talk of the children of "the church." Does the Noble Lord recollect the opinion of Mr. Locke on this subject, who said children could not properly be called members of the church, if they had not formed opinions on its doctrines; unless, indeed, they belonged to the church by descent, as lands might belong to us by inheritance. Such a principle as this has not been broached since the period of the Reformation; and I cannot help observing that it appears to me that Honourable Gentlemen, in their anxiety to put forth objections, completely forget and lose sight of the genuine principles of the Reformation. It seems as if they would set up, and manifest more strongly, their hatred to Popery in proportion as they approximate to it more closely. It is the opinion of some philosophers, that the antipathy of religious sects is greater in proportion as they approach to each other. I repeat that I do not like the proposal to mix up secular with religious instruction; and I confess that I do not see how religion can be blended with it. When religion is taught, it should be by those who devote themselves to it, and not merely by mixing it up with secular instruction. What necessity can there be for us to mix up religious instruction with the teaching of arithmetic, or mathematics, or geography? I have little doubt but that, in some of the schools that have been so much alluded to as imparting religious instruction, in the minds of children we should find the teaching of multiplication mixed up with the doctrine of justification by faith.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

I contend that this is not an extravagant opinion. I have seen some of the effects of mixing up religious instruction in many schools; and I am satisfied that no attempt of the kind can answer the expectations that are entertained on the subject. I have seen, for instance, an attempt made to impart religious instruction together with a knowledge of the alphabet; and as an example I may cite the following:—

A stands for Angel, who praises the Lord;
B stands for Bible, that teaches God's word;
C stands for Church, to which righteous men go;
D stands for Devil, the cause of all woe.

[Laughter.]

This is an admirable specimen of an attempt to promote this kind of "combined education." I will not trespass further on the attention of the House; but will merely add, that, on the several grounds which I have stated, I shall oppose the motion of the Noble Lord.

SIR HARRY VERNEY.—I have long foreseen the obstacles that would be thrown in the way of any attempt to introduce a general system of national education; and I thank the Government for exposing themselves to the difficulties, the odium, and all the various jealousies which such a subject is sure to call forth. I think that the proposition of the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire is a most unfair mode of attacking the Government plan of education. Nothing, in my mind, is so unfair as this proceeding on the promulgation of the general plan of education announced to us, and this endeavour to excite an outcry that the object in view is to make an attack on the church. If the object of this plan had been to make any attack on the church, it would have met with my most strenuous resistance; but I deny that such is the case, or that there is anything in it that can justify such an imputation. For my own part, I consider the sum now asked for as a great deal too small; and I shall be glad to see the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer again endeavour to carry into effect the plan of education proposed by him when the question of church rates was under discussion, and — by means of the enormous increase which the property of the church will receive under that plan — to provide a more adequate fund for the purposes of general education. I am convinced that it would be found very difficult to draw the children of the lower classes to schools founded exclusively on Church of England principles. I do not believe that if a school were founded in every parish throughout the country, and placed under the management of the clergyman, the Dissenters would ever send their children to such a school; on the contrary, such schools would be regarded with the utmost jealousy. I speak from experience on this point, for I have many opportunities of seeing the working of such schools in agricultural districts, — and regret that this is the case; but it would be most objectionable to conceal or disguise the truth on the subject. I trust that the Government will not be induced, by any consideration, to give up that part of the plan which relates to the superintendence of the schools, which, in my mind, is one of the best features of the system. There are, at present, very large masses of the population in the lowest state of ignorance, and in a condition most dangerous to society; and therefore I think that the Government deserve the sincere thanks of all friends to improvement for the attempts they are making to remedy the evils which exist, and which, if not timely prevented from increasing, may be attended with fatal consequences to the welfare of this country. I have watched the proceedings that have taken place on this subject with some degree of jealousy, and I see nothing which can justify any alarm in the minds of the most zealous friends of the church; on the contrary, I conceive much benefit would result to the church from the spread of general and religious instruction. Under these circumstances, I feel it to be my duty to give the proposal of the Government my cordial support.

SIR R. H. INGLIS. — I will commence by saying a few words with regard to what has fallen from the Honourable Member for Ipswich, whom I do not see in his place, but in another place from that, whence the speech of that Honourable Member would have come with more propriety. It was from that side of the House where the Honourable Member is now sitting, that those loud and long cheers proceeded, with which the Honourable Member was greeted, and which must have been very gratifying to him, especially when he saw how vehement a part was taken in them by the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin. The Honourable Member for Ipswich has alluded so pointedly to me, that I regret that a moment's interval should have elapsed before I rose to reply to that Honourable Member, and to the charges of ignorance and bigotry which the Honourable Member has permitted himself to bring against me, and the church to which the Honourable Member himself belongs. As to the rhymes quoted by the Honourable Member, I do not think it necessary to say anything further than that they are lines commonly used in infant schools, and perhaps are as well adapted as any others that can be chosen to the capacities of children of the age at which they are usually sent to those schools. With respect to certain doctrines which the Honourable Member has charged the University of Oxford with holding, I will not enter into the question whether such doctrines are well founded or not, nor into the question whether the House of Commons is the proper arena for discussing such a subject; I will content myself with saying, that the University of Oxford, as a body, is not responsible for them. They have never been adopted by that university, and it cannot be responsible for the opinions of its individual members. If the Honourable Member wishes to find opinions for which the University of Oxford is responsible, let him look at the petition which that university has presented to the House upon the subject of the present motion. That is a regular and formal expression of the sentiments of the body; and feeling, as I do, a just sense of the high honour which my position confers upon me, I am quite ready to take my share of the responsibility arising from that petition — a responsibility in which I glory. Sir, I regard the Ministerial measure as one upon which the University of Oxford looks with apprehensions that are just and well founded. Although the plan has been technically changed, let no man deceive himself by thinking that the evil to which the former objections applied has been removed. The Honourable Member for Ipswich says that there is no reason for withholding our confidence from the individual members of the Privy Council, of whom the board at present consists. The objection is not to them as individuals, but to the placing in the hands of laymen those powers which ought to be confided only to the church through its ministers. I have never confounded the church with its ministers, but have only said that from time immemorial, both in Roman Catholic times, and since the Reformation, education has been connected with religion; and I firmly believe that if the Roman Catholic religion were ever again, here, in the ascendant, the clergy of that church would be the last in the world to leave the education of the people in the hands of others. It has been said that those members of the Privy Council belong to the established church; but is it certain that such will always be the case? May not a Privy Councillor be a member of the Church of Rome? I do not wonder at the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin's concurrence in the Ministerial plan; but that Honourable and Learned Member's approbation ought not to be a reason why he, — the Honourable Member for Ipswich, — whose aspirations are in favour of the Church of England, should agree to the proposition that the interests of that church may be safely intrusted to a committee, the members of which may not, even nominally, profess the Protestant religion. It has been said that the Church of England has been remiss in the performance of its duties; and I admit that in the eighteenth century there did exist a lamentable apathy in the church, the evils resulting from which we are now constantly experiencing: but it is not to the state of the church in 1750, or at any other former period, that we are to look: we ought to consider the energies of the Church of England such as we see them at present, and then say whether we can find elsewhere such an instrument of good as is to be found in that church; whether, in the present generation, its usefulness should be eithher suppressed or contracted. It is not the question, whether, in former periods, the Church of England did adequately discharge its duty, but whether it is not fully occupied in doing so at present. Nothing can now be said of that church which does not redound to its honour. I hold in my hand a return of the number of boys committed to the gaol of Newgate between October, 1821, and March 12. 1822 — (I select this period as being a comparatively distant one); — which return shows how superior is the system of education afforded in schools in connection with the established church. Of the fifty-two boys so committed, there were eighteen who had received their instruction in schools not in connection with the established church; while there were only six who had been educated in schools of the establishment. The Honourable Member for Ipswich has infused a strain of ridicule into his account of the mode in which education is conveyed in the schools in connection with the established church, by repeating some rhymes made use of in the National Society's schools. For my own part, I am prepared to contend that the elementary part of the general education of children may be, and ought to be, connected with Christian instruction. Any opportunity which is lost of leading the way to eternal life is, in my opinion, dearly purchased by what the Honourable Member for Ipswich calls universal charity. This is an opinion which I believe no man who is fully persuaded of the truth of the doctrines of the established church will venture to controvert. There is no alternative. We should believe that those doctrines are either all true or all false. If we believe them to be true, we are bound to support and advance them. Then comes the question of what is the nation to do?

Mr. O'CONNELL. — Hear, hear!

SIR R. H. INGLIS. — My answer is, that each individual is bound to use his influence, so far as it can avail, for the promotion of the doctrines which he believes. Every one is responsible to God and man for the use of the power committed to him. Those holding office, and in possession of political power, are bound to exercise that power for the promotion of their belief, and not for the encouragement or advancement of anything which they disbelieve or conceive to be erroneous. Will you venture to tell me, then, that this Board of Education may not, nay, must not, tend to the promotion of that which, as individuals, you believe to be erroneous? It is distinctly stated, that the design of the Government is, to extend the benefits of a national education to all those who now require it, whether they belong to the Church of England or not. That being the case, the members of the proposed board must necessarily throw a portion of their patronage and influence into the scale, which is to weigh against what they believe to be the truth. It has been said that, as Dissenters, Roman Catholics, and Jews pay a portion of the national taxes, they have a right to receive, in return, a share of the national income. It may almost as well be argued that none should be called upon to pay rates towards the building and maintenance of prisons, except such as contemplated becoming inmates of them.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

But I will ask, does any man refuse to contribute to the support of gaols upon such a ground as that? Does any man refuse to contribute towards the building of a bridge, on the ground that he never intends, or never shall have occasion, to cross it? I understand nothing of a national religious establishment, unless it be one to which members of all other persuasions are bound to contribute, without any obligation on its part to contribute in return. If there be anything in this view of a national establishment, it is clear that those in whom is the power of the state are bound to exercise that power for its support, which they certainly cannot be said to be doing in proposing a mixed scheme of education — a scheme which, I believe, will not satisfy the more conscientious members of any party. With this view of the duty of a Government to promote the religion of the state, not on the ground of a national contract, but on the ground of individual obligation, I cannot understand how the Noble Lord and his Right Honourable Friends opposite can justify themselves in giving aid to those whom, in their consciences, they believe to be in error, as, of course, they assume the Socinian and Roman Catholic to be. I will not enter into any theological discussion whatever. The members of those sects may be right, or they may be wrong; but I will venture to say that if the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin, for instance, were to change positions with us, and he were asked to allocate a portion of the national funds, — supposing, also, his church to be the national church, — for such a measure as this; I will venture to say that the Honourable and Learned Gentleman would not approve of such a course, and would not sanction it under the authority of the heads of his church. I will not discuss the various reasons upon which I deem the Honourable and Learned Gentleman opposite to be in the wrong. No doubt, on his part, he would call me a heretic.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — No, no!

SIR R. INGLIS. — Then the Honourable and Learned Gentleman is not consistent with the principles of his own church.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I do not judge you; it is a question which I leave between you and your God.

SIR R. INGLIS. — Over and over again I have said that the state ought not to establish a system of secular, as contradistinguished from spiritual, instruction. You may call it by a less extensive term than a "system of education" — you may say that a lesson in arithmetic is a lesson in arithmetic; but I cannot call any system one of education which does not include the preparation of the whole soul and mind of man, for his duties here, and his hopes hereafter. My Right Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets, who has just entered the House, is one of those who have endeavoured to make a distinction between secular and religious education; but what he urged upon this subject was, I am convinced, as to its practical character, quite impossible. You never can bring together, under one head, for the purposes of education, those who differ entirely on spiritual subjects; and if you attempt to divide instruction into secular and spiritual, you cannot bring either to its legitimate result. Numerous petitions have been presented upon this subject from the Dissenters themselves, some of them exclusively signed by Dissenters. Never, hitherto, in so short a period of time, has there been presented, from all parts of the country, so large a mass of petitions, showing such an earnest and combined opposition on the part of persons of so many different persuasions, as there has been presented against the proposed plan of education. It has been said that they are not against the present plan. Many of them were certainly presented before the second plan was made known; but those presented within the last week are directly and specifically against the plan now proposed. Never before, in so short a period, was there such opposition shown to any measure, in the shape of petitions. I believe their number on this one subject approached very nearly to the total number of petitions presented on all subjects in former Sessions. What must be the evil of a plan which can arouse against it the combined and strenuous efforts of so many otherwise discordant bodies, and which has produced in its favour some fifty or sixty petitions from the zealous supporters of her Majesty's Ministers, but which, neither in this House, nor in the country, can be described as the real wishes and feelings of the people of England?

Mr. O'CONNELL. — As I have been personally referred to by the Honourable Baronet, I shall beg leave to notice some opinions of his, and some mistakes, on points of fact, which he has fallen into. I shall begin by that which is the least material — the number of petitions presented on this subject; and I will let him see, precisely, what public opinion is, on this matter. There has certainly been a very great number of petitions presented against, I will say, the present Government plan; but then I say that there has been a miserable deficiency of signatures to those petitions.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

The number of petitions is 1615.

[Cries of "No, no, no!"]

I have in my hand the last return of them which was published. It was published only three or four days ago, — it does not matter which. All that is material is the fact that I cite the return last published. The number of petitions printed is only three or four; but this is so, only because all of them were so similar one to another.

[Cheers from the Opposition benches.]

You may cheer, by and bye. Well, the number of petitions presented on this subject, according to the last return, is 1615; but what is the number of signatures attached to them? Why, only 165,729. Now, upon the subject of the extension of the franchise in Ireland, there were only 192 petitions — but how many signatures were attached to them? — 170,942. For an extension of church accommodation in Scotland there were 611 petitions, and these had 141,370 signatures, — nearly as many as in the 1615 petitions you talk so much about. Against what was called Orange domination in Ireland, — in other words, in favour of the maintenance of the policy of the present Government in that country, — there were 710 petitions; but then these 710 petitions had 550,356 signatures. These were petitions in the prayer of which the people were serious, — cases, where they were actually interested in the matter in question. And what do your 1615 petitions prove? Dexterity in getting up petitions, in collecting together a large number of them. Nothing further. Signatures, it is very clear, you could not command. With all your little bits of rolls of paper coming out of the same shop, with little red tape about them, and all as like each as if they had been created at the same moment — with all these you could only get together 165,729 signatures. And whose signatures are these? Those of persons who belong to your party, who want to advance your political power, — for this is the point with members of the Church of England, with the mighty body of Wesleyan Methodists; yet with all your efforts, with all your means, with all your appliances, you could only get 165,729 signatures to 1615 petitions; while in Ireland, in one fortnight, 550,356 persons came forward eagerly to subscribe their names to 710 petitions. It is a mistake, a gross mistake, on your parts, to suppose that the good sense of the people of this country is with you in the advancement of your bigoted views. The attempt to raise the "No Popery" cry has signally failed; it has been growing, from time to time, weaker and weaker. I regret that the Noble Member for North Lancashire is not here; it does not become his high talents to have set forth on this unhallowed purpose. It is stated on the opposite side that they do not think they can aid one party without subjecting another to loss and deprivation. This is their principle: I call on them to work it out. I contend that they cannot work it out; and without meaning anything disrespectful, I say they dare not work it out. I doubt not that they would work it out if they dared: they cannot, if they would, proceed with the principle of exclusion. I am in this House in spite of you, and in spite of all who are influenced by your principles. You have tried the efficacy of exclusion, and you have found that it will not do. You have tried the efficacy of the exclusive principle in order to prevent the advance of Catholicity; but, nevertheless, the Catholics are multiplying in Ireland — they are even increasing in England. But the advocates of exclusion do still not carry out their own principle far enough, — at least not far enough to effect their purposes. You had better take up the old plan, — you had better pursue the old Spanish system, and proscribe and burn us. But, no; this you cannot do, now; though you endeavour to the utmost of your power to proceed upon principles which are at once fatal in politics, and unsound in religion. Properly speaking, such principles do not belong to religion, they are anti-religious; for, though hypocrites may be made by force, you cannot make converts otherwise than by persuasion. The Honourable Baronet is quite ignorant of my opinions as a Roman Catholic. I do not hold any opinions as a Catholic which I do not believe to be identical with those of my church. I am emphatically submissive to my church. I believe all it believes — I believe nothing which it does not believe. I do not condemn the Honourable Gentleman as a heretic. I hope he is not one. If he has been cautious and sincere in prosecuting his inquiries after religious truth, and remains firm in his convictions, I can have no right to call him a heretic.

I have no right to be his judge: it is a question between him and his God. He is not responsible to me, nor to any human being; and I am equally irresponsible to him.

Well, Sir, I have shown, I think, that this is not a popular question. I have shown that the Wesleyan Methodists, who have engaged in it with the utmost activity and energy, and with excellent discipline, have produced only a paltry collection of petitions, with an extent of signatures utterly insignificant, when compared with the petitions on the other subjects I have mentioned. What is the question before the House? The Government proposed, by their minute of the 11th of April, to form normal schools. They proposed, in that, to do what I think they had no right to do, strictly speaking, — to provide, at the expense of the nation, chaplains to instruct the children of the established church. These children should have instruction, no doubt; but that the nation should pay for their chaplains, when there were no chaplains provided for the children of Protestant Dissenters and Roman Catholics, was very stoutly to be disputed. These schools were not to be paid for out of the funds of the established church. It was no part of the revenues, casual or productive, of the established church — no sacrifice made by the established church—that these schools were to be paid out of; but, out of a general national fund, coming from Protestants of the established church, from Dissenters, from Roman Catholics in the three countries; and so far I think that the members of the established church ought to have seen that a decided advantage was given to them, which was not quite consistent with justice and fair play: but to this I, for one, was ready to accede at once; because in the way of so great an object I wished not to introduce any miserable little cavil. It is of the highest importance to educate the people, and I am ready to make any sacrifice, except principle, to secure such an object. In the normal schools it was proposed that there should be education in common. I have heard a great many arguments against this plan of education in common; but it is a powerful argument on the other hand, that there is nothing more desirable than that the youth of this country, separated as they are by twenty-five or twenty-six leading persuasions, should, while the unsophisticated and affectionate feelings of youth are yet warm in their bosoms, have the inestimable advantage of mixing together in friendly and undoubting intercourse; so that the angry and jealous passions which may afterwards come upon them may be assuaged by the gentle recollections of their youthful friendships. It is said that no such experiment has been made. I say it has been; and most successfully. I admit to the Honourable Member for Somersetshire that it has not been made in Prussia. I admit that in Prussia the different Protestant persuasions are kept separate in the schools; but there, the Catholics are educated under the inspection of Catholic clergymen; and the petition of which the Honourable Baronet complains, — that of the Archbishop of Tuam and his clergy, — what does that petition claim? It claims for the Catholic clergy the spiritual instruction, not of Protestants of the established church, nor of Protestant Dissenters, but of the children of the Roman Catholic faith. But what does the Honourable Baronet the Member for Oxford claim? He claims that the education of Catholics, as well as that of Dissenters of every persuasion, shall be placed under the control of clergymen of the established church. This is the claim made by the Honourable Baronet, — and made, before him, by the Honourable Member for Somersetshire, and repeated over and over again, — that Protestant Dissenters, that Roman Catholics, shall not educate their own children, but that all these shall go under the yoke of the established church, and submit to the inspection of its clergy. I think, Sir, that the claim of the Archbishop of Tuam contrasts very favourably with this claim of the Honourable Baronet. I can assure the House, that if the Archbishop of Tuam were to make a claim for his own church similar to that advanced by the Honourable Baronet, I should be the first to oppose it. The Honourable Member for Somersetshire very wisely began by deprecating polemics; but in doing so, he, too, came to assume for himself very extensive concessions. The Honourable Member insists that the established church in this country is educating an immense number of children. I grant him that position. I will suppose his statement to be quite correct; but is this a reason why the established church should have all the national grant to itself? It has sufficient funds already; and I should rather have expected that, in the liberal spirit of Christianity, it would have said, "Seeing what large funds we have got, we will give this money to the miserable Dissenters and Roman Catholics, — those poor wretches who have no money — while we have got 8,000,000*l.*" But, no; on the contrary, they said — "We have got all this money, so give us more — give us all that is to be given;" therein bearing too close a resemblance to the man in the Old Testament, who, not satisfied with having a whole flock of his own, insisted on having the solitary ewe of his neighbour. Government has given up this plan of normal schools, and I cannot but express an opinion that they yielded too readily to public clamour. I should not have given up the expectation that the people of England would cheerfully embark in a plan which proposed that the future teachers of children of all persuasions should be educated in common — that they should have their literary education and their general religious education in common, and that special religious instruction should be given to each, separately. I have heard a great deal thrown out as to the distinction between special and general religious instruction. The Honourable Member for Dorsetshire dwelt much upon this topic, and I was sorry to hear the manner in which he discussed it. I have heard, — I hardly choose to allow myself to touch upon the topic, — but I did hear the Noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire, amidst the cheering of his friends, talk of the Sermon on the Mount. And what did the Noble Lord say? He said that that sermon contained no intrinsic merits.

[Cries of "No, no!" from the Opposition benches.]

Pardon me; he said that it derives its merits and its sanction exclusively from Him who pronounced it. He said that, emphatically. I heard him, and could not be mistaken. I heard him with the deepest regret. But, I ask, does not that sermon hold out objects of the purest and most sublime morality? Does it not hold out the kingdom of God to the meek, to the pure in heart, to those who administer mercy, to the peace-makers? Oh! the contrast between the spirit of that sermon and the hostility to education which it has been dragged in, to support! If I could doubt, even for a moment, — and I make the supposition with the utmost reverence, — but even if we could entertain a doubt of the divinity of Him from whom it came, what a contrast would it present to the systems of Pagan philosophy, which preached self-exaltation — which preached triumph over enemies — which preached the taking vengeance for offences — and which tended in every way to self-glorification! What a contrast between those systems and the sublime principles of the Sermon on the Mount! And shall it be said that an English nobleman, in the nineteenth century, can find no intrinsic excellence or sublimity in its sentiments?

[Cheers from the Ministerial, and cries of "No, no!" from the Opposition benches.]

I am not surprised that you should deny it! You do right in accusing me of misrepresentation. But the statement has been published without contradiction. I heard the Noble Lord myself, not only with patience, but with the deepest regret. If he were here, I am sure he would have the manliness to avow his words. But is it a fallacy to say that that sermon is matter of general religious instruction — that it may be communicated to Christians of every denomination? Will any one deny that a great good would be effected by teaching children to live in love together, according to the precepts of that divine sermon, even though you should separate them afterwards for special religious instruction. The Honourable Member for Somersetshire has quoted Prussia, and said that different sects are, there, educated apart. I admit it; I deplore it. But I remind him that in the admirable work of the Rev. Mr. Gleig, chaplain of Chelsea Hospital, on Germany, there is strong testimony to the superior morality of the Catholic population, compared with that of the Protestant portion of the people. Is this a desirable result of separate education? Is it not better that we should all come together in a spirit of charity, than incur the guilt of caring more for system than for that which is the essence of religion. Oh! let each man beware, lest, in becoming a systematiser, he become a propagator of immorality, or a creator of hypocrisy; and let us all look to the genuine nature of the divine precept of universal charity, as the only means of amelioration — the only way to reconcile us to one another. But if the system have not been adopted in Prussia, it has in Holland, and has completely succeeded there. I know that some persons, there — I will not call them fanatics, but mistaken individuals of the Calvinistic persuasion — are declaring off, and refusing acquiescence in the general system of education in Holland. The Honourable Member for Somersetshire told us so; but he did not tell us the reason. I may supply that deficiency in his speech. The principal excuse of these persons is — that Catholicity is advancing. Whether from the system of education adopted, I do not know; but there is no doubt it has made a mighty advance. And what if it be advancing? Is that a reason why the experiment of a general education should not be tried, if it contain nothing unfair, or nothing unjust? Can you, who are convinced of the truth of your church, dread the consequences of a fair development of the public mind by education? What is the plan we are discussing, but this, — that a sum of public money, not belonging to the funds of the established church, should be employed to educate the children of those from whom it is raised? The Honourable Member for Kent (Mr. Plumptre), whom I do not see in his place, seemed to think that we were coming to ask for money; and he said, "You believe in transubstantiation — in the invocation of saints — in prayers for the dead" — (forgetting that one of your own judges has lately pronounced it to be a salutary practice to pray for the dead) — "and the sacrifice of the mass; and do you come to me for money?" I do not come to him for money which is his; but I ask him to give me a part of my own. I say, "Mr. Plumptre, ——

[Cries of "Order!"]

— you believe that my principles are dangerous and fatal errors. I respect your credulity: I do not ask you to pay for the diffusion of those principles; but I ask you not to put your hand into my pocket, and make me pay for the dissemination of yours." This is the principle of common sense and common honesty; and the converse is a principle of common swindling and common robbery. The Honourable Baronet has talked of men being sincere in their religious belief. He thinks that if I put my hand in his pocket, and take out of it the means of educating children in the Catholic faith, I am robbing him. I think the same of him. I tell him, further, that he has not been wise in discussing this topic. The Wesleyan Methodists have been brought forward, — and observe under what circumstances. The Government plan is simply this, — to take this grant, and distribute it first to the National School Society, with which you are satisfied. I will not enter into the Honourable Baronet's quarrel with the able Member for Ipswich, whose sentiments I did applaud, because they were consistent with justice and common sense: — but — you are satisfied with the National Society. You undertake its vindication and proclaim its merits. Well, the Government is in the first instance to give more than one half of this grant to that society. The great bulk of the money will go into its hands. So far you are content. Then comes the British and Foreign Society. I do not know whether the Honourable Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford is content with the British and Foreign Society. I should like to have some intimation on that point, but I think the Honourable Baronet's countenance beams approval. At all events, the great body of the Dissenters approve of it; and that society is to receive another large portion of this grant. What remains? So far the system is the same that has been in existence before — the same for which the grant was voted last year, and there was no complaint. The Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire was then silent. He would allow the established church to get public money; he would allow the Dissenters to get public money, without any excitement of his Noble wrath; but at the bare mention of Catholic education he raises the cry of "No Popery!" — I will not say for political purposes, or from deep-rooted prejudices; but I will bring him and tie him to the fact, that while the distribution was exclusively between the National and British and Foreign Societies, he made no complaint; but the moment that the miserable crumbs, the wretched remnants, are to be used for the instruction of Catholics, that moment the Noble Lord rises up, in his place, to call upon the House to refuse even these paltry remnants, by his motion for removing those four Protestant noblemen and gentlemen who form the Committee of the Privy Council. He did not impeach the division between the National Society and the British and Foreign Society; but he did impeach the distribution the very moment it was proposed that Catholics should get any part. I exclaim against this as bigotry.

Another Member of this House has talked of the bitter feelings, and intense and malignant uncharitableness, which characterised the speech of the Noble Lord. I mean the Honourable Member for Lambeth. The words are not mine; but I cannot contradict them, for I never heard a speech to which they would more justly apply. The Noble Lord insisted upon the authority of the Ordinary. I will not refer to the passage in Norman French, quoted from the year-books of the reign of Henry IV., — a reign at which every Englishman ought to blush. From the time that St. Gregory sent St. Austin, the monk, to convert your ancestors, to the period of the reign of Henry IV., there was not a single law against dissent, or a single punishment for difference of religious belief. That was the first reign in which persecution commenced by the enactment of the statute De heretico comburendo. William of Wykeham has been praised, and rightly; but even his character, in other respects so pure, bears the stain of persecution: for, indeed, he must have been long since placed among the number of canonised saints, if he had not taken part in the persecution of those Lollards, whom, although he did not himself bring to the stake, he pronounced to be contumacious heretics, and who were then, according to the Act of Parliament, consumed at slow fires. But the Noble Lord quoted a passage from Lord Holt, who said, that religious instruction should be under the direction of the Ordinary. It would follow that it should be under the direction of the representative of the Ordinary, or of the minister in each parish. But did the Noble Lord, when he made the quotations, say that he did not agree with the passage? He said, emphatically, that he would go no farther. Some one cried, on this side, that that was far enough. It was, indeed; but such was the Noble Lord's position. Does he disclaim or withdraw it? I should be glad to find myself mistaken; but I took down his words at the time, and documents which have since appeared before the public have confirmed them. Now he, too, triumphed in the numbers of the established church. But what are the conclusions drawn from statistical calculations? How stands the established church in this country? Before the Reformation there were 97,000 churches in England.

What is the number now, with all the enlightenment and zeal of modern times? The total number of the churches of the establishment is 11,825. I take the number from parliamentary documents. There are no parliamentary documents to show the number of dissenting meeting-houses; but, taking it from the best sources, — from returns which have, from time to time, been published in the Morning Chronicle, — the whole number, including Roman Catholic chapels, is 8716. The proportion, therefore, is, in round numbers, as three to four. Taking the population at 14,000,000, according to the last accounts, that would give for England 8,000,000 of Protestants belonging to the establishment, and 6,000,000 of Dissenters and Catholics. If to that you add Ireland and Scotland, the 800,000 Protestants of the establishment in Ireland, and, according to an exaggerated estimate, 200,000 for Scotland, you will have altogether 9,000,000 belonging to the established church. Between Ireland and Scotland there are 8,000,000 of dissenters from that church. And these, added to the 6,000,000 of Dissenters in England, will make up, altogether, 14,000,000 of Dissenters, while there are but 9,000,000 who belong to the established church. All this is upon the supposition that the relative numbers of the different persuasions can be fairly calculated by the relative numbers of their churches. But remember, in the first place, that the churches of the establishment have been built without any expense to those who worship in them. They have remained from other times. And many a church is at this day unoccupied in the city of London, and in various places throughout England, such as the town of Norwich. Remember that the presence of a church does not prove a congregation. But the presence of a Catholic chapel, or a dissenting meeting-house, proves, not only a congregation, but a congregation with wealth, and numbers, and zeal sufficient to erect and support it. Why do I enter into these details? In the hope of teaching Honourable Gentlemen some moderation in their assertions of the triumph of the establishment. What do I want from you? Nothing but fair play. I want that you should not rob me. At least, when you come to take my money for your own purposes, I want you to have some moderation in your language, to be less fierce with your "No Popery" yell, merely because I ask for justice to the Dissenters and the Catholics.

You have of late fallen in love with the Wesleyan Methodists, forsooth. I heard the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire praise them. The Honourable Baronet opposite, I believe, did not do so. But I join in that praise so far as that I believe them to be excellent persons, moral, and well-conducted in private life. With their religious opinions I have nothing to do. I believe that there are people among them as good, in all the relations of life, as any others. But I utterly deny that they can lay claim to having distinguished themselves by a career of political utility. Their history is marked. The first great political movement of John Wesley was to encourage, by writing an address, that Protestant Association, whose proceedings ended, in 1780, in what is now called an émeute, in the city of London — a scene of burning, plunder, and destruction of life and property. I do not accuse him of having written an address to incite to that riot; but I accuse him of having put his name to a publication which inflamed and supported that Protestant Association before they committed the outrages. I do not accuse him of encouraging them. I take the facts as they stand historically. I know that post hoc is not always propter hoc; but the facts stand so, whatever connection there may be between them. I enter not into the controversy of that time, although I may think that Father O'Leary had the best of the argument with the founder of the Methodists. Certainly he had the best of the good humour and the wit in that controversy. But the fact that I have mentioned is the first in the political history of Wesleyanism. I shall be glad to hear — I challenge — any Honourable Gentleman, if he can, to come forward and state one fact in that history to prove that the Wesleyans have shown themselves the friends of civil and religious liberty. I never knew them join with the other Protestant Dissenters during the long struggle for repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts. I never knew them to join in supporting the rights of the Catholics, or the freedom of conscience. I have known them perseveringly, violently — I will not say malignantly — to oppose the concession of those rights. Their political history is well known. If I am mistaken, no man will be more ready than myself to retract; but their history has been one of opposition to religious liberty, and they have never been known to take any part in favour of increasing the franchise or diminishing the burdens of the people. Why do you exclaim in their favour? I tell you, because they have joined in your "No Popery" cry. Beware, I warn you, on what treacherous ground you are standing. They say, in their published resolutions, —

We must decidedly object to the intended scheme (of national education) on the strong grounds of conscience, and of our right to full religious liberty.

[Cheers from the Opposition benches.]

Yes; it is a most excellent principle. I only ask you and them to "do unto others as you would that they should do unto you." They go on to say, —

We protest against being taxed for the teaching and maintenance of systems of religion which we, in common with the vast majority of our fellow countrymen, believe to be false and injurious.

I do not wish to use harsh words to them, but I am bound to believe their doctrines "false and injurious;" and I therefore claim from them the same liberty of conscience which they require for themselves. They protest against being taxed for the promulgation of doctrines which they deem false. Why should I be taxed for the promulgation of doctrines which I view in the same light? But I say to the friends of the church, "Are you safe in this Wesleyan connection?" Your church is rich; you call the Wesleyans brethren; but they have different clergy, different ministers, different office-bearers, from you. Do you think that your episcopal endowments, your stalls, and your rectories would not suit a worthy Wesleyan as well as any gentleman among you? You applaud them when they proclaim the principle of not supporting doctrines to which they are opposed. What if they should hereafter propose to put it in practice? They promulgate the principle under your sanction. I trust it will it will be read in Ireland, and perhaps the echo of its reception and adoption there will find its way to the Wesleyans. You may yet hear them tell you that the freedom of conscience, which they have asserted with your countenance, is violated by the tithes, and dues, and mortuaries which you compel them to pay to your church. You are allowing the armed man to put the saddle upon your back: you may not find it easy to get him to dismount. You are, for your present convenience, allowing them to use a dangerous weapon; but the day may come when the sword of the Lord and of Gideon will be well wielded for your own overthrow.

There has been much declamation against the danger of using the Catholic versions of the Scriptures. I shall quote to you, on that subject, an authority which you yourselves must respect. On the 1st of May, 1830, there was examined before a committee of the House a reverend divine, not of the established church of England, but of the established church of Scotland, — a church infinitely more opposed in doctrine to the Catholic Church than you are. Pardon me for what you may think no compliment, but we are in the habit of saying of you, "least deformed, because least reformed." What, then, says Dr. Chalmers, who, as a scholar and a theologian, stands in the first class, and who brings with him as ardent a dislike for what he considers Popery as any Wesleyan can possibly cherish. Of his talents and information I need not say anything. But this learned divine, on the occasion I have referred to, observed, —

I will beg leave to say that, in regard to the authorised version, and the Douay version, the difference between them is not so great as to make it a thing of practical importance which of them should be used.

Compare that with the Methodist declaration, surrounded and perfumed with your praise. They say, —

We protest more especially against our being compelled to support schools in which it is proposed to use versions of the Holy Scriptures, notoriously corrupt and unfaithful, and accompanied by notes which we consider contain the most absurd and pernicious doctrines.

This accomplished theologian gives you a different opinion. I will not enter into the various points touched upon by the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire. He began by talking of the sacrament of baptism, — the doctrine of justification by faith, — and what I think he called the blessed benefits of the eucharist. It was the first time that I ever heard those topics touched upon in this House. I will not refer to them, but I will say that never was greater ignorance displayed than in the assertion with respect to the authorised version and that of the Roman Catholic Church. Allow me to say this, — which at a proper time and place I should be ready to prove, — that in the version used by the established church there are a number of errors — recognised, admitted, but not corrected. I am perfectly ready to make that good. Some are of the first importance, — one on that very subject which the Noble Lord calls the blessed benefits of the eucharist. I say I pledge myself to be ready to show admitted and avowed errors, — wilful mistakes, — inasmuch as they remain still uncorrected, — in the authorised version. Why do I say this? To preach peace and forbearance. The Wesleyan resolution refers to versions "accompanied by notes which we consider contain the most absurd and pernicious doctrines." Before adverting to the notes, I shall mention that, within the last six years, 309,000 copies of the Scriptures were circulated by the bishops in the northern provinces of Ireland. I speak of the Roman Catholic bishops — the most Reverend Dr. Croly, the Right Reverend Dr. Deneir, and my beloved friend, the Right Reverend Dr. Blake. Dr. Croly has paid a Protestant bookseller 14,000*l.* for printing the Scriptures; and there is at this moment in Dublin a stereotype edition of 80,000 copies in the hands of Mr. Coyne, which he is eagerly pressed to bring forward, previous editions being exhausted. I remember a time when the cry to the Catholic was, — "Take the Scriptures; use your own version; but — read the Scriptures." The Catholic bishops did not think it wise to urge the circulation of the Scriptures, so long as they apprehended a disposition on the part of their flocks to become self-interpreters. That time is gone by. They feel that the Scriptures may be circulated safely; but you cry out, now, against what you blamed them for not doing before.

As to the notes, which are said to contain absurd and pernicious doctrines, — I shall give you the history of the version in which they originated. Pope Clement, in 1593, most zealously watched the publication, which, being translated at Rheims for the use of the Douay college, was called the Rhemish version. It contained notes urging the right — exactly upon the principles of the Honourable Baronet — of the civil power to persecute persons who held erroneous doctrines in religion. This version was published by a Protestant bookseller in Liverpool, in 1808. I first discovered and denounced these notes, and I will read the evidence of Dr. Croly with regard to all subsequent editions. He said, —

All the notes to which objections were at any time taken have been expunged, not only from the last edition, but from several previous editions.

The main question now before us, is, whether a small portion of this grant shall be applied to the education of Roman Catholics? Look at the wants of the Roman Catholic population in England. According to the returns of births and marriages, the population of Liverpool contains 92,386 Catholics, or nearly one third of the entire population. They are the poorest, by much, of the population: will you say they are to get no part of this grant? Are they, when — out of the beer which they drink, and the tea with which they regale their wives — the alchemy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer finds something to turn into gold, to get no part of the money which the state gives for education, for their children? I do not hesitate to say, in the presence of the Honourable Member for Liverpool, that the experiment of a common education has succeeded there. Will you refuse to the poor population of other great towns the same advantage? The Honourable Member for Liskeard has described the misery of the Roman Catholic population of Manchester and Salford. I believe that population amounts to 75,000, and that there are not less than a million and a half of Catholics in the kingdom. If their numbers are great, their destitution is great, and certainly the want of education among them is great. Do you, with your wealthy church of eight millions, and the Dissenters who, to their credit, have subscribed 111,000*l.* to foreign and domestic missions, — do you, wealthy as you are, stand forward to prevent this poor population of Catholics from getting a share of the grant? Oh! let us quarrel about something else.

[Loud cheers.]

Let us find some other field of conflict; or if you will contest this point, do it manfully. Do not come down with a side-winded declaration, that Lord Lansdowne is less fit than some one else to superintend the distribution. Do not come down with the paltry assertion, that it should be in the hands of responsible persons. Who are more responsible than the Ministers of the Crown? The Honourable Baronet and the Noble Lord, upon their principles, would not give a shilling towards the education of the Catholics. Let them propose it. I do not doubt that even the Oxford divines would support it. They who come the nearest to the professors of the ancient church would join in the outcry. Let the Noble Lord come forward and move, not by a side wind, but directly, that the Catholics shall have nothing. Let him come and say, "I am not dissatisfied with the National Society — let it take the grant. I am not dissatisfied with the British and Foreign Society — let it have the grant. But I will move a resolution, That no part be given to the Roman Catholics." That would be manly. But still you do the same thing in another way. You disguise your votes, and you are afraid to avow your own acts. I am surprised that the straightforward course has not been adopted by the Noble Lord, who is not much disposed to resort to deceit or to cunning. I wish to do him this much credit,—that he generally goes straight to the work at which he aims. Why not at once proclaim that which is the only difference between the two parties? Mark what is the difference between us,—mark it, and I say it proudly, that we propose that all persuasions shall be generally treated, by giving money to all who may require it. We require no partiality, we demand no priority; we ask for equality; and think you we will be satisfied with less than equality? All we ask is equality. We require not your money; but then we say, do not take from us, ours. Refuse the money altogether; that would be just. But then, if money is to be granted, do not be guilty of the bigotry and the injustice of refusing it to the poor, who require it, and of lavishing it upon the rich, who do not want it.

Much has been said, to-night, of our common Christianity. I did not like the sneer which was indulged in upon this point by the Honourable Baronet, as I think it was very unbecoming. There are points of difference between us. These are important points of faith. Faith is great; — Hope is cheering; — but Charity is the greatest of all, includes all, and forms the proper basis for all.

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE. — It is with the deepest and most unfeigned reluctance that I take part in the present debate; for I know that the vital and cardinal principles on which it turns are deep and abstruse principles of religion, which never can be discussed in this House with advantage. To the doctrine, that subjects of theology are unfit for discussion in this House, general assent is given; and the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin, who has just vanished from his place, has laid down in his speech, most forcibly and most clearly, the view which he takes as to the introduction of questions of theology into this arena; and stated, with great precision, the reasons why they ought not to be made subjects of discussion in this place. But how did the Honourable and Learned Member apply his theory? By putting a question to me as to the authority of tradition. It seems that I, as an individual Member, am to be examined in this House as to my religious opinions, when it suits the purposes of the Honourable and Learned Member; but that when my answer to that examination is to be given, a protest against my being heard is to be made, on the ground that questions of theology are unfit for discussion in this House. This is not the first time that this kind of allusion has been made to me in this House. The Noble Lord, opposite, has alluded to a book of mine, which I am almost sure that the Noble Lord, in the midst of his numerous and onerous avocations, has never been able to spare time to read. The Noble Lord has also taunted me with what he was pleased to denominate the result of my principles. I should not be afraid of entering into a discussion with the Noble Lord upon those principles, if the present were either a time or place for such a discussion. I will not flinch from a word which I have uttered, or from a single syllable which I have written, upon religious topics; and I claim the privilege of contrasting my principles with those of the Noble Lord, of trying the results of them in comparison with the results of those professed by the Noble Lord, and of ascertaining the effects of both on the institutions of the country, so far they operate upon the established church in England, in Scotland, and Ireland. Last night, too, the Honourable Member for Liskeard spoke of me as if I had interpreted the right of private judgment to mean nothing else than conformity to the doctrines of the Church of England; and broadly stated that my doctrines, if pushed a step further, would lead of necessity to persecution. I am well aware that I cannot defend myself against such imputations as these, without transgressing the ordinary rules of debate. All that I shall say in reply to them — for I will not be diverted from the main subject of the debate — is this; — that if the Honourable Member for Liskeard be justified in asserting that my doctrines on the right of private judgment resolve themselves into the necessity of conforming to the doctrines of the Church of England, and would, if pushed a step further, to persecution, I am also justified in asserting that the doctrines of the Honourable Member for Liskeard destroy the means of discerning between truth and falsehood, and will lead, if carried out to their next stage, to nothing less than national infidelity.

With respect to the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin, who has spoken so much of his fondness for statistics, the use which he has made of them reminds me of an observation made by the late Mr. Canning, to this effect; — that he had great aversion to hear of "a fact" in debate; but that which he distrusted most was a figure. The Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin stated that there were 97,000 churches in England, prior to the Reformation; — a "fact" depending upon historical research, which, if known to the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin, is unknown, I believe, to any "other" antiquary in the kingdom. It is not easy to test the accuracy of events so remote; but what ought we to think, if the Honourable and Learned Member is found so grossly inaccurate in his representation of events nearer to our own times? The Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin has spoken of the existence of 14,000,000 of Dissenters in the United Kingdom. But the present question has relation to England alone; and what is the amount of Dissenters, in England, alone? I will refer on this subject to a letter which was published in the Morning Chronicle, in November, 1837, by Mr. Dunn, the Secretary to the British and Foreign Society. In that letter Mr. Dunn makes the entire number of Protestant Dissenters in England to amount to no more than 2,500,000, or it may be to 3,000,000, in our whole population of 15,000,000. The Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin also travelled into statistics upon another point. He said that it was ungracious in the Church of England, to demand money of the public for purposes of education, when it was itself in possession of 8,000,000*l.* of revenue. Now, the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin has not even taken the pains to refer to the documents laid upon the table of the House; for these documents prove that all the revenues of the Church of England do not amount, together, to more than 3,000,000*l.* And if another 500,000*l.* be allowed for the revenues of the endowed schools, and of the universities, it will appear that the Honourable and Learned Member, in his attempt to lead the House to useful knowledge by the means of statistics, has assumed to himself the privilege of more than doubling the amount of property in the possession of the church.

I will now take the liberty of saying a word or two in reply to the attack which the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin has made upon the Wesleyan Methodists. I am at a loss to divine the purpose for which the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin employed so much ingenuity to demonstrate that the Wesleyan Methodists, as they are not at variance with the doctrines of the Church of England, are inconsistent with themselves in becoming separatists from it. The Honourable and Learned Member said that the Wesleyan Methodists ought to return into the fold of the church; and I — who have always lamented their secession from it, and have always been of opinion that the fault was more on the side of those who caused that secession than on the side of those who made it — join cordially in the hope that the union, so unfortunately broken, will, ere long, be resumed; and I shall be glad to find the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin my involuntary ally in producing that desirable consummation. The Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin has also done injustice to the Wesleyan Methodists in another point; and, though I am not commissioned, and have no intention, to stand forward as their apologist, still I think it hard that they should be taunted as the most persevering enemies of civil and religious liberty. It is, indeed, extremely harsh and unjust to say that they have never given proofs of their attachment to the enlarged rights of humanity, after all their long years of exertion to bring about the abolition of negro slavery. No sect has been more prominent than they have been in pursuing to its consummation that great object; nor have more assiduously kept the interests of humanity in view, while they were acting as vigilant guardians of all the best laws and interests of society. It is unjust in the extreme to designate men who have been most zealous and untiring in their exertions to obtain the liberty of the negroes, as parties perseveringly, if not malignantly, hostile to freedom.

I will now advert to the two plans proposed by the Government for the education of the people. The House has been told that the first plan, which contained a proposition for the establishment of a normal school, has been for the moment abandoned, or, in other words, postponed. Let the House then look at the position in which it will be placed with respect to the normal schools, if it adopt the present proposition of the Government, which is to make the grant impartial as to the schools to which it is to be applied. If the minute be impartially acted upon, the amount of the grant must be distributed rateably among the different religious bodies of the country. Now, many of them are small communities, which have no funds to support schools of their own. What, then, will be the result in the course of a few, a very few years? Why, that Government will say to them, "Without good masters, you cannot have good schools; now you cannot introduce good masters without a normal school of your own; you are too poor to support such a school; there must, therefore, be one general normal school to supply all the different schools in the country with the masters they require." This plan, therefore, insidious as it appears on its first blush, is likely to prove still more insidious if it ever come into operation, for it will betray the Dissenters into this position,—either that they must consent to have that normal school, to which Government dares not to proceed at present, or they must have bad schools with deficient masters, and without the only measure by which they can be rendered good. For my own part, I think that many of the difficulties which beset this subject depend on the erroneous significations which are attached to the term "education." By "education" is sometimes meant the machinery which is employed to give that knowledge to the lower classes which is necessary to procure them employment as a means of procuring daily subsistence. By "education" is often meant the communication of that higher species of knowledge which is religious as well as secular. It is only due to the Honourable Member for Waterford to say, that no one has spoken more forcibly than he has done against that species of education which is merely technical and external, and that no one has argued more successfully that, to produce a beneficial result, you must make education reach a man's heart, and must keep it distinct from that which he would call mere utilitarian knowledge. Let us take this always along with us,—that the education is to be "an education in which religion is combined with the whole manner of instruction, and is to regulate the whole system of discipline." These words are satisfactory. Both the documents which I have quoted, and the letter of her Majesty, and the speech of the Noble Secretary for Ireland, justify me in saying that the question which we are now discussing is, not whether it is lawful for the Government to give to the people an education which will better their temporal condition, but, whether we shall consent to let it administer a general moral system, which will reform the character of the people, and make them more fit for the discharge of all the ordinary duties of life? Such being the meaning of the word "education," the next question is, whether the religion to be combined with it is to be the religion of all forms indiscriminately? If it be so, then I have no hesitation in asserting that the principle is new and unconstitutional.

[Cheers from the Opposition benches.]

I repeat the assertion. The constitution has never recognised such a principle; and, as it is opposed to the practice of a thousand years, I cannot admit it, except after a full discussion of the grounds on which it is brought forward. Those grounds should be avowed by the Government, and rendered intelligible, in order that the friends of the church may have an opportunity of joining issue upon them, and of grappling with a substance instead of fighting with a phantom or a shadow. I again assert that this principle is contrary to the constitution. It is needless for me to refer, on this point, to our ancient history, for every instance that has been quoted against me has been taken from the history of the last few years. I have no need to refer to the clause introduced into the Prisons Bill of last year; for, though it has again passed the House this year, it has not yet become law. There is another case on which our opponents rely,—namely, the grant to the British and Foreign Society, and which I consider to deserve consideration. The Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin said that, in making that grant, we recognised the principle of teaching all forms of Protestantism, and that we now only oppose it because a miserable portion of it is to be devoted to the education of the Roman Catholics. Now, with all deference to the Honourable and Learned Member, I must observe that he has strangely misrepresented the object of the British and Foreign Society. Their practice is based on this supposition,—I will not stop at present to inquire whether it is or is not erroneous,—that you can extract from the Bible, for the purposes of general education, doctrines in which the great bulk of Christians agree; and their objection to the National Society and to the Church is, that they teach peculiarities of doctrine instead of teaching nothing but those great but simple truths in which the bulk of religionists agree. Look at the list of subscribers to the British and Foreign Society. Among their names, I find those of the Noble Lord opposite, of Lord Carrington, of Lord Chichester, of Lord Bexley, of my Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Bandon. All these distinguished persons are prominent members of the British and Foreign Society.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — George III. was also a subscriber.

Mr. GLADSTONE. — Yes; so were George III., and George IV., and William IV.; and our present most gracious Sovereign, Queen Victoria, is also a subscriber to it. The supporters of that society will doubtless tell us that many children belonging to the established church are educated in their schools. I do not mean to dispute the fact; for that society occupies in England the same position that was formerly occupied by the Kildare Street Society in Ireland. The proposition which I intend to maintain is, that what the state has been doing in giving grants to the British and Foreign Society is a mere limitation of the principle for which the Honourable Gentlemen opposite contend, and that the state has never yet recognised the principle of teaching all forms of religion indifferently, and of placing truth and falsehood in the same position, and on the same foundation. Before the House is called upon to act on this principle, and to advance in a direction so different from all the former policy of the country, I again beg that the grounds of the proceeding may be clearly avowed, and that some intimation may be given of the results at which it is intended we should finally arrive, in order that we may not be required to embark on an ocean of political change without knowing the haven for which we are bound. But I have protested against the principle, and have said that I do not think it necessary, in support of my views, to enter into any theological discussion. It is quite enough for me to know that the practice of the constitution has been, and that the law of the country at this moment is, to support that one church which the Legislature has adjudged to be the church of the country. Let the House look at the avowals which have proceeded from members of the Government, and from persons connected with the Government, less vague and insidious than the language of the document upon the table. What were the words of the Noble Lord the Member for Yorkshire, everything proceeding from whom is entitled to the utmost respect, on account both of his straightforward course, and the remarkable ability with which he maintains his opinion? Let the House listen to the words of the Noble Lord, which were so loudly cheered on Friday last:—

> He thought that, in the present state and feelings of the people of this country, the ministers of the establishment were entitled to the larger portion of the grant; but was the state to continue to employ Roman Catholic sinews, or finger the gold of the Socinians, and by refusing to the poorer members of either of these sects, by whom the state so profits, any share of the grant, so shut them out from the blessings of education, and keep them in a state of physical misery and intellectual blindness?

This is the principle asserted by the Noble Lord, which we have to consider; such is the broad statement of the question which we have to determine; and it is my wish to treat this bold statement with the utmost respect. I am not proud and dogmatical enough to suppose that this question is unattended with considerable difficulties. If the state is to be regarded as having no other function than that of representing the mere will of the people as to religious tenets, I admit the truth of this principle; but if we are to hold, as I feel myself obliged to hold, that the state is capable of duties, that the state can have a conscience ——

[Laughter from the Ministerial, and cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

Will the Honourable Member for Kendal (Mr. G. Wood), who has himself been so successful during the present Session in advancing the cause put into his hands ——

[Cries of "Hear!" and Laughter, from the Opposition benches.]

—have the goodness to tell me how the principle of duty can be applicable where that of conscience is not? It is constantly urged that it is the duty of the state to give the people education; but look at the consequences of this principle. If it be the duty of the state to give education to the people, do not all the arguments that go to show this, tend equally to show that it is the duty of the state to provide them with religion? If it is the duty of the state to endow all the schools, is it not also the duty of the state to endow all the chapels? What difference of principle is there between the two cases? In both cases they endow religion: the only difference is, that in the one case they endow it in a school, in the other case they endow it in a chapel, or a synagogue,—perhaps in a temple or a mosque. The Honourable Member for Dublin has quoted the case of 95,000 Roman Catholics, and asked the House to provide schools for these poor and destitute men who are unable to provide schools for themselves. Why, chapels are more expensive than schools; if it be right that we should provide schools, it is also right that we should provide chapels. If religion taught in schools be beneficial, religion administered in chapels is much more beneficial; if it be the duty of the state to provide religious instruction in schools, Honourable Gentlemen opposite should show me—not by their taunts and jeers, but by calm reasoning—why it is not the duty of the state to establish a system under which all religions shall be equally entitled to support. I have quoted a passage from the speech of the Noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland, whom I respect for the plain avowal of his principles which he has made. The Noble Lord cited the cases of Roman Catholics and Unitarians. I do not wish to say anything offensive of either denomination, for it is not my habit to revile religion, under whatever form it may be presented to me. But what reason is there for confining the Noble Lord's arguments to Christianity? I will read to the House a very curious passage from a petition lately presented from the Protestant Dissenters. It is to this effect:—

> That your petitioners feel the deepest gratitude for the expression of her Majesty's most gracious wish that the youth of this country should be religiously brought up, and the rights of conscience respected, while they earnestly hope that the education of the people, Jewish and Christian, will be sedulously connected with a due regard to the Holy Scriptures.

How is the education of the Jewish people, who consider the New Testament to be an imposture, to be sedulously connected with a due regard to the Holy Scriptures, which consist of two Testaments—the Old and the New? Are the Jewish children to be forced to read the New Testament? That would be directly contrary to the principle of Honourable Gentlemen opposite. I wish to see no child forced to read; but I protest against paying, from the money of the state, a set of men whose business would be to teach erroneous doctrines to the children. The argument of Honourable Gentlemen opposite, on the contrary, is, that wherever there is a community of Jews too poor to provide a teacher of their own persuasion, the state shall be ready, when called upon, to provide a teacher to inculcate the doctrines of that religion.

[Cries of "No, no!" from the Ministerial benches.]

I am sorry to allude to such topics, and I will not pronounce the word which occurs to me with reference to that religion; I will only say that it is a religion which denounces the most sacred truths of our religion not only as forgeries, but as blasphemies. I will carry the argument of the Noble Lord a little further. In India we have many poor subjects; India, moreover, is a country from which we draw vast supplies of wealth. The staple of our relations with that country consists in the receipt of revenue in money. There, millions of our subjects profess the Mohammedan, and millions the Brahminical religion; on the principle of the Noble Lord, on a case of necessity being shown, it would be impossible to deny the justice of their claim to have their religion upheld, and education provided for them under the Minute of Council.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and, "Oh, oh!"]

But the Right Honourable and Learned Member for the Tower Hamlets has settled this question for us without the smallest ambiguity or circumlocution, in such a manner as to place his candour in at least as distinguished a light as his personal character or his great parliamentary abilities—in such a manner as to leave no possibility of retreat or subterfuge. The Right Honourable Gentleman has laid down, in language stronger than I can use, that if the principle be good for one case, it must be good for all, and that there can be no exception. The Right Honourable Gentleman has announced that he, for one, is prepared to admit the principle that the state should establish no difference between conflicting religions; that the religion which God has revealed, and that which he has not revealed, are to be regarded as equally efficacious moral instruments for the reformation and improvement of the human character.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition, and, "No, no!" from the Ministerial benches.]

There may, indeed, be one answer to the objections that have been urged against the endowment of Dissenters, and the endowment of all religionists, in this country; that is, that the Dissenters demand no endowment from the state at the present moment. But, in the first place, I am bound to say that, in the colonies of the empire, where endowments are accessible, the same objections to receive them are not entertained; and, in the second place, the House ought to consider, not what is the will of the moment among Dissenters, as to their demands from the state, but what is the value and scope of the arguments upon which the demands are founded. What is the predicament of Government? To what are they bringing the country?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — At least, not to bigotry and intolerance.

Mr. GLADSTONE — The Noble Lord would be more accurate if he said, to latitudinarianism and atheism. The predicament of Ministers appears to me to be that of men who live from day to day by shifts and expedients, — of men who use arguments, the real value and tendency of which they are unable to perceive. Well do I recollect, when, during the brilliant period of the short Administration of my Right Honourable Friend the Member for Tamworth ——

[Laughter from the Ministerial benches, and loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

Where is the man who can deny the proposition I have stated, or apply any other epithet to the period during which my Right Honourable Friend conducted the affairs of the country? At that period I remember that my Right Honourable Friend, when taunted by Honourable Gentlemen opposite as being behind the spirit of the age, well retorted on them, that they were behind the spirit of their own arguments. Now the Honourable and Learned Gentleman (Mr. Buller) and the Noble Lord come forward with plausible arguments as to the benefits of education, with an exaggerated case as to the destitution of instruction, and with a disparaging statement as to the exertions of the church, — and they propose and support a measure which has for its first object to supply education to the people; but the ultimate effect of which, as I firmly believe, would be — to destroy the principle of a religion of the state, and with it the national character of religion, which has, hitherto, been the boast of England.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

Let the Government propose what they have to propose in a distinct and definite form. Let them show that, in calling upon the House to give education to persons of all religions, and to give a religious education to persons of all religions, and to teach all religions in the schools of this country, they are advancing something positively different from the other proposition, which I maintain to be essentially the same, — namely, that of teaching all religions in all the chapels and places of religious worship. Let them do this, and we shall know for what we are contending; but they will not, they dare not, do this. The Noble Lord and his colleagues seem to have learned nothing from their attacks upon the church and the religion of the country. I should have thought they might have remembered the experience of the last four years, and the enormous political advantages which they have given to their opponents by proposing plans which, in the minds of the people at large, were hostile — if not intended to be hostile — to the religion of the country. Year after year, defeated in one plan, they bring forward another; and every time they are obliged to recoil from the assault baffled and defeated. I was in no way anxious to mix in this delicate question, and would have willingly followed the precept of the Honourable and Learned Member who last spoke, who said, "Let us quarrel, if we are to quarrel, on some other subject rather than that of religion;" for it is disgraceful to make that the subject of hostile party attacks: but with you — the Government — must rest the responsibility of making it a subject of hostile discussion. You were not satisfied with bringing forward a plan of appropriation of Irish church property, which you could not carry, — a plan for loading the church lands with the church rates in England, which you were forced to abandon, — you must choose yet another point of attack, and, by means equally insidious and fatal, seek to undermine the fortress which you cannot storm.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

To merit the assent of Parliament, a plan of education should have two recommendations, — it should be both good in itself, and generally acceptable to the country. I have shown that this plan is bad in principle, and reverses the ancient practice of the constitution on a vitally important subject, — that this plan, instead of leaving the British commonwealth, as described by Burke, consecrated with all who officiate in it, leaves it desecrated and polluted. The plan does not even possess the temporary and partial recommendation of popularity. I will not repeat what has been stated with respect to the church and the Wesleyan Methodists; but I must allude to the case of those Protestant Dissenters who form the chief section of the remainder of the population. Let the House recollect the course taken by this body on former occasions, on the question of the abolition of slavery, and the question of church rates, and let them recollect that there was not a dissenting pulpit throughout the country in which the minister did not declare that a petition for one or other of these objects lay in the vestry to be signed by the congregation. Where are those petitions now?

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!"]

In political principles these Dissenters agree with Honourable Gentlemen opposite,—and there has been, here and there, a feeble and partial movement; but you have not dared to test the great body even of the dissenting population, because you know that the good sense, the right feeling, and the religious principle of the country are against you. I cannot refrain from reading one short passage which has been already stated in the most able speech of my Honourable Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Colquhoun), but to so limited an audience that I may be allowed to repeat it. That passage is from the proceedings of the committee of the Protestant Society for the Protection of Religious Liberty, held on the 13th of June, 1838, and I need hardly inform the House that the disposition of the society is by no means unfriendly towards the present Government. The words are these: —

The committee approves of the discretion which induced the Government not to urge forward speedily a plan which a multitude of persons, under much misapprehension, had resolved to oppose, and would now advise them, as a general rule, to distribute any further parliamentary grant in the same manner as those which have on former occasions been applied, conferring assistance on poor and populous districts, where local contributions cannot be collected under the inspection and guardianship of the National School Society, or of the British and Foreign School Society.

Now what is the meaning of this resolution? If it do not express the opinion, it cannot be denied that is a good index to the sentiments, of the body represented by the committee; and it appears that if they do not distinctly declare their hostility to the plan, they say that, under all the circumstances of the case, and considering the amount of support the plan would receive in the country, they think that the Government ought at once to revert to the system of former years; but with the single exception of a deviation which is perfectly technical in its nature, — that is, they recommend a modification of the rule as to the proportion of the pecuniary contribution required to be raised. They do not call upon the Government to make any alteration touching the application of the grant; but what they say is, — "There are certain districts which are too poor to subscribe, — we would recommend a relaxation of the rule which requires that in every case a sum shall be raised by voluntary subscriptions before any benefit shall be given from the Government grant." But on all the essential points, all that relates to the religious part of the plan, your own friends, after much consideration, solemnly and deliberately advise you to do what is recommended by your opponents, — namely, to revert to the plan that has been pursued with such general satisfaction for the last few years. Would to God that you had listened to the advice your friends gave you! That body, to which you look for support having declared these opinions, surely you cannot hope to carry into effect a plan which must, now, be admitted to be contrary to the general religious principles of the people of this country. You talk of peace and union; but can you expect peace or union will result from forcing forward plans that are discountenanced by the church, — that are discountenanced by the Wesleyan Methodists, — and which the representatives of the other portion of the dissenting body are either afraid or unwilling to countenance. On all these grounds I trust that the House will accede to the motion of my Noble Friend, confident as I am that, whether or not you succeed in obtaining a division in your favour by one of those glorious majorities the Government have of late commanded, you cannot carry the vote through Parliament; and even if you could, that its consequence would be to excite greater indignation throughout the country than has been known for many years in the history of this empire.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Sir, I rise to endeavour to reply to the Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down; and I assure him, that in differing from him, as I do, I differ from him with the most entire respect, because I am perfectly sure that, whether as a writer or as a Member of Parliament, no individual comes forward with more frank avowals of what he believes to be right, and no one places his case on a higher or fairer basis, — and I believe no one is more ready to expose himself to obloquy in maintaining his own opinions. But the Honourable Gentleman must permit me to say, with equal frankness and freedom, that the principles laid down by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, however consolatory to his own conscience, and however consistent with his doctrine of the constitution, are, in my judgment, not only inconsistent with the constitution of England, — not only unsatisfactory to my conscience, — but inconsistent with all received notions of civil and religious freedom. I will, undoubtedly, not pursue the Honourable Gentleman through the topics on which he has touched — I will refer merely to the principles involved in the Honourable Gentleman's speech, and fight the battle on the field he has himself selected. The Honourable Gentleman assumes — and I will use the term employed by the Honourable Gentleman himself in this matter — that the state has a conscience, and that that conscience is to be applied and directed towards a particular purpose. The Honourable Gentleman says that the state, like an individual, is bound to propagate the truth; and that the state, like an individual, is not justified in propagating error. The state, therefore, is bound to apply this principle to religious instruction. Allow me to say, in order to prevent misconception, that no individual can admit more absolutely than I do the necessity of connecting secular education with religious instruction. I believe that a merely secular education would be inoperative for good purposes. In this I entirely agree with the Honourable Gentleman. But then the Honourable Gentleman goes on to say, "But you must adopt such a system as shall make the schools for education schools also for religious instruction, and that religion must be the true religion only." He says, "I cannot be a party to the propagation of a system of error." Well, then, what is the inference to be drawn? If the Government propose schools in which are to be taught those doctrines of religion which are common to all sects, but which, according to Honourable Gentlemen opposite, are but of secondary importance, altogether; then it is said that we are introducing latitudinarianism in religion, and that our doctrines lead to infidelity and to the propagation of atheism. To this plan of general education, therefore, Honourable Gentlemen opposite entertain an entire objection. Will they, then, allow, in common schools, instruction in the doctrines of the Church of England to be given to the children of Churchmen, as well as instruction in the creed of any other denomination to the children of that denomination? No; they will not agree to this; this is intermingling instruction in error. Will they allow that the children of Churchmen and those of Protestant Dissenters should be educated together in the truths of religion, but separately from other classes? "No;" says the Honourable Gentleman, "that, too, would be the propagation of error." But, if the Honourable Gentlemen are opposed to separate instruction in religion, and opposed to common instruction too, why, their principle amounts to this, — that they would educate the children of parents belonging to the established church, but that they will not educate the children of any other sect.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches, replied to from the Opposition benches.]

I say, this is the distinct and logical conclusion from the principles which have been laid down.

[Cries of "No, no!"]

I say yes, yes; and I defy you to escape from it. For what do the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire (Lord Stanley) and the Honourable Member for Newark say? Their argument is, "We don't object to educate the children of Dissenters, for we approve of the British and Foreign Society's schools." But mark the fallacy of this pretext. The Honourable Gentlemen admit that they adhere to the British and Foreign Society, not because it educates children of Dissenters, but because it is founded on a principle which is common to the church and to the Dissenters. But will you admit of a school for dissent in England?

[Cries of "No, no!"]

No; the argument of the Honourable Member for Oxford, who, at least, is consistent, is this, — the state only is justified in disseminating truth; and that the doctrines of the Church of England are true, and none other.

Mr. GLADSTONE. — The British and Foreign School is for dissent, and that is admitted.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — The Honourable Member for Oxford argued the other way. Honourable Gentlemen say, — "We will not tolerate the propagation of error." Well, then, are you prepared to be consistent in maintaining your principle? Will you propose the abolition of the annual vote to the College of Maynooth?

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear, hear!"]

The principles upon which the motion of the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire is brought forward, and now avowed by him for the first time, if they lead to anything, lead to the abolition of the grant to Maynooth.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

Is the Noble Lord prepared for this? Is the Right Honourable Member for the University of Cambridge, who has so often, as Secretary for Ireland, proposed this vote, prepared now to abandon it? Is the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, who has so often supported it, or the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke (Sir J. Graham), who has always approved of it — are they now prepared to oppose it? Yet they are now surrounded by a set of cheerers and supporters. I would, in their case, deny that vote altogether. If the arguments of the Honourable Gentlemen opposite are good for anything, they are good to this extent, — that they take upon themselves to decide, absolutely and completely, upon matters, not merely concerning the church establishment — (although the Honourable Gentlemen have endeavoured to confound two things in themselves widely different) — not only on matters of endowment — not only on what relates to property anciently vested in the Church of England (the principles they maintain must go to this extent), and now devoted by law to a specific purpose: but, as to a parliamentary tax drawn from the pockets of the whole people, the principle the Honourable Gentleman the Member for Oxford University has laid down — and he is present, and will correct me if wrong — is this, — that we are not justified in administering a vote like this for the propagation of what you think is a religious error; and I say, the just conclusion to which you must arrive, if you would be consistent, is, — to refuse the vote for Maynooth. That, I say, is not only the necessary, but the inevitable, consequence of the principle now brought forward. Well, then, what becomes of the next argument of the Honourable Member for Newark? The Honourable Gentleman may say that there is a peculiar difficulty in the case of Maynooth. But, Sir, the principles you now contend for are not limited in their operation to the arena of the floor of this House, nor are they limited to the boundaries of this great island on which we live. They are universal; you must follow them out, and carry them on. The Honourable Gentleman who has made so eloquent and admirable a speech has been, himself, Colonial Under Secretary of State; and if his doctrine be good, it should extend to the colonies. Does not the Honourable Member know that there is a Report now on the table — that a Report has been laid before the country — (that country which, according to the Honourable Member, has a conscience, and which is bound to apply that conscience to the discovery of religious truth, and to teach that truth, and nothing but the truth, in the forms of the church which is the church of the majority, and, as we believe, the true church), — which will show the House how, in practice, this principle has been worked out? This paper contains an account of the church establishments maintained in several of our colonies by the public money. It contains four heads: — first, as to grants of money; and, of course, most largely, we support the Church of England; then we give support to the Church of Scotland; in four colonies we give it to the Dutch Church; and in many, many of the colonies, — I am sorry to harrow up the state conscience of any Honourable Member present, — we give money for the support of the Church of Rome.

Mr. SHEIL. — And of the Jews, in Jamaica.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Ay; and, as suggested by my Honourable and Learned Friend below me, there is a provision for instruction in the Jewish religion in the Island of Jamaica. The Honourable Gentleman, as Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, surely ought to have noticed this incident, though, if he had, it would have taken off the edge of many of his arguments. But what becomes of the state conscience now ——

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

— the state conscience, bound only to disseminate truth? The Honourable Gentleman says truth is single. Which, then, of these various forms is the truth? All cannot be the truth ——

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and laughter.]

— and yet you support all. But I will appeal from the fictitious conscience of the state, to the real conscience and the real heart of man, and ask whether we can be justified in leaving the Queen's subjects in distant lands unaided by religious instruction according to their different modes of thinking? When those subjects ask us for assistance, are we to say, "We feel your situation most deeply, but the conscience of the state prevents our giving you any assistance?" But, then, it may be said that this support of instruction, not limited to members of the establishment, to our colonies is one of the terms of capitulation. That is undoubtedly the fact, in some cases; but in all it is not the consequence of the terms of capitulation. There are some of these cases of a very recent period, it is true; others the acts of earlier times; some have been voted in Committee of Supply; but some have received the solemn approval of both branches of the Legislature. I believe, also, — I speak from recollection, and shall be corrected if wrong, — that a provision for supporting the Roman Catholic religion is contained in the India Charter Bill. That Bill received the sanction of both Houses, who were not deterred by any scruples about the "state conscience," the discovery of which was reserved for later times. The Honourable Baronet the Member for Oxford University has used many ingenious arguments to lead us from the real matter, which turns upon the plainest axioms of justice and Christian charity. And I will say that this principle has not merely been affirmed by an annual vote of money in this House, but is affirmed in the India Bill, which passed without objection from the then heads of the church. The Honourable Member will admit their authority, — he will not say they undervalued principle; and yet, to carry out his own argument, he must reject their authority, and the principle on which they acted. But it may be said that these were the acts of former Parliaments, and of the old Whig times. Well, then, I will call the attention of the House to an authority against which there can be no cavil. I had the honour, for a short time, of filling the office of Secretary of State for the colonies, in which my Noble Friend who now sits opposite preceded me. I will not appeal to that Noble Lord's conduct at that time more than to my own. But I will proceed to a very high and distinguished statesman who succeeded me in office. That statesman brought under the consideration of the House — and I presume under that of the Government of which he was a prominent member — a plan for the endowment of Roman Catholic clergymen in New South Wales.

I hold in my hand a despatch written by the distinguished statesman to whom I have alluded on the occasion. It is dated, "Downing Street, 28th Feb. 1835." It proceeds: —

> In reference to my despatch of the 22d of December, apprising you of the intention of Government to appoint four additional Catholic clergymen, I have now the honour to acquaint you that the following gentlemen have been selected, and that 150*l.* are to be allowed to each in aid of their travelling expenses. And you will understand that they will be entitled, from the date of their arrival, to an annual stipend of 150*l.* Dr. Polding is the first selected; he is to officiate as a clergyman, but carries an episcopal authority, and is accompanied by three students, — Messrs. Gregory, Kenna, and Kelly. These latter are candidates for holy orders, but at present only qualified to act as catechists. It is desirable that Dr. Polding should exercise a salutary influence over these clergymen, and I beg you will contrive some means for that purpose. Yours, &c., > ABERDEEN.

It is true that the arrangements were commenced under my eye, but were not complete when I delivered over my office to Lord Aberdeen; but the Noble Lord gives, in this despatch, his entire and unqualified assent to the proposition; and, by so doing, must, according to the Honourable Gentleman, have been instrumental in violating the principles of the conscience of the state, and become a party to the propagation of error, and to the backing of pestilent Popish doctrines in that colony. And the Honourable Member, then, unless he can show that the state conscience can be confined within certain degrees of latitude and longitude, — unless he can point out a line of demarcation for religious truth, — must admit that he, himself, and those who acted with him in office, have been guilty of violating that conscience, and been parties to the acts he now complains of. The Honourable Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) was Under Secretary of State at the time. What became of the scruples of the state conscience on that occasion? If you adopt the principle of the Honourable Member, you must retrace your steps; you must join the Honourable Member for Oxford University, in opposing the vote for Maynooth; — that Honourable Gentleman is consistent, he systematically opposes those grants; — and even where the grants are the consequence of Acts of Parliament, you must, according to the principle of the Honourable Member for Newark, immediately propose their repeal. You object to instruction in what you conceive to be error; therefore you are bound to propose the repeal of the East India Charter Bill, so far as it makes provision for Roman Catholic instruction. You are bound to revise your colonial policy, to alter all your colonial establishments, and to declare that all past legislation of a liberal character has been founded in error, — that it strikes at the conscience of the state, as well as at the conscience of individuals, — and that you must pursue, henceforth, an entirely different line of policy. But, Sir, it is not on these grounds that I object to this principle: I object altogether to the assertion, that the education of the people belongs exclusively to the clergy of the established church. I deny that as a principle, above all, when raised and supported as it now is. I am aware that petitions have been presented on the subject. I think that those petitions should be carefully weighed as well as numbered; and that Honourable Gentlemen should pay some attention to the contents of petitions, as well as to the places from which they come. I find that there have been presented to this House 242 petitions, with 26,603 signatures, against any scheme of education not founded on the principles of the established church. I would say that these petitions are consistent, for they agree exactly with the reasoning adopted on the opposite side. They are perfectly consistent with the principles avowed by my Honourable Friend the Member for Oxford University, who will not support any scheme from which the church is to be excluded. I regret that that Honourable Member has left the House. When the Honourable Gentleman taxed the Government with insincerity and delusion, — with saying one thing and meaning another, and similar hard language, — I felt much hurt, not because I am not pretty well used to hard language, but because, on this occasion, it has come from a gentleman for whom I entertain the highest respect. That Honourable Member has charged the Government with saying one thing and meaning another, — with endeavouring to accomplish, by a side wind, that which we could not venture to do directly. Now, Sir, I must, in the strongest language which parliamentary courtesy will admit of, deny the correctness of the charge. On the other hand, I do charge Noble Lords and Honourable Gentlemen opposite with raising one point for discussion, when the real point is a totally different question. Let it be known in this House, — let it be understood out of the House, — that religious truth commands that we should give no education except on the principles of the established church, and that we are now called upon to place the whole education of all the youth of this country exclusively in the hands of the clergy of that church. Now, I contravene the principles which my Noble Friend has shadowed out.

LORD STANLEY. — No!

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — The Noble Lord says "No!" What, then, did the Noble Lord mean by his quotations from ancient laws, — his extract from Holt, — "that the schoolmaster should be of sound doctrine, and under the control of the Ordinary?" My Noble Friend is too acute a reasoner, too practised a debater, to allow anything to slip from him, carelessly. The Noble Lord, when he made his quotation from the laws of Henry IV. in Norman French, — I am glad that the Noble Lord could not find them extant in English, — when he advanced the proposition that "La doctrine et information des enfens est chose spirituelle," — his meaning was, that the children of this kingdom should be confided to the clergy of the established church.

[Cries of "Hear, hear, hear!"]

My opinion is, that the education of the children of the church should be given to the church; and let any man, in this House or elsewhere, oppose that principle, and I will be the man to support it. My wish is, to preserve complete superiority to the established church.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

I do not understand those cheers. We have hitherto endeavoured to discuss this question in a fair and dispassionate manner, and I trust we shall still continue to do so. My wish is, to give to the established church the uncontroverted use of its spiritual functions. I think the clergy of that church have a right to claim entire support, protection, and encouragement from the state; but the present is not a time in which I wish to see the clergy take any steps, or be induced to take any steps, of an oppressive character. I am far from inferring that the clergymen should not enter the schools. I believe there is no higher or more important duty which a clergyman can be called on to perform than attending in his own schools; but I will not admit that the clergy ought to have the schools under their exclusive guidance and control. When the First Report of the Education Commissioners for Ireland was presented, one of the suggestions offered was, that clergymen of the established church should visit every school in their respective parishes, within a certain time; but that was most rationally objected to by an intelligent gentleman, himself a Protestant clergyman. He said, "You must not put this duty on us. Leave us to do it of our own free will. Our proper duty is our spiritual duty, and we should not be encumbered with this." I know that it is difficult to attract the attention of the House after such a lengthened debate as has already taken place on this subject; I shall, therefore, confine what I have to say within the narrowest possible limits. Much reference has been made to the number of petitions which have been laid on the table of the House on this subject; and I wish to call the attention of the House to a few facts respecting the getting up of those petitions. I feel sure that Honourable Gentlemen opposite are totally unconnected with the base and disgraceful delusions under the influence of which many of those petitions have been prepared I will undertake to prove that cards have been circulated containing charges against the Government, of latitudinarianism, infidelity, and other crimes, as connected with the present plan. Now, when we come to reason on the subject in this House, we are only charged with "wounding the conscience of the state." This array of crime is not here charged against us. But I say, let those charges come from whence they may, — let Honourable Gentlemen go to the people of England and tell them the truth; — tell them, that they claim that the whole education of the country should be intrusted to the clergy of the established church, — and then let them get the people to sign their petitions, if they can, on the true grounds. I am the last man in the House to undervalue petitions; but I can show the House, on better authority than my own, that there are occasions on which petitions are got up, — particularly on religious matters, — as to which neither the character of the getters-up or the suggestors will stand the test of inquiry. There has been, for instance, a petition got up by clergymen of the University of Oxford on a subject relating to the church. Now, that is a petition in which, above all others, we might expect to find truth, learning, and conclusive reasoning; but no such thing: it appears, as has been stated by a high authority, "that the Right Reverend Prelate presiding for many years over the see of Exeter can command as many petitions, of this nature, from his clergy, as he chooses to call for."

Digitized by Google

[Cries of "Oh, oh, oh!"]

The House will ask on whose authority I state this? I will tell them; but will read another sentence first: —

"On the subject of petitions generally bearing on church subjects, I must say that, if the parties who oppose the Bill"—(it was the Church Discipline Bill) — "are no better informed than the clergy of Oxford on the subject, I trust their opposition will have very little weight."

He concludes in the following words: —

I entertain the strictest conviction that the petitions which come before you on this subject are full of misstatements, but, certainly, misstatements made without a disposition to deceive. I give these petitioners credit for a wish to support the church; but it will be for the House to judge of the allegations, and to judge, also, of the wisdom, justice, and expediency of complying with the prayers of persons who, however respectable, betray such total ignorance of the real facts of the case on which they petition.

These were petitions from the divines of Oxford, presented against the Church Discipline Bill; and the words which I have quoted are attributed, in a printed book, — I know not with how much correctness, — to his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury. He states that the petitioners may be very well informed persons, but still they are ignorant of the facts of the case about which they petition, and he warns the House of Lords against giving much credit to their statements.

I wish, now, very shortly, to apply myself to the four principal objections taken by my Noble Friend to the present Government plan; and I take upon myself to say, that I think I shall be able to give some answer to each and all of those objections. My Noble Friend's first objection was to the mode of proceeding. He says, — and his words have been repeated in the debate, — that he objects to this vote as the proceeding of only one branch of the Legislature. The Noble Lord has stigmatised it as nearly an unconstitutional proceeding. Why, if we wanted an authority on this subject, it is furnished by the proceedings of the Noble Lord himself. What was his course when he introduced his system of education for Ireland?

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

He proposed, and carried a vote through the House of Commons. He did not require the assistance of the other branch of the Legislature; yet, now, he raises an outcry to prop up his absurd delusion, and condemns us as unconstitutional for taking the course he formerly took, himself. But what is still more extraordinary, still more fanciful, still more extravagant, the Noble Lord says we should obtain by this vote the power of establishing an irresponsible tribunal. Why, if ever there was a responsible tribunal, it must be the one now proposed to be formed. It is to be formed by vote of the House, and is one which the House can at any time address the Crown to have removed. But that is not all. My Noble Friend might have some foundation for his argument, if the vote were to be a charge on the Consolidated Fund; but, here, the responsibility will be increased by the money being to be raised by an annual vote. Here, then, is a double responsibility, where my Noble Friend says, that, in point of fact, there is no responsibility; but, perhaps, on the principle that two negatives make an affirmative, my Noble Friend contends that two responsibilities are equal to no responsibility! My Noble Friend goes further; he has promised to expose to the House what he is pleased to call the insidious designs of the Whig Government. He has promised to show these most dangerous designs, lurking in the minute. The Noble Lord urged that the final clause, which is to be added, may contain something that will harrow up the soul of Protestant England. But can my Noble Friend, who has prepared so many Bills, not recollect that such a clause is added to every Bill? There can be nothing more absurd than not reserving to the Council the usual power of altering and amending. But then the Noble Lord urges that Government might go beyond their powers at a time when Parliament should not be sitting. Now, if Government could be so knavish——

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and laughter from the Opposition benches.]

I should like to know what I am to understand by that cheer? If it be intended to apply that term to those who sit on this side of the House, I will take the liberty of stating to the Honourable Gentlemen opposite, that those who are most prone to suspect are generally the most open to suspicion themselves. Do they not know that the minute could at any time be called for, by the House? and do they not think that, if treachery were intended, there would be an enormous lack of wisdom in such treachery? However Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House may doubt the motives of Government, they might at least trust to our discretion. I have but two words more to say. The principle which has been openly avowed by some, and avowed by inference by all, as forming the great objection to the plan, is one for which, undoubtedly, I can find an authority, which I will make a present of to whomsoever shall succeed me in the debate. The words of that authority are,—

> That the religious education of the people is a duty solely and exclusively belonging to the spiritual authorities of the church, and which the pastors of the church cannot resign into other hands without a breach of duty to their Divine Founder.

This is the principle for which Honourable Gentlemen contend, and these are the words of Dr. M'Hale, under whose banners they are now fighting, and whose authority they quote. It has been said that the principle of united instruction is but a dream; and that the Wesleyan Methodists, and other denominations of Christians, have objected to these minutes of Council because they tend to a united education. I believe there is at least one Honourable Gentleman opposite, who was, many years ago, present along with me at a meeting of the British and Foreign School Society in 1822, on the subject of education, in which the late Mr. Wilberforce took part; and I will trouble the House with a short passage from what Mr. Wilberforce said on that occasion. Mr. Wilberforce said,—

> It has been truly said by those who went before me that we might triumph in getting the better of those little distinctions which keep us asunder, not each sacrificing his own principles, but exercising the Protestant right of judgment, and leaving all to form their own conclusions. It is delightful to see that in this way men of different sects can unite together for the prosecution of their projects for the amelioration of society. In this way, when I unite with persons of a very different kind of persuasion from myself, it affords an augmented degree of pleasure. I seem to rise into a higher nature—into a purer air,—I feel dissolved from all fetters that before bound me, and delight in that blessed liberty of love which carries all other blessings with it.

Digitized by Google

This was Mr. Wilberforce's opinion. He did not object to joining in the good work with the Dissenters. There is one other observation upon which great stress has been laid. It is objected that, under the proposed system, there will be an inequality in the system of distribution. I wish, here, that the House would bear in mind that the deviation made from the original Treasury minute was made under the Government of the Right Honourable Baronet (Sir Robert Peel), when a grant was given to a school at Liverpool, at the suggestion of the Noble Lord the Member for that borough, who, I take it for granted, will vote against the present motion. This deviation I did not object to, for it was sanctioned by the recommendation of a committee; but it utterly refutes the objection to the present plan, on the ground of its giving power "to vary the grants" which shall be made. The discretion hitherto confided to the Board of Treasury, it is now proposed to transfer to the Council. That, says the Honourable Gentleman opposite, is all wrong. But suppose it had been the other way, and that the power was proposed to be vested in the Treasury, and taken from the Council. Now, of this board, of the administration of which the Honourable Gentleman entirely approves, a distinguished and most useful member is a Roman Catholic. But then it may be said, "The regulations of the British and Foreign Society make it safe to trust a Roman Catholic; but we can no longer place faith in a body freed from that responsibility." Now, my answer to that assertion is, — and I call the attention of the Honourable Member for Kilmarnock particularly to the point, — that the board has administered, for nearly three years, a grant of 10,000*l.* a-year to Scotland, without limit, without control, without rule, or without regulation to fetter them; and I ask whether there has been a single petition against — whether there has been one word of complaint uttered as to — the mode in which this privilege has been exercised by a body, one prominent member of which is a Roman Catholic? I have endeavoured to show that there is no force, no real force, in the objections to this plan. But I will tell you what effect they are meant to have. They have the power of raising a church cry in the country. Let the Honourable Gentlemen whom I see ranged on the bench opposite beware, lest they are calling into activity a power which they will hereafter wish to see checked. I will say, Sir, there is no subject of any kind introduced into this House with regard to which a church cry is not raised. We cannot get a clause in a prison Bill passed —— — without exciting the suspicion of the champions of the church. Yes; we cannot get a clause, the principles of which the Noble Lord (Lord Stanley) has expressed his approval of, proposed, without exciting the pious horrors of his supporters.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!"]

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

Why don't you cheer now? If Honourable Gentlemen opposite are prepared to say that every one of our debates should partake of a religious character, let us at once desist from applying ourselves to the performance of our highest and best functions, for by this course such an outcry will be raised on every occasion throughout the country as totally to incapacitate this House for temperate deliberation or sound decisions. I have thought it necessary to state my views on this question, because I am persuaded that if, at the present moment, and under existing circumstances, the state does not perform the duty of supplying education to the people, the danger to the state itself is infinite — is incalculable. Why, Sir, you know it — you feel it, — that on matters apparently the least germane to the subject, the question of education is inevitably introduced. You cannot touch on the factory question — you cannot touch on the poor laws — you cannot touch on the state of the criminal law, illustrating, as it does, the deplorable ignorance of the people — you cannot discuss a question relating to the clergy (the active and invaluable religious instructors of the nation, as they are disposed, and ought to be) — without sending before you, the pioneer of education. And yet the course you now take is marked by the gall, the bitterness, the misrepresentation and exaggeration of party politics and party excitement! I hope you will not succeed on a division; but if you do, you will be enabled to boast that you have retarded the progress of education for a longer period than it is possible, now, to anticipate.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — If I consulted my own convenience, I should not venture to rise to address the House at this hour; but, Sir, I feel the importance of the present occasion to be such, that I should not like to give a silent vote; and, inasmuch as we, on this side of the House, have been challenged to state, frankly, our opinions, I, not presuming to speak for any other individual than myself, shall state exactly those feelings which impel me to support the motion of my Noble Friend. Sir, as this debate, protracted as it has been, has proceeded, the magnitude of its subject has increased palpably to my view. I am disposed to consider it one of the most important subjects that has ever been debated since I have had the honour to hold a seat in the House. I will not dissemble, for a moment, that I so regard it. I shall not, at this hour, trouble the House with any details of the plan introduced by her Majesty's Government: That part of the subject has been already treated with great ability and perspicuity by those who have preceded me; and I should only repeat the arguments they have used, without adding to their strength, if I were to dwell on this part of the question. But, Sir, I was especially struck by the able, explicit, frank, and manly speeches made by the Honourable Member for Lambeth, and the Right Honourable Judge of the Court of Admiralty, in the course of the two preceding evenings of the debate. They did not rest this matter on details, but opened distinct principles of vast import and general application, on which they rested their support of one or other of the Ministerial measures. Whilst they addressed the House, it appeared to me that the Government acquiesced in these principles; and this evening the speech of the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer convinces me that I did not misunderstand the concurrence which they so gave. Now, before I address myself to this important subject, allow me to comment for a moment on an observation which fell from the Honourable Member for Lambeth with regard to the speech of the Noble Lord who introduced this motion. That Honourable Member, resting his charge, I think, on two reports of two different speeches made by my Noble Friend in 1834, with regard to the admission of Dissenters to the University of Cambridge, and combining the two, endeavoured to fasten some inconsistency on my Noble Friend, and charged him with having slipped away from his principles. Now, I may be, perhaps, a partial friend of that Noble Lord. I feel quite sure that the Noble Lord states his opinions at all times with that boldness which a singleness of purpose, and honesty of conviction, combined with natural talent, never fail to inspire; and the Noble Lord attacks adverse opinions with impetuous eagerness; but I do think that if there be any charge to which my Noble Friend might, with confidence, plead not guilty, it is that of "slipping away from his principles." And when the heat of the present moment shall have subsided, and impartial history shall write the character of my Noble Friend, I think it will be recorded of him that power, place, ambition — all those ties which generally influence and sway the minds of men — had been broken through, when their tendency was to fetter his discretion on matters of principle connected with religion, in a way which his heart and conscience could not approve of. I beg pardon of the House for what may appear a slight digression; but when it is remembered that my Noble Friend will not have an opportunity of replying, I am sure I shall be excused for referring to the grounds on which the harsh charge of "slipping away from his principles" has been preferred against my Noble Friend, and for referring to what my Noble Friend said in June, 1834, and which was entirely omitted by the Honourable Gentleman the Member for Lambeth (Mr. Hawes).

My object in supporting the principle of the Bill is, to remove the test which now impedes the course of the dissenting student; but I do not wish to interfere with the future statutes of the universities, provided they do not impose this test. I cannot admit, and I hope my Honourable Friend does not contend, that it should be in the power of Dissenters to claim that the statutes should be void because they may in some manner appear to obstruct the privileges given them by this Bill. But I should not be content unless a provision is inserted in the Bill, that no degree should enable any person to enjoy any privileges or right to make him a member of the governing body, or give him privileges in the universities, without the subscription of such test as may be required, which test the universities should be entitled to frame. I know not whether the House will agree with me, but I think the principle which I wish to establish is plain and obvious. I would give to the Dissenters the benefit of instruction, but take away the possibility of evil consequences resulting to the universities, by depriving the Dissenters of all management and control of them.

Since I have advocated the admission of Dissenters to the university, I will not deny or conceal from the House that circumstances have since occurred which in some degree altered the opinion which I held at first. I am bound to say that, from the tone they have held, from the pretensions they have put forward, both in and out of the House, and from the ultimate intentions openly avowed by members of their own body, I am justified in looking with jealousy at the measures brought forward for the purpose of promoting the views of the Dissenters.

That was the opinion of my Noble

Digitized by Google

Friend in 1834. Now, I should like to know what are the views of my Noble Friend in 1839, since the views and intentions of the Dissenters have been more fully developed. What is the real origin of this motion, but an intention to accede to the views of the Dissenters? Since the year 1834, three several attacks have been made by the Dissenters on the established church:—first, as to the universities; next, as to the church rates; and now, as to the scheme of education. And what is the course pursued, avowedly, by the Dissenters? They have first endeavoured to reduce the church to a level with dissent, and now take the opposite course, and seek, by putting in a claim to endowments, to raise dissent to a level with the church But if my Noble Friend looked with jealousy at the views of Dissenters in 1834, what must he feel now, when he hears their purpose frankly stated, and distinctly avowed, by Members of this House? I think I took down the words of the Honourable Member for Lambeth correctly; and he avowed a principle no other than this,—that all sects had a right to be educated by the aid of the public purse, and that such education should be given to every sect in its own particular creed.

Mr. HAWES.—No, no!

SIR JAMES GRAHAM.—So I understood the Honourable Member. I am open to correction, if wrong.

Mr. HAWES.—If the House will allow me, I will explain. What I intended to say, and I believe what I really did say, was, that the state was undoubtedly bound to educate all the Queen's subjects; but I did not say that it should be in their particular creeds, but that a general education should be given by the state, leaving it to the parties themselves to obtain instruction in their own respective religious doctrines, through the inculcation of their own particular pastors.

SIR J. GRAHAM.—Then I understand the Honourable Gentleman to say that the state is bound to give general education at the public expense,—but leaving each sect to receive religious instruction from its own pastors, or whatever other quarters it may. But that is not the plan of the Government; by the plan, as originally propounded by the Government, normal schools were to be established, where, in the person of the same teacher, moral and religious instruction was to be given. But the doctrine of the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman I could not mistake; that all sects have a right to be instructed at the public charge by their own instructors.

DOCTOR LUSHINGTON.—No!

SIR JAMES GRAHAM.—That was what my Right Honourable and Learned Friend thought constituted national education. According to my Right Honourable Friend, national education is not available unless combined with religious instruction, and that must be provided, in the creed of the party, at the public expense, or with the aid of the public purse, and that aid must be given without distinction of religious creed. Such was the proposition of the Right Honourable Member for the Tower Hamlets, and to that proposition the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has assented. Now, mark! and here is the difficulty in this matter. If this principle be adopted and acted upon,—if the Government arrive at this conclusion,—I say there ceases to be any creed favoured by the state as a national religion? The Honourable Member for Newark proposed a question, which the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has carefully avoided. The question was this,—and it yet remains unanswered,—"if you apply aid from the public purse to the education of the youth of the country in dissenting principles, how can you refuse similar aid to the instruction of the adult population? If aid is to be granted to dissenting teachers, how can it be denied to dissenting chapels; and if you endow Socinian schools, how can you refuse endowments to Socinian chapels?" The Honourable Member for Kilkenny shakes his head; I am afraid he has spoken, and that the House cannot have the benefit of his answer. I should like, however, to have some answer to this question from the other side. It has been said that the poverty of particular districts constitutes a claim. But I hold that a large parish, with a large population, at a distance from the parish church, has a stronger right to aid from the public purse than any dissenting chapel. What must be the inevitable effect of this? If you admit these queries, you must admit the inevitable conclusion,—that all religious creeds stand equally with the state; and if you admit that, I say that, on these premises and on this conclusion, the consequence will be, that everything we now reverence and value must be lost and overthrown! I say that the exclusive right of the spiritual Peers to sit in the House of Lords can no longer be defended; the exclusive right of the church to collegiate endowment can no longer be defended; the coronation oath can no longer be defended; the exclusion of Roman Catholics from the highest judicial seats, and from the Privy Council, can no longer be defended; and the established faith of the island may cease to be Protestant, and the Legislature of the country may cease to be Protestant. I cannot find that in this proposition of the Government there is any limit of this aid, even to the profession of Christianity; on the contrary, the argument of the Honourable Member for Lambeth and of the Right Honourable Member for the Tower Hamlets — and not only the tendency of the argument, but the positive assertion of the latter — goes to this extent, — that the state would be justified in teaching Jews, and even Mohammedans, and followers of every religion, without exception, however wild and extravagant, in their own particular creeds, at the public expense. It has been pressed on us by the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that I and my Honourable Friends near me are too late in our opposition to this principle; and, arguing from certain extreme points, he contends that we have already violated the principle that our established religion, alone, should receive the favour of the state; and he has asked us on what grounds we are prepared to justify the parliamentary grant in support of the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth? I take it that that is a sufficient ground of justification, which is also the one that I have often heard repeated by the Right Honourable Gentleman himself, — which was assigned for it, at the time of the union between the two countries. Then, as to the cases of a large number of our colonies, — and the Right Honourable Gentleman has referred especially to the grant to New South Wales for Roman Catholics; — why, does not the Right Honourable Gentleman know that by far the major part of the grants which are appropriated to the support of religion in the colonies, are defrayed out of the colonial funds? But I admit that the cases which the Right Honourable Gentleman has cited do trench upon the principle which I maintain. Another Honourable Gentleman has referred to the mixed system of education now in operation under the direction of the National Board in Ireland. I must say that, in my opinion, this plan has not been very successful. I think it has failed. But I must, as relates to a mixed scheme, contend, that there is bad faith displayed on the other side of the House by the analogy sought to be drawn between the plan as applying to this country, and this question founded on the National Education Board in Ireland. When matters affecting the established church are brought on in reference to Ireland, you appeal to the special circumstances of the case, and tell us of the great disproportion between the numbers of the establishment, and of the religious creed of the people; and under those special circumstances you call for our assent to a measure which is a deviation from the strict rule; and I acknowledge, that, pressed by the force of those special circumstances, we have frequently consented, and admitted that relaxation. But now, in arguing this question, you draw an analogy as regards Ireland, and press on us our former concessions, and you call on us to follow out in England that deviation from strict principle which, under special circumstances, only, we have agreed to, as to Ireland. My Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer says, "Retrace your steps." That is precisely the thing he knows to be impossible. But as it is impossible for us to retrace our steps, let us, at least, be cautious how we take a single step in advance of the position in which we at present stand.

My Right Honourable Friend says, also, that, on this side of the House, we have got up excitement on this question by concealment. He has argued that we have avoided placing the matter before the public on its real bearings; and he calls upon us to avow the truth, — to let it be fairly known to the country that the ground on which we oppose the plan of her Majesty's Government is, that we contend that the clergy of the established church have the exclusive right to conduct the education of all the people. My Noble Friend who has moved the Address to her Majesty to rescind the Order in Council never maintained such an argument. It would be quite impossible that any one, who, in his legislative capacity, had agreed to the plan of Lord Althorp, could argue for such a principle. The plan of that Noble Lord authorised the appropriation of the funds of the state towards the support of the British and Foreign School and the National School Societies. By the principles contained in the plan of Lord Althorp I am prepared to abide. That plan is not generally understood; but a reference to the minutes will prove that the money to be given to the schools conducted on the principles of these two societies was not granted directly for the purposes of education. The plan of Lord Althorp did not sanction the appropriation of the public money for the purposes of education, directly, to those schools. It merely authorised them to receive grants of the public money for the purpose of building schools under particular rules and conditions. The grant under that plan is, therefore, neither more nor less than a mere outlay of money to those societies. The matter is a mere vouching of accounts; and the state, under that plan, makes no interference whatever with the matter of the system of education taught in those schools which may be so built by the aid of Government money. And so long as the Government adhere to the principles there laid down,—so long as the grant, in every case, is confined to the amount contributed by individuals, — and so long as the purpose and limitations of Lord Althorp's plan are observed,—I have nothing to say; but I am not prepared, in the present state of this controversy, to advance one step beyond the line of demarcation therein contained.

A good deal has been said on the subject of public opinion in the course of this discussion. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin has evinced something like a disposition to depreciate the expression of public opinion expressed in opposition to the plan of her Majesty's Government. He has said that the petitions which have been so presented are paltry in the number of signatures attached; and my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has stated that they contain vague and absurd conclusions; that they have been got up under false impressions and misrepresentations, and are not to be regarded. But if such be the opinion of the Government, — if they really consider that the popular feeling has not been strongly, fairly, and irresistibly expressed, — let me ask what has induced them to withdraw their original plan? Was that a voluntary act? or were they compelled to it? But is it really given up? Is it, in fact, abandoned? or merely postponed for further consideration, to be renewed the moment the present excitement and pressure shall have subsided, and a more fitting opportunity shall occur for its revival? Why, Sir, if this vote be carried, there is nothing to prevent her Majesty's Ministers from carrying out their abandoned plan within three months from the present time. My Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has argued that my Noble Friend the Member for North Lancashire was in error when he said that this proposal was to place the grant under the discretionary power of an irresponsible tribunal. My Right Honourable Friend argues that the Committee of the Privy Council are not irresponsible. I, on the other hand, maintain that if you consent to give the Committee of the Privy Council the control of the public money, you will, with your eyes open, vest it in the hands of persons possessed of a perfectly despotic and arbitrary power. What can be more thoroughly irresponsible than the plan proposed? They are no longer to be tied down by the rules which have been prescribed in relation to the grants to the British and Foreign and National School Societies; but there is now to be an express irresponsible discretionary power reserved, to give a portion of the public money, to any amount within the limit of the whole, to such schools as the committee may see fit, without distinction or preference of religious creed or private contribution. I should have wished to have trespassed at greater length on the attention of the House, had I addressed it at an earlier hour; but there are one or two points, which have presented themselves in the course of the debate, to which I am desirous still more particularly to refer. I must, however, be allowed, first, to observe, that nothing is so painful to me as to discuss in this House, or in any popular assembly, questions of theological controversy; and it would be especially painful to me to do so irreverently, or in a way that might, by possibility, wound the feelings of any man. I know there is a great diversity of opinion upon this subject, both in this House and in the country, and nothing would grieve me more than to give pain to others. But it has been asked, what is meant by "truth?" It is the duty of the state (you say) to uphold true religion; and then the question is put,—What does that imply? What, in fact, is true religion, or the "truth?" No one can admit more distinctly than I am prepared to do, that no one sect has a right to assume the knowledge of the truth in a manner offensive to the other portions of the community. I am ready to contend that man is not responsible to his fellow man for the nature of his religious opinions. For those opinions and those sentiments he is answerable to his Creator alone. I glory in the name of Protestant, notwithstanding certain Tracts for the Times that have been alluded to; and it is a ground of proud pre-eminence in the Protestant creed, that it repudiates all interference with the peculiar belief of any man, and leaves every one perfectly free to his own private interpretation and judgment of the sacred truth. This is the true ground of toleration, — that man is not responsible to man, and that it is presumptuous for any man to say that the creed of his fellow man is false. I will not detain the House by a detail of what are the principles of an established religion. It is enough to remark that those principles are adverse to the admission of the plan of her Majesty's Government. This plan views no religious creed with favour; it goes to admit an equality of right for state endowment to all. The moment this doctrine is admitted, a paramount state religion is at an end. Now, in this country, the state has chosen the religion of the established church to represent the Government in religion; but in selecting that particular creed, the state still permits each individual to be guided, in matters of belief, entirely by the dictates of his own conscience. The moment, then, you go beyond this, and admit the right of the civil magistrate to apply the public money, not in accordance with this view, but as circumstances and his discretion may seem to warrant, then you put an end to the established church, — the existence of which I believe to be essential to the peace, the happiness, and prosperity of the entire community. Such opinions are not inconsistent with perfect toleration; for perfect toleration is satisfied by an admission of all classes to a full participation in the civil rights of citizenship, without reference to religious creed. But go one step beyond this,— apply it to religious matters,— and you admit a principle inconsistent with the maintenance of an established church; — the essential principle of which is, — preference by the state to one religious creed, without any interference with the rights of conscience in others.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear, hear!"]

I will state my opinions without concealment, whether they be acceptable to the House, or not. I am prepared to go to the extent of complete toleration. To this extent I think we have already gone in this country, and somewhat beyond it. To recede, now, is impossible. That is undeniable. But to advance a step further would be, in my view, most imprudent, especially when we consider the avowed latitude of sentiment of Honourable Gentlemen opposite, and which, on this question, at least, seems to be adopted by her Majesty's Government. I know there are many persons who think they can accommodate the difficulty attending the application of those doctrines, as regards a state religion, by the adoption of a middle course, and that they are able to introduce a kind of arbitrator between God and man; but such opinions I deem visionary and impracticable. The great characteristic of the present day — the prevailing national evil — is a constant thirst for change and love of innovation, which stamps the features of the restless and superficial generation to which we belong. I say, then, we ought to proceed with peculiar caution. I do not think the Government, generally, is a matter of compromise; but compromise in religion is inadmissible, since not temporal, but eternal interests are at stake. I am for encouraging, by private means, a system of education; but I am afraid it would be difficult to adopt any system of national education upon a combined plan. It is strictly true that the experiment has been tried abroad, and has signally failed.

[Cries of "No, no!"]

It has failed in Prussia; but I will not go into that subject, as both the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin and the Honourable Member for Waterford (Mr. Wyse) have admitted that it has been abandoned abroad as impracticable; and now it is about to be adopted here. I believe, however, that if it be adopted, the most lamentable evils will result from it. And, after all, what is the religion of the state? I will say, in the presence of the Honourable Gentleman opposite, and I am sure it will not be denied, that religion is one of the pillars of civil government: if you shake that pillar, you shake the Government; and if you overthrow it, you destroy the Government under which we live.

[Cries of "Divide!"]

As the House is impatient to divide, I will detain them no further. But my earnest desire is, that this proposition of the Government, which I look upon as dangerous, should now, and at once, be intercepted by a vote of the House. I agree with my Noble Friend (Lord Stanley) that the objection is not as to the vote of money; the root of the evil consists in the Committee of the Privy Council. Whilst this exists, there will be no security; and I therefore am most anxious that the House should humbly address her Majesty, praying her to rescind the Order in Council appointing that committee——

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

——believing that by that course she will best consult the temporal and eternal interests of the people.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — At an earlier period of the debate I should certainly have thought it my duty to endeavour to vindicate the plan of education proposed by the Government from the various and numerous misstatements and misrepresentations to which it has been subjected in the course of the present discussion; but their great variety and number deter me from entering on the task, and I feel, at this late period of the debate, that I shall trespass sufficiently, if not more than sufficiently, on the time of the House, in calling their attention to the principles which have been called in question by one side and the other, and endeavour to show how far those principles are contained, or not, in the plan under the consideration of the House. The Right Honourable Baronet who has just sat down has, I think, very incompletely, and very inefficiently, answered the arguments of my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Right Honourable Gentleman has — not fully, I admit — but, I think, by implication — answered the question whether it is now to be asserted that the principle to be hereafter declared and maintained by him and those who agree with him on the other side, that no system of education is henceforth to be supported or encouraged by the state, except that which is under the control of the clergy of the Church of England. The Right Honourable Baronet, I say, very nearly arrives at that conclusion; because, while he professes the principle of toleration to all sects, he says, in the same breath, that he will consent to no grant of the public money for the purpose of affording instruction in dissenting principles, or any instruction other than that which is consistent with the doctrines of the established church. Sir, from that principle I totally and entirely dissent. You may adopt the principle laid down by the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire, deduced from the enlightened times of Henry IV., — that to the church, and to the church only, should be left the education of the people; but by that must be meant an education conducted as the church would have conducted it, and supported and maintained by her own estates, her own funds, her own colleges, and without asking in a Committee of Supply for a vote of the public money, which at that period would not have been asked for. But when once you establish the principle, — which, by calling for a grant of the public money, I think you have established, — that education ought to be promoted by grants of the public money, and say that out of the public taxes should come the funds for the support of education, and the improvement and promotion of schools, — then I maintain it is no longer consistent with public justice, that any person, on account of his religion, should be debarred from the benefit of the public grant, and that because you give them means which at the time may be unpopular, and because you object to their mode of faith; that therefore you should debar them from deriving those effects and those advantages from the public money, which you take indiscriminately from their wealth, their means, and their resources, as well as from the resources of those who are members of the established church.

In asserting this to be the principle which I maintain, I do not think that I am departing, in the least, from the true and just principles of an established church. I hold that, having an established church, she may, in all her church places where her ministers can do so, very properly adopt the teaching of the established religion; but I do not think that schools supported by the state should come under that denomination: therefore, while I applaud and admire the efforts of the church during the last year to promote education, I utterly deny that any grant of public money should be bound by any such principle, or be confined to any such exclusive religion. I think it is legal and just in the members of the church to say that it is necessary to teach their own doctrines in their own schools; but I deny that, in proposing a grant of the public money for the purpose of general education, we are to be bound by any such principles, or that we are to lay down any such exclusive rule. It is a different matter in what respect, too, this principle is to be carried into effect. There were certain objections made to the first plan of the Government; but let it be observed that one of the main objections, and which the Noble Lord opposite stated in the commencement of his address to the House, but which was founded entirely in misapprehension, was an objection founded on the notion that the principle with regard to the teaching of religion which was to be adopted in the normal schools was to be the principle and model of all the schools in the kingdom. Now on that subject I will venture to read a passage from a speech that was delivered by me in this House in February last, when I gave an outline of the scheme of education I intended to propose. I said, —

It must, I think, be obvious, that any Government attempting any scheme of education would find it very difficult to do so, because the ground has already been partially occupied in parts of the kingdom by societies who have already taken the subject in hand, as also in parts by the established church, and in parts by the Wesleyan Methodist and other dissenting societies, who all promote courses of education according to their own religious opinions. I think, therefore, that it would be impossible to frame any one scheme of education which should supersede and embrace the objects of all those schemes and institutions already in operation. I think that such a thing could not be done without offering a degree of violence to the feelings of the people of this country, unsuited to the character of our constitution, and likely to render such a scheme unsuccessful, if attempted.*

And yet, notwithstanding this passage, which, I think, contains a clear declaration of our intentions and opinions, it has been represented that such was the scheme of the normal schools, and that those were to form the model of all the other schools in the country. Some Honourable Gentlemen have talked very much of the difficulty of carrying into effect any scheme of religious instruction which should be suited to schools, and at the same time adapted to each particular sect; and the Noble Lord the Member for Dorset spoke for about half an hour as to the term "general religion," his only objection being that the term "general religion" was not to be found in any part of the plan against which he was speaking. But this difficulty, which appears to be considered of such magnitude, is already overcome in many of the schools of this kingdom; not only by the British and Foreign School Society, to which I have for many years belonged, and whose principles I adopt, but by many of the established church. I have been told that in these schools the rule is, that the Scriptures shall be read on the week days, and the examination in the Church Catechism be reserved for Sundays, so that Dissenters may send their children to their own places of instruction on the Sabbath. So far, therefore, from this being an insurmountable difficulty, it is one that is overcome every week in the year, not only by those whose plan the Government are said to adopt because it is not religious, but by clergymen of the established church, who wish to instruct the people of their parish, and yet make allowance for the opinions of Dissenters, without uncharitably excluding them from their schools. I do not wish to go into the phrases that have been objected to with regard to the first plan; but I am ready to declare that the principles on which that plan was founded were sound, and I am ready to defend the mode in which it was proposed to carry that scheme into effect.

* See MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT, Sess. 1839, p. 137. col. i.

But Honourable Gentlemen have, in this House, gone far beyond what is said by the ministers of the established church. We have been told, in this debate, as a proof of the irreligious tendency of the scheme, that anything might be taught in the schools which did not apply to the Church of England or any particular dissenting sect. Do Honourable Members mean to say that there can be no religious instruction except that which carefully marks the distinction between members of the Church of England, the Wesleyans, and other Dissenters? Now, there is one book which I think no person will object to my quoting; it is Dr. Paley's Evidences of Christianity, and in that work Dr. Paley says, at the conclusion, "I have carefully framed my arguments in such a manner as not to offend any class of Christians, or those who hold any peculiar tenets, but who agree on the general points of Christianity." Now, if this book, which any person may be glad to read and draw instruction from, and which we are told was written to prevent infidelity, is not to be objected to, from being general with regard to adults, to whom it is directed, why may not the same general system apply to children under fourteen years of age? In some instances I have heard that it is necessary, even with children under seven years of age, to teach the differences of creed between different sects. I have heard this asserted; but I doubt whether it is so necessary, and whether instruction might not be given for several hours, on each day in the week, without marking these distinctions. But I can mention, also, other authorities, and I will quote one, in refutation of the charge of irreligion as advanced on this ground against the system of education we have proposed. There is a work in existence, written by a divine, not of our church, I admit, but still not the less universally revered for his piety, his learning, and his virtue. I mean the Abbé Fénélon. He has written an admirable treatise on the subject of education, in which he refers to the mode in which religious instruction should be given — not in a formal manner, as a catechism learned by heart, — but that the curiosity of the pupil should be excited, and the thoughts of the child drawn to the subject to be learned. It has certainly been said of this work, that it is a proof Fénélon was not a good Roman Catholic; because, in this work of his on the education of female children, he did not insist on the restrictive doctrines of the Roman Catholic church, but seemed to be more anxious to impress on his pupil general Christian principles, than to point out the differences between the Roman Catholic and the Protestant creeds.

Having referred to the authorities of Fénélon and Paley, and having imbibed our errors from the writings of such men, I confess that I would still rather bow to them than to the new doctrines of the Honourable Gentleman opposite. The Honourable Gentleman the Member for Newark, who has spoken to-night, maintains, with other Honourable Members, the exclusive doctrine. I said at the time, — though somewhat irregularly, I admit, — that such doctrines would lead to persecution and intolerance. I said so because it is clear, from what the Honourable Gentleman has said to-night, and from what I have read of the Honourable Gentleman's writings, that his objection does not apply only to this new grant of education, but to the religious liberties which are already established. But, then, the argument is, that these latter were respectively matter of capitulation and of treaty which cannot now be violated; but the Honourable Gentlemen refuse to be bound by the principle, and they refuse to admit it. There is no part of the religious liberties of this country, from the passing of the Toleration Act to the present time, against which they do not, in effect, protest, and to which their principles and opinions are not opposed. There is another part of the question with regard to the principle which is now proposed, — to the way in which it is intended to carry it into effect. It is a principle which Honourable Gentlemen opposite do not entirely differ from, — they seem almost ready to admit it. For what we propose is, that the grants should be made to the National and to the British and Foreign School Societies, and that it should not be allowed to schools not connected with those societies, except — (and this exception will refer to a very small portion of the grant) — in cases where these schools do not exist, and there are other societies' schools, — or where, from the poverty of the place, there are no schools at all, — and, in such cases, we propose, also, to grant certain aid in proportion to the necessity of the particular case. There are some Honourable Gentlemen opposite, who would not, I think, deny that principle; but they deny the second principle we propose, — and this is the difference on which the vote of to-night is called for. "It is very well to adopt the plan of instruction," say they, "when the fund is administered through the medium of the Board of Treasury! The Chancellor of the Exchequer sitting at the Board of Treasury is a very harmless person; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer sitting at the Board of Privy Council is a very dangerous person!" I do not mean to contend that the plans are identical, — that there is no difference between the one and the other. But the principal change is, that there is to be a future inspection of the schools, and that reports are to be made as to the manner in which the schools are conducted. I think that it is a great misfortune that a great portion of the education which is now given in this country — (and here I do not speak with reference to the church, for I do not wish to blame, on the one part, the church, for what has been done for education, nor to blame the two great societies on the other) — is not what is properly called education; — it is a certain degree of instruction which enables the pupils to read and write, and to cipher; but it does not affect the hearts and the minds of the persons instructed. Therefore it is not sufficient to tell me that 590,000 persons are educated in the two societies' schools, and that more than a million attend the Sunday schools; for I am obliged to say, from all I have heard, and from various reports which I have seen made to the Government and to Parliament, that the quality of the education is not at all satisfactory I might read numerous passages from reports on this subject, but I will confine myself to one or two from the reports of the chaplains of gaols, who are members of the Church of England, pursuing their most useful and meritorious duties. The chaplain of the gaol at Lancaster says, in his report of 1838, —

> Five hundred and sixteen prisoners were quite ignorant of the simplest truths; 995 prisoners were capable of repeating the Lord's Prayer; 37 prisoners were occasional readers of the Bible; only 7 were familiar with the Holy Scriptures, and conversant with the principles of religion. Among the 516 entirely ignorant, 124 were capable of repeating the Lord's Prayer. This last table corresponds in its general features with that of last year; and I can add little to the observations which I then made upon the subject of ignorance in religion, unless it be to state that very few of the whole 1129 persons — probably not more than 20 or 30 — have habitually attended any place of divine worship. This estimate will be most undisputed by all those who have observed the almost general desertion of the house of God by that portion of the working population which consists of males in the prime of life; and I think that if the subject were investigated, it would appear that this desertion is in the ratio of the density of the population. Village congregations will be found least obnoxious to this remark, and those of large towns most so.

Now, Sir, I would ask whether this is not a dreadful peculiarity in the state of society? Is it not dreadful to think that where there are the most criminals, and where the population is the densest, and where there ought to be complete education, the house of God (by which, no doubt, the Reverend Gentleman means "all" places of religious worship) is deserted by that portion of the population which consists of males? And I would also ask whether it is not desirable that the serious attention of the House should be directed towards doing something by which the instruction of the people may be further promoted? I cannot say that I think much of the objection, that in one place we shall be instilling some portion of the doctrines of the Roman Catholics, and that, in another, the rules of Socinianism may be taught; for there is the great and countervailing advantage of imparting knowledge, and of giving instruction to thousands, in the simplest elements of religious truth. And even if I agreed with the Honourable Gentlemen opposite in their opinion of the character of the doctrines of Roman Catholics and of Unitarians, yet I should not be prepared to say that there was not more danger of promoting practical infidelity by total ignorance, than of infidelity gaining ground among a dense population of artisans and labourers, who were forced to earn their daily bread, by the specious and theoretical influence of refined arguments, which rarely reach the heart and soul of more than a small portion of the community. I have given one extract from the opinion of the chaplain of the county goal of Lancaster, and I must beg leave to read another from a report which I have received, unasked, only two days ago, from a clergyman, whom I have never seen, but whom I have, on account of his merits, and for his high character, appointed to the situation of chaplain to the prison for juvenile offenders at Parkhurst. In that report he says, —

In reviewing and digesting the details exhibiting the religious and moral condition of the prisoners on entering Parkhurst Prison, one point has (even with the present limited number) forcibly struck my attention, — and that is, the comparatively large amount of acquirement in mechanical elements of instruction, by means of which that condition is improved (the art of reading and repetition from memory), contrasted with the lamentably small degree of actual knowledge possessed either of moral duty or religious principle. This appears mainly to have arisen from the meaning of the word read, or sounds repeated, having rarely been made the subjects of inquiry or reflection. The following digest will in some degree illustrate this position: — Your Lordship will perceive that, although 58 prisoners can in some degree read, 83 repeat some or all of the Church Catechism, and 43 possess some knowledge of Holy Scripture, only 29 (exactly half the number of readers) can give even a little account of the meaning of words read or sounds in use. And of these it often appears to be the strength of the intellect, exercised at the moment, and not the result of memory, that leads them to the meaning of a word. A few of this class are included in the number not able to read. Another feature of the moral condition of the Parkhurst prisoners cannot but arrest the attention strongly, and that is, the very large proportion that have received instruction for a considerable period of time in the various schools with which our country abounds. A digest of this portion of the general table will show that out of 103 lads, 95 have attended schools, 70 of whom have been day scholars for terms longer than a year, 8 only having never been at school; and of the 51 prisoners with whom the prison opened, and who formed the subject of my February report, only two are in that condition. Two of those mentioned to your Lordship as being such, I have since ascertained have been at school.

Now, Sir, I say, that what really deserves the attention of the House is, that though, under the present system, many are able to read and write, and have received the elements of education; yet that what is wanted, and what we ought to attempt, is, to give such instruction as will excite the intelligence of the children, raise their curiosity, teach them the meaning of the words they read, and implant in their hearts those doctrines which are to be their guides through life. Then, Sir, if this be the case, am I so much to blame, because I say that in continuing the grants for public education, the Committee of the Privy Council should not merely give the money in proportion to some financial statement, of the amount of subscription raised, or of the quantity of brick and mortar that may happen to be laid upon the ground, but should ask for an inspection, and for a report of what is actually taught and learned in the schools? I think that there is this great distinction between the modern and the ancient art of teaching — for though it was followed by great men in other periods, yet it was never brought down to the poorer classes till late years; — the great distinction is, that instead of burdening the memory, and rendering learning irksome and disagreeable, the modern system teaches the child to instruct himself, and to follow with curiosity the lesson which he learns, so that, if he be afterwards asked by his master as to what he has learned, he will be able to describe it: this system not only prevents the irksome school exercises which have been hitherto taught, but will apply to the instruction of the child in morals, and in religion, and in useful arts. But even all this is misrepresented; and because we desire to obtain such an advantage for the people, it is said, — "Oh! you want, by inspection, to frame and lay down rules and regulations with respect to religious instruction." Now, except in the model schools of our own, it would not be just, and it would be almost impossible, to establish regulations for religious instruction: but what we may do is, — we may inquire and ascertain in what manner the children are taught the meaning of words, and in what mode their lessons are communicated to them; — for if the method of teaching general lessons be good, there will be a strong presumption that the religious education will be good; but if a low and ignorant and coercive mode of instruction in secular matters be used, the religious instruction will not be likely to be of such a character as to improve the conduct of the child in future life; the seed will have fallen on barren ground, and the instruction will be of no use. On these grounds we have proposed the Committee of the Privy Council: these are the reasons on which we have based our plan. It contains two principles, which I think any plan for the improvement of the education of the people ought to combine. In the first place, it is not declared that the education shall be confined exclusively to the children of Churchmen; but, so far as the grant will go, it shall be extensive and useful to the people, generally, to whatever religious sect they may belong. Of course the greater portion of the fund will be applied to the members of the established church, which have the greater number of schools.

The second point in the plan is, that it will give a good and efficient system of inspection. This is not a plan that proposes a new scheme of education to extend throughout the country; but it is a plan which, by bringing the subject of education before Parliament from year to year — (so far is it from being irresponsible, and out of the control of Parliament) — by submitting it to Parliament every year, will tend to make the great subject of education a subject of interest and concern on the part of the state, which it never hitherto has been. I feel the extreme difficulty of bringing forward a plan of education which may not only not excite misrepresentation, and become the subject of a party struggle, but which will not, also, excite the conscientious scruples and fears of persons of excellent intentions. I am aware of the obloquy to which any plan of this kind is exposed; and I trust the House will allow me, before I sit down, to say a few words on a subject which has pressed much on my mind in the course of the last fortnight. When I recollect the conduct of former Governments, — of Governments which existed twenty or thirty years ago, — I think that, if, following their example, we had, at the commencement of the Session, endeavoured to create alarm at the proceedings of the Chartists, and had excited the fears of the country by proposing to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, and by bringing forward coercive laws, — it would have been found that a Government raising such a feeling of alarm might, without much difficulty, have obtained the sanction of Parliament to such coercive measures, and have succeeded in putting down all opposition. But it has been my anxious wish, nay, my anxious labour has been, — without any alteration of the law, and without attempting anything of that sort, — nay more, being determined not to ask, till the last moment of an imperious necessity, for any suspension of any of the constitutional rights of the people, — to meet, to encounter, and to subdue the apprehensions which for a time have menaced the peace and security of the country; but in doing so I have been convinced that every and any occasion should be taken to secure the public peace, by improving the state of instruction — by advancing the religious feeling and the moral condition of the people of this country. Because I am satisfied, that however such laws as I have alluded to, if they had been proposed and carried, might have subdued discontent for the moment, — I say I am equally convinced that the only permanent security for the country is to be found in the general knowledge of the people, as well of their religious duties as of their moral obligations, and of their fortunate state in being subjects of this free country. I feel, Sir, that in taking this course, and in making this attempt, I have had more opposition to encounter than I should if I had taken the other course, and had proposed measures of severity and of coercion. But, Sir, I do not mind the opposition I have encountered. I am not to be deterred by the taunt of the Honourable Member for Newark, who said that he wondered why, when we have been defeated in our former scheme, we should attempt another which is equally objectionable to Dissenters and to Churchmen. Although, Sir, my first plans were thwarted and defeated, — at which the Honourable Gentleman, no doubt, rejoices, — I recollect that it has happened to me in former years to succeed in striking off from the Dissenters the degrading fetters of the Test and Corporation Acts.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!"]

I am quite prepared for opposition to plans of this kind, — I am quite prepared to find that when they are first proposed they shall be misunderstood and misrepresented, and that even the "No Popery" cry shall be revived and burnished up afresh, — not, Sir, I fear, for the last time. Let the Honourable Member for Newark take pride in such victories; but I do not believe that he will succeed in reimposing the fetters which have been struck off: and, Sir, I am fully convinced that, on further examination, the great cause of education, not only of the members of the Church of England, but of the whole community, will prosper and flourish, — that the happiness of the people will thus be secured, — that the degrading pictures which have been drawn of the year 1839 will be deemed the pictures of a past time, — and that the only wonder will be, that they could ever have been a true representation of the state of England.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

SIR R. PEEL. — I shall not, Sir, be sorry to escape from the discussion of some of those more important topics which have been adverted to, — not because I undervalue their importance, but because I consider many of them much too weighty for discussion in a popular assembly; neither shall I undertake to defend every opinion which has been advanced in the course of this discussion. But I mean to confine myself rather to the consideration of the practical merits of the proposal upon which we are called upon to decide, than to consider whether the opinions advanced by my Honourable Friend the Member for Newark (Mr. Gladstone), or any other speculative opinions which may have been delivered, are sound, or not. If I did enter — at this time of night — into the discussion of such speculative opinions, involving so many various considerations, do I not know that I should be imitating the example of Honourable Gentlemen opposite, and diverting the House from that which is the practical question now under debate, ——

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

— namely, whether or not it would not, on the whole, be best that the Noble Lord's motion should be acceded to, and the Crown addressed to rescind the Order in Council of the 10th of April, by which the Committee of Education was appointed? That is the practical question to be decided this night, and I give my hearty concurrence to the motion of my Noble Friend, and will not follow her Majesty's Government and other Gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House, who have been anxious to shrink from the consideration of this question, ——

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

— or of the plan proposed by them. I object to the scheme of her Majesty's Government on three or four distinct grounds. First, I object to the course proposed to be adopted, in calling on the House to decide so important a question as that of laying the foundation for a system of national education by a single vote of the House of Commons. The Right Honourable Gentleman has quoted some former votes by which sums of money have been placed under the control of the Government without asking for the advice or opinion of the House of Commons. But does it follow, because upon uncontested points those concessions have been made, that we must decide the whole question of national education for England in a similar way? If this do follow, then I would advise the House to beware of making any further concession. If these slight analogies are to be hunted out for the purpose of calling upon the House, in consistency, to adopt such a proposition as that now before us, you may depend upon it that any concessions you may now make will be appealed to in favour of future concessions infinitely greater, and you will be told that after the concession of this night, any objection will come too late, for on this very night it ought to have been urged. The Noble Lord says this is only a scheme for the inspection of schools, and that the object of the Committee of the Privy Council is merely to superintend the distribution of the grants. It is very well for the Noble Lord, now, to give this character to this Committee of Council; but what was the original object of it? The original proposal, on the 4th of February, was this; — that five of her Majesty's servants should form a board for the consideration of all matters affecting the education of the people. What if I had proposed, in 1835, that five of the members of the then existing Government should form a board for the consideration of all matters affecting the education of the people? what would the dissenting body of this country have said to it? Do you not think it would have provoked their apprehension and alarm? Would you not have called upon the House to respect their feelings and opinions upon the subject? And would you not have said that those feelings of alarm were perfectly justifiable? Then, if the members of the establishment feel similar alarm at the proposal now made, —if they think that it is not fitting that the education of the people should be intrusted to a Committee of the Privy Council, which excludes every member connected with the church, and that it is in principle open to objection; — in that case, I say this question assumes a new character, and that it is not proper to decide upon it absolutely by a single vote, taken in one night, with a narrow majority. According to your reference to former concessions, you may, by this measure, be laying the foundation of an extensive scheme of national education.

Your next step, perhaps, may be at a great interval from the present: but if her Majesty's Ministers can now appeal to the vote for Irish education, or to the speech of my Noble Friend (Lord Stanley) with respect to the admission of Dissenters to the universities, in justification of your present proceedings; and if you feel warranted in calling upon the House to assent to this scheme in consequence of the concessions already made;— I can well foresee that three years hence you may be able to say that the scheme now proposed and assented to, was only the foundation for a general scheme of education, and that those who had permitted that foundation to be laid would have no right to object to any extension of it.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

I object to this Committee of Council being composed exclusively of members of the executive Government. In strictness, it is not a Committee of Council, as it has been called by many of my Honourable Friends, but it is a committee of the executive Government of the country. Now, the executive Government have other duties to perform, and other interests to consult. The executive Government may feel it to be their bounden duty to make great concessions for the purpose of retaining their offices ——

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

— not, I beg to say, from any unworthy or interested motives.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and laughter.]

No; I will give them the benefit of that concession. But, nevertheless, they might feel it their paramount duty to remain in office in order to support the prerogative of the Crown.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and laughter.]

I admit that your motives may be pure and honourable. But you do not constitute a board independent of party or of political considerations; but a board exclusively of members of the Government, who may at any time, in order either to promote certain great interests, or—(for how should I know?)—to rescue yourselves from the danger of dismissal by this House, feel it necessary to make greater concessions on the subject of education. How do I know that a body, having different interests and different views from one day to another, may not consider the question of education subordinate to those graver considerations of keeping themselves in office, and keeping out opponents, whose accession to power they may deem dangerous. I have a fair right to argue this question from a constitutional jealousy, which I am at liberty to entertain, with respect to the executive Government, without any reference whatsoever to individuals. I am entitled to consider to what abuses a board constituted as this is to be, may possibly lead. What have I seen within the last fortnight? Giving you the fullest benefit of purity of motive, — conceding to you that your motives were most pure, and your views most enlightened,—what have I seen? Have I not seen you assume office after a declaration that you had lost the confidence of the people?

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

What was your defence? That state necessity justified it. But might not the same necessity call upon you to make some concession on the subject of education? Take the case of the Ballot.

[Renewed and long-continued cries of "Hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

Last year it was not an open question; this year it is an open question. And why? Not from any conviction on your part as to the abstract merits of the question, but because the concession is essential to your views with respect to those large and comprehensive interests of the country which are involved in your maintenance of power.

[Laughter, and cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

Is, then, the Government a body which ought to furnish grants relating to all matters that affect education? An Honourable Member opposite has bid the Government be of good cheer; he has encouragingly told them not to be alarmed; "for," said he, "you have done more to recommend yourselves to the liberal representatives and the liberal constituencies of this country, by this plan, than by any other measure which you have brought forward." Is it so? But may not the execution of the measure be as necessary as its proposal? I do not know whether the very same members of the executive Government who now form the Education Board, may not also form a committee to whose efforts may be intrusted the securing of a liberal majority in case of a dissolution of Parliament. Suppose, then, that it should be suggested by one of the members of this committee, that a concession made by the Government, on the subject of education, to a particular part of the country, would be attended with an advantageous result, in case of an election,—is it wise to expose yourselves to that temptation? and would it not be prudent to have some persons intrusted with the superintendence of education, whose continuance in office would not depend upon a narrow majority in the House of Commons? Remember, however,—and let the Dissenters remember,—that if the principle be good for this Government, it is good for their successors.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition.]

If a change of Government should unfortunately take place——

[Laughter.]

—you have established the principle,—that the next Government, whatever it may be, will be the body deputed by yourselves to manage the general education of the country. They will introduce their views, also, with respect to the superintendence of education. Suppose, then, that their feeling should be,—that it is not wise that a system of education, so far as the establishment is concerned, should be carried on without the supervision of the chief ecclesiastical authorities belonging to the establishment;—suppose that they should make the Bishop of London and the Archbishop of Canterbury—both, be it recollected, members of the Privy Council—members of the Committee of Privy Council,—what objection could you urge against it? I do not know what objections the dissenting body might entertain to such appointments; I am not prepared to say how far the force of newly formed habits may influence their conduct; but this I will venture to say,—that if Lord Liverpool, ten years ago, or if I, myself, five years since, had proposed that the Government should be the body to whom such a power should be granted, and that by three words, three important words,—"thirty thousand pounds,"—which were to be placed, without condition or restriction, at the control of the executive Government,—if this had been attempted, then, I say, that, whatever may be the number of petitions which have been presented against the plan of the Government, the petitions of the Dissenters against such a scheme would have been at least equal to them. You say that you are responsible to Parliament. Responsible to Parliament! Why, how is responsibility to Parliament insured, if the measures by which education is to be carried on are to be prepared and executed without the consent of Parliament? You constitute yourselves a committee to superintend the education of the people of this country, in consequence of a solitary vote of the House of Commons. This board is constituted of persons upheld by a parliamentary majority of ten votes. Another may succeed it, supported, perhaps, by a majority of twenty-one votes,—a majority, too, which, this year granting 30,000*l.*, may, next year, grant 80,000*l.* for the education of the people. I say, then, that this is an objection which I feel to the Government plan; and that it is an objection which ought to be felt, not only by the Dissenters, but by the Church of England. The Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is fond of quoting opinions, backed always by high authority, but he does not tell us the names of the individuals from whom they proceed, till he imagines we are all ready to assent to the propositions laid down. Now, I will imitate him. I will read opinions given by two grave authorities; I will conceal their names; I will not tell you whether they come from high ecclesiastical authority, or whether they were pronounced by persons holding strong Conservative opinions. You shall have the opinions themselves. The Noble Lord took a different course from the Right Honourable Gentleman; he quoted Paley and Fénélon, and told us so; but I shall follow the example set by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. These opinions were not delivered at a very remote period. I am constantly told that I am behind the spirit of the age, and I suppose that the charge is true; for I find that, if I take up the position which her Majesty's Government took up last year, and hope for some expression of gratitude from them for adopting their sentiments,—I find myself, I say, exposed to a raking fire from them, and attacked on all sides for my illiberality! I will now read these extracts. The first runs thus: —

But with these differences of opinion on the subject of education throughout the nation (whatever the opinions of individual Members may be), I confess I do not see that it would be a good plan to establish a Board of Education of members of the Government, and I believe it could not do otherwise than lead to great jealousy and dissatisfaction.

The other extract is to this effect: —

Believing that the creation of a Board of Education will cause not only great jealousy, but positive injury, by their interference; I hope the Honourable Gentleman will not press his motion.

These opinions were expressed by the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department, and by the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

[Loud cheers from the Opposition benches.]

They were delivered, last year, upon the subject of appointing a Board of Commission of Education. Is not this a Board of Education which you are about to appoint? and can you resist voting for the motion? I see the Noble Lord opposite making great protestations against this proposition; but what it is founded on I cannot guess. You objected to the appointment of an Education Board on account of the then excited state of the public mind. Oh, I see the difference! The public mind is now so calm.

[Loud cheers and laughter.]

No jealousy is now felt on the subject of education, and the suspicions and apprehensions which were formerly excited, have since been entirely soothed by the particular plan which her Majesty's Government have proposed.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

I object to the plan on another and a distinct ground. Now, observe, I do not maintain this position, — that the church has any right to interfere with the religious instruction of all the children educated in these schools; and I never understood my Noble Friend to say so. What my Noble Friend said was this, — that in the case of the establishment, religious education was a spiritual concern. Will you tell me what is your definition of an establishment? The Noble Lord has quoted Paley. Does he agree with Paley in this? Paley says, the simple view of an established church is, that it is one for imparting religious instruction, and that everything in its constitution and all its arrangements should be directed to that object alone. This, however, I claim for the establishment, — that no system of national education shall be founded which studiously excludes from the superintendence and control of education given to the children of the establishment — the dignitaries of the established church; and if such a proposition be disagreeable to the feelings of the members of the establishment, I say that it is a violation of those feelings to ask them to contribute to a scheme of education conducted under the superintendence of a board from which those dignitaries are to be excluded. I ask you, Do you think that has a tendency to raise the ecclesiastical authorities of the Church of England in the estimation of children of tender years, or to make them good members of the establishment, if you claim, on the part of the Government board, that they shall be instructed under some general scheme of religious knowledge, of which doctrinal points shall form no part? I certainly am bound to admit that, with respect to Ireland, under the peculiar circumstances of that country, I thought that some advantage might be gained in fairly trying the experiment whether a joint education of persons of different forms of religious faith might not be carried on. I confess that subsequent reflection leaves, at least, grave doubts on my mind as to the success of that experiment. So far as the children of the establishment are concerned, I have come to this opinion, that it is infinitely better that they should receive religious instruction on doctrinal points, than to bring them up shrinking from the doctrines which they profess! I doubt whether harmony would be promoted by giving the children collected in those schools united secular instruction, and also by giving them separate religious instruction on different days. If I were a Wesleyan, or a Methodist, I would much rather give my child a general education, in which I would impress upon him that religion should form imperatively the basis, than give it to him, as it is proposed, as a separate and special branch of education. But with respect to the established church, I hope that, rather than consent to any plan from which ecclesiastical authority shall be excluded, it will separate itself altogether from the state on this point; that it will take the education of the people into its own hands, — that it will not shrink from insisting on the publication of its own peculiar doctrines, — but that it will demand that the highest respect shall be entertained for its power by its being inculcated in the minds of children that religion forms the basis of all education; and I very much doubt whether, the principles of the Christian faith being thus inculcated among children, as good a chance of harmony would not be secured, as by telling them that religion was an open question, as it were, and that each of them was to be instructed by a minister of his own creed on a certain day set apart for that purpose.

Ample reference has been made to the condition of religious instruction in the United States. Honourable Gentlemen who have very extensive information in reference to Prussia and the United States have spoken upon the subject, and have more particularly quoted the cases of New York and Massachusetts. As to Prussia, the principle has been abandoned; for the Honourable and Learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin has distinctly declared that the Prussian Government has abandoned the attempt of uniting children in a system of secular instruction, only, and of giving them separate religious instruction upon such creeds as they might be disposed to follow. I have attempted, with that degree of interest which is necessarily taken upon this subject, to gain some information with respect to the success of this plan, and it appears to me that this is very like the plan suggested by the Noble Lord. It prescribes a general religious instruction, — that is to say, that the children shall be initiated in the general doctrines of Christianity, and that on certain days they shall be instructed in their particular creeds. I hold in my hand the Report of the Board of Education in New York, which states the plan of education adopted there.

[Cries of "Date!"]

It is dated the 14th of January, 1839. It gives the principles of the system, and it states the law to be this, — that the school committee shall not use in any of the town schools any books which are calculated to favour the tenets of any particular sect; and I beg the attention of the House to the other portion of this statement, which is, that the Scriptures are used in almost all schools either as devotional or as reading books. It appears to me, therefore, that the principle is exactly similar to that of the normal schools. General instruction is daily given; the Scriptures are used as devotional or as reading books every day, but the plan excludes any instruction on any peculiar tenets. But what say the board in the very able Report which they have published, in which, I must admit, they have exhibited the sincerest desire to promote the cause of education? The Report is drawn up by the secretary, and he says,—

> In my Report of last year, I exposed the alarming deficiency of moral and religious instruction then found to exist in our schools. That deficiency in regard to religious instruction could only be explained by supposing that school committees, whose duty it is to prescribe school books, had not found any books at once expository of the doctrines of revealed religion, and also free from such advocacy of the "tenets" of particular sects of Christians, as brought them, in their opinion, within the scope of the legal prohibition. And hence they felt obliged to exclude books, which, but for their denominational views, they would have been glad to introduce.

I beg to know how the Noble Lord could avoid this in his plan? It would not exclude the existence of scruples among any denomination of religious Dissenters. It would not heal the differences of opinion entertained by the ministers of religion according to their several and peculiar professions. The Report then says, —

> Of course, I shall not be here understood as referring to the Scriptures, as it is well known that they are used in almost all the schools, either as a devotional or as a reading book.

Now, I beg the Noble Lord to consider whether this system, which has so operated in America, is not founded upon precisely the same principles as that upon which the plan of her Majesty's Government is framed. It is a system, not excluding the Scriptures, — allowing the Scriptures to be read, but not allowing them to be taught upon any general principle, — permitting them to be used for the purposes of instruction, but leaving it to the ministers of the various religious denominations to teach the children in accordance with their particular religious views. What says the secretary as to the working of that system? He says that there is "an alarming deficiency of moral and religious instruction." That is just the result which I anticipate from the system suggested by her Majesty's Government, as applied to the habits and modes of thought of the English people. If you were to adopt such a system, not making education in the principles of faith the basis of instruction in this country, you would find it extremely difficult to establish that sound moral and religious knowledge which can only be founded upon our conviction, in early years, that religion is the first object of instruction.

That is the second ground upon which I object to the plan proposed by her Majesty's Government, — namely, that, as far as the children of the establishment are concerned, I think it wholly unwise to exclude the direct superintendence and authority of ecclesiastical authorities. I think that those authorities ought to be brought forward distinctly for the purpose of superintending a plan of education in the principles of the establishment. I object, also, to the plan of her Majesty's Ministers, upon the very grounds upon which it has been supported by some of its advocates, which, as my Right Honourable Friend has justly observed in the course of the debate, are grounds directly inconsistent with the maintenance of a religious establishment. No answer has been given to that argument. If you are under an obligation, as you say you are, to teach the children of those who dissent, upon the grounds which you allege, — namely, that you fight with Roman Catholic sinews, and support your system with Unitarian gold, — if that be the ground upon which you are bound to educate the children of Dissenters, — in the first place, let me ask why you shrink from educating them in the tenets of their particular faith? If that be your ground, — that you take their gold and make use of their strength, — how do you answer this question? Why are you not bound to provide them the means of religious worship in accordance with their several creeds? Where do you propose to draw the line of demarcation? You profess to draw a line, but do not tell us where it is to commence. All your supporters, indeed, do not draw a line. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman opposite, — and, I must say, I think he is the only one who foresees or avows the consequences to which the Government plan may lead, — is prepared manfully to contend for them, as consequences which it is desirable to obtain. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman, if I understood him, maintains this proposition, — that, if you call upon the Jew to contribute to the exigencies of the state, the Jew has a right to call upon you for the maintenance of his religion.

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER. — But not for education in his religion.

SIR R. PEEL. — Not for education in his religion! How do you draw the distinction? If you call upon the Jew to contribute to the education of the children of the establishment, why may you not call upon the members of the church to contribute to the education of the Jew? You say that you do not decide against him, — that you do not object to his religion; and I understood the Honourable and Learned Gentleman distinctly to say that he foresaw the consequences to which the Ministerial plan would lead, — namely, that, as all would contribute to the support of it, so all would have a right to call upon the state, not only for the tolerance of their religion, but for contributions to maintain it. The third question I have to put to the Government is this, — Do you believe that any good will arise from the establishment of such a system as you propose? If you told us that it was necessary that a board should be formed which should have the public confidence, why did you not describe it in such intelligible and distinct terms as to prevent the misunderstanding and the alarm — I think the perfectly justifiable alarm — which has sprung up in every part of the country in reference to your proposition? If you have so imperfectly described your views with respect to the construction of the Board of Education, that, throughout the country, you have awakened an almost universal apprehension in the minds of the religious public, — do you believe that any system of instruction, superintended by such a board, would be likely to have the confidence of the great body of the people? Was there ever a scheme of education propounded in this country which met with such universal opposition? What answer do you give to the quotations which, in the course of this debate, have been made from statements embodying the views of the Dissenters with respect to your plan? The Honourable Member for Lambeth (Mr. Hawes) says that the Dissenters are, in an especial degree, the friends of civil and religious liberty. What is their opinion? Do they demand that the scheme of the Government should be persisted in? No. They say that the general rule ought to be to adhere to the plan of last year — to make ample grants to the National Society, and to the British and Foreign Society; but to relax the rule which limits the application of money according to the amount of contributions. That was the recommendation of the Protestant Society, — a large, influential body of Dissenters, — expressed at a public meeting, on the 15th of June, 1839. A short time since the Honourable Member for Kilkenny stated that about 1650 petitions had been presented in opposition to the Government plan. I have now the satisfaction to inform that Honourable Member that the number of those petitions has gone on increasing, and that, up to this day, not less than 3050 have been laid upon the table. Does the House believe it possible that 3050 petitions, mainly from the religious community, could be prepared and presented to Parliament merely in consequence of some exaggerated misrepresentations? The Honourable Member for Kilkenny spoke disparagingly of those petitions, and of the number of signatures attached to them. What is my answer? Where are the counter petitions?

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

If the public feeling be in favour of the Government plan, why have not counter petitions been presented? How happens it that, on one side (in opposition to the plan), upwards of 3000 petitions have been presented, whilst, on the other side, the total number does not amount to fifty?

You told us, last year, — and you told us with truth, — that one of the objections to a Board of Education was, the national jealousy to which it would most probably give rise. You were good prophets. I respect you in your character of prophets; but when you find your worst apprehensions confirmed, why have you not the manliness to admit it?

Let me ask, what possible inducement, other than religious motives, and conscientious objections to the plan, could lead the Wesleyans to resist it? The Wesleyans say, that if their conscientious objections could be removed, they have a greater chance of benefiting by this plan than if a return were made to the principle of last year, under which they were excluded altogether. The Wesleyans can receive nothing from the British and Foreign Society, they can receive nothing from the National Society. A plan for a grant has been proposed, in which the Wesleyan Methodists were to have participated; yet they chose this very time to come forward and renew their opposition to it. The Wesleyan Methodists have been treated like children. When they came forward in support of the anti-slavery question, and so strongly advocated the abolition of the slave trade, then — credit was given them for the highest discretion, and for the purest motives; but now that they come forward to oppose the Government scheme of education, although it is impossible that they can be influenced by any but the purest motives, they are designated as the victims of credulity and misapprehension, and their zeal is attributed to any motives rather than those by which I conscientiously believe them to have been actuated. The question is not, whether the executive Government shall be relieved from all responsibility, as regards education? but simply this; — "Will you return to the system of last year, — that which was founded by Lord Althorp" — and one to which, I believe, a majority of this House would not refuse its assent, — namely, a vote of money under the control of Parliament, without discouraging voluntary contributions? Will the Government return to that system, and ask for a vote corresponding with it? One reference more from the United States. I will quote this instance for the purpose of showing what has been the deficiency of universal instruction in a part of the United States, under a plan precisely similar to that now under discussion; the state providing education and erecting schools.

It seems that one William G. Griffin, with others, felt aggrieved at the practice which obtains, in some common schools, of "praying, singing, reading the Bible, and other religious exercises;" and therefore "prayed the Legislature to enact a law prohibiting the practice" in such schools, academies, and seminaries of education, as receive aid from the public Treasury. In recommending that the prayer of the memorialists be not granted, the committee go into a discussion of the subject, which is remarkable for its clearness, candour, and cogency of reasoning, and such as must more than satisfy, we should suppose, every reasonable mind.

The public schools established by law are supported by a state fund, and by taxation upon the property of the people. These schools are open to all, although none are obliged to send their children to them. But, says the Report, —

"It is to these schools, as we are, to suppose, that the children of the petitioners are accustomed to resort; and in some cases it is fair to presume that it is found exceedingly inconvenient, perhaps impossible, for these parents to furnish their children with the means of instruction anywhere else. They are therefore obliged to resort to these schools, or take the alternative of keeping their children in utter ignorance; and it is under these circumstances that they come before the Legislature with the complaint that, on resorting to these schools, they find there a practice introduced — that of indulging in devotional exercises — which they deem highly offensive and objectionable.

Precisely the same thing would be found to occur here. Parties would say that the proposed plan went to nothing less than the erection of an establishment for the purposes of education. Indeed, I cannot quite understand how the zealous advocates of the voluntary principle can so readily consent to the introduction of this plan. The grounds of objection of the New York petitioners were conveyed in these words: —

Our grounds of objection to this practice are two; — first, that the Christian religion is thus supported and aided at the public expense; and, secondly, that the right of conscience and of equality are invaded, inasmuch as the unguarded minds of the children are exposed to be contaminated.

Such being the operation of the system in America, let not her Majesty's ministers flatter themselves that they would give universal satisfaction by it, here. Objections would be raised of the same nature as those which are made against an establishment. For all these combined reasons, therefore, I advise — not the Government, but the House, — to consent to the principle embraced in the amendment of my Noble Friend, and to advise her Majesty to rescind the Order in Council. I offer this advice on these distinct grounds: first, that in the present state of feeling in the country on this subject, a Board of Education cannot wisely be constituted; next, that the board, if constituted (and the utmost difficulty would arise as to its constitution), ought not to consist exclusively of members of the Government; thirdly, that, as regards the education of the children of the establishment, it would be unwise and improper to exclude from the control and superintendence of any system, those ecclesiastical authorities who are properly placed in charge of the religious education of the community; and, lastly, because there have been presented against the scheme petitions unequalled in number, in purity, and for the disinterestedness of the views of those who have presented them; and because a temporary success, — if the scheme were carried by a small and scanty majority, — so far from advancing the cause of sound religious instruction, soothing animosities, and allaying discord, — would be but the commencement of a new religious struggle in the very worst arena in which, in this country, such a struggle can be carried on.

The House then divided upon the question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question:" — Ayes 280; Noes 275; — Majority 5.

AYES.

Main question put, and agreed to.

Order for committee read; Education Estimate (presented the 12th of June) referred.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I move, Sir, that you do now leave the chair.

Upon the question being put, "That the Speaker do now leave the chair,"—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said: — The Noble Lord surely does not propose to take the vote in committee to-night?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I really do not see why the vote should not be taken to-night.

SIR R. PEEL. — Then, Sir, I shall most strongly object to that course. The Noble Lord proposes a scheme of national education — or, what is in effect the same thing, a grant by which that scheme is to be carried out; — and this, not by a Bill, but by a resolution in a Committee of Supply. I repeat that I object, and I do so on principle, to going into committee for such a grant at half-past two o'clock in the morning, and particularly after such a division as we have just had.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" "Adjourn!" "Go on!"]

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I wish to recal to the attention of the House the state in which the question stood at the commencement of this discussion. The motion was, that the House do resolve itself into a Committee of Supply; but between that course and going into the supply, the motion of the Noble Lord (Stanley) interposed a three nights' debate, in the course of which have been made statements containing all sorts of constructions as to the plan and objects of the Government.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

Under these circumstances I do think that I am justified in proposing that the House do, now, go into the committee, and I protest against the opposition to that course. In the present state of the House, it would be only wasting time to go to a division on the subject, and therefore I do not press it to a division; but I must say, that I think the opposition not at all reasonable.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

SIR R. PEEL. — I wish merely to observe ——

[Loud cries of "Spoke, spoke!" "Hear, hear!" "Adjourn!" and, "Divide!"]

Digitized by Google

I have really not spoken more than the Noble Lord; but I wish to say a few words in explanation of the course I am prepared to take.

[Loud cries of "Spoke, spoke!" and, "Divide!"]

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER. — Move the adjournment of the House.

SIR R. PEEL. — I have no desire to move the adjournment, or to take any course which might even be construed into a vexatious proceeding; I shall therefore only add, in one single sentence, that I so strongly object to a legislation by one House — for so it is — being carried on at this hour of the morning, that I shall give it my strongest opposition. I think it so objectionable to take a vote of this kind at half-past two o'clock, that I shall oppose it in order to put on record my opposition to this legislation by the single act of the House of Commons; and I do this without pledging myself to any future course, because no future course on this measure ought to be taken without discussion.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Can there be any objection to the Chairman leaving the chair, now, and to our going into the committee, though we should not take a vote to-night?

SIR R. PEEL. — I have no objection to any course which will give a full opportunity for an ample discussion before we are called upon to vote this grant. But what will the Noble Lord gain by going into the committee now, if he proceed no further than he at present proposes?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — My wish, in going into the committee, is this, — that the future discussion may be taken in the committee on the grant itself, and not on the question, "That the Speaker do leave the chair."

[Cries of "No, no!" from the Opposition benches.]

SIR R. PEEL. — I repeat that my wish is, to have an opportunity for a full discussion of the vote. It is impossible that such a discussion could be taken to-night; and if the vote is now pressed, I must divide the House.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — Sir, I object ——

[Loud cries of "Oh, oh!" and, "Divide!"]

— I object, in the face of the Noble Lord and of the House, against any forms or proceeding which will prevent the House from having the fullest discussion upon this question.

[Loud cries of "Oh!" and, "Divide!"]

I will tell the Noble Lord that he cannot carry on such a course, though supported by his servants — slaves I was going to call them.

[Laughter.]

Her Majesty's Ministers are now going fast on a descending scale; last night they were in a majority of ten, and to-night in one of five; and yet, with such a majority, they will now go on at this hour with a measure against which so strong an opinion has been expressed! Where is the Honourable Member for Salford? Why does not he, according to his usual custom, object to the House going into new business at such an hour?

[Cries of "Hear!" and calls for Mr. Brotherton.]

Oh! the Honourable Member is at the Government side; he will not, therefore, now move the adjournment.

[Cries of "Oh!" "Question!" "Adjourn!" and, "Divide!"]

I move, Sir, that this House do now adjourn.

LORD STANLEY. — I hope my Honourable and Gallant Friend will not press his motion.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I at once accede to the Noble Lord's wish, and withdraw the motion.

LORD STANLEY. — I am glad that my Honourable and Gallant Friend does not persevere in his motion for the adjournment, because it is not my wish, and I am sure it is not the wish of Gentlemen on this side of the House, to offer anything like a factious opposition to the course proposed by the Government.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!" from the Ministerial side of the House.]

If Honourable Members opposite as-some that such is our intention, they are much mistaken. We have no such desire. But, having taken the question as to the revocation of the Order in Council, we do not wish to offer anything like a factious or vexatious opposition. We might avail ourselves of several opportunities of opposing this vote. We might oppose it in the Committee of Supply, or on bringing up the Report. We might, if we chose to offer a factious opposition, have taken other grounds. Seeing that we were within five of the majority, we might, if we chose, oppose this grant at every stage, and that upon strictly parliamentary grounds. We might, without any imputation of being factious, looking to the result of the present division, call upon you to test that majority again. We have already taken our opposition upon the question of rescinding the Order in Council, and surely it is not unreasonable, or contrary to strict parliamentary usage, that when the minority comes so near the majority, we should take time to consider whether it is expedient that that question should be again raised; and I am sure that my Noble Friend (Lord J. Russell), though he may be a little mortified at the position in which the present division has placed him, will, on reflection, see that the course which we propose is neither factious nor vexatious.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I do not offer any objection to the course suggested by the Noble Lord, of not pressing the matter further this night, it being distinctly understood that the next discussion shall be on the vote in the Committee of Supply.

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — When, when?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — On Monday next I shall propose to take the vote.

Committee deferred till to-morrow.

PRISONS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On the motion of Mr. FOX MAULE, the Order of the Day for the committee on this Bill was read.

Upon the question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair," being put, —

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said: — I protest against the House proceeding with important measures at this late hour. I am surprised at the conduct of the Government and cannot but say that they are, in every way, a most degraded Government. They never seem to know, for two consecutive hours together, what they intend to do; and all that can be got from them is, a petition that the Opposition will let them alone, and suffer them to be at peace.

The motion was then agreed to; Bill considered in committee, and reported; further consideration of Report on Monday, 1st of July; Bill, as amended, to be printed.

ELECTORS' REMOVAL BILL.

On the motion of Mr. FINCH, the Order of the Day for the third reading, read.

Upon the question being put, "That this Bill be now read a third time, —

Mr. BAGGE said: — Sir, this is a Bill which I entertain very strong objections to. It is a measure involving very important alterations in the existing law; and I think I shall be best performing my duty by moving that it be read a third time this day six months.

SIR R. PEEL. — Although it is not the practice to press on, to the third reading, important Bills at so late an hour of the night, I would not advise my Noble Friend to press his amendment.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — I am glad the Right Honourable Gentleman is present to witness the sort of proceedings which are frequently taken in his absence, in order to obstruct the public business.

SIR R. PEEL. — I have never heard a more ungracious speech in so short a compass. The object of my Honourable Friend was not to obstruct the public business, but to have it properly performed, as he conceived.

Mr. BAGGE. — I am sorry that the Right Honourable Gentleman has thought proper to attack me for opposing the third reading of the Bill. I gave notice to the Honourable Member for Ipswich that it was my intention to do so, and I saw that Honourable Member in the House not ten minutes since.

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON. — I must again protest against proceeding with the public business at this hour; and if my Honourable Friend will press his amendment to a division, I will support him.

Mr. FINCH. — I am quite willing to postpone the third reading to a future day.

Mr. H. BARING. — I would suggest to the Honourable Member for Walsall the propriety of recommending his Honourable Friend the Member for Ipswich — as their names are joined together on the back of the Bill — to sit by his side in future.

[Laughter, and cheers.]

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON. — I understand that this Bill has been galloped through the House; and I now give the Honourable Gentleman opposite notice, that if there should be any attempt in future to smuggle the Bill through the House at a late hour, I will offer every obstruction to it in my power.

Mr. FINCH. — I will postpone the third reading of the Bill until Thursday next.

Third reading accordingly deferred till Thursday next.

CHURCH DISCIPLINE BILL.

LORD WYNFORD presented a petition against parts of the Bill,—of clergy of the dioceses of Canterbury and Rochester.—Read, and referred to the select committee on the Bill.

The ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY.—My Lords, I beg leave to correct a misrepresentation which has occurred in a place that I will not more particularly name, with reference to observations supposed to have been made by me in reference to a petition from certain clergy of Oxford on the subject of the Church Discipline Bill. A Right Honourable Gentleman is represented to have stated that—

He was the last man in the House to undervalue petitions; but he could show the House, on better authority than his, that there were occasions on which petitions were got up, particularly on religious matters, in which neither the character of the getters-up nor the suggesters would stand inquiry. There had been, for instance, a petition got up by bad clergymen of the University of Oxford on a subject relating to the church. Now, that was a petition in which, above all others, they would expect to find truth, learning, and conclusive reasoning; but no such thing. It appeared, on high authority, that the bishop of the diocese could command from his clergy as many petitions on any subject as he might choose to call for. The House would ask on whose authority he stated this? He would tell them, but would read a letter more first:—"On the subject of petitions generally bearing on church subjects, I must say, that if the parties who oppose the Bill are to better informed than the clergy of Oxford on the subject, I trust their opposition will have very little weight." He concluded with the following words:—"I entertain the strictest conviction that the petitions which come before you on this subject are full of misstatements, but certainly misstatements made without a disposition to deceive. I give these petitioners credit for a wish to support the church; but it will be for the House to judge of the allegations, and to judge, also, of the expediency of complying with the prayer of persons who betray total ignorance of the real facts of the case on which they petition." These were the petitions presented from clergymen of the University of Oxford against the Church Discipline Bill; they came from men of respectable character and authority; and the person who thus characterised them was his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury. This was the character he gave of petitions got up on a religious outcry. He stated that they might be well intended, but that they betrayed the greatest ignorance.

Nothing can be more inconvenient than for a Member of one House—and more especially a Member who ranks very high in station, and who is deserving of all respect on account of his talent and excellent qualities—nothing, I say, can be more inconvenient, or, indeed, more irregular, than for a Member of the House of Commons to cite, naming the speaker, what may have passed in your Lordships' House. This very statement shows the inconvenience of that practice; for a more incorrect statement—not intentionally so, I am perfectly certain, because I know the candour of the Right Honourable Gentleman sufficiently well to be convinced that he would not say anything which he did not believe to be true—but still, a more incorrect statement never was made. The Right Honourable Gentleman was misinformed as to what I said on the occasion to which reference was made. When was it, I would ask, that I ever said any such thing as that "neither the character of the getters-up nor of the suggesters of the petition would stand inquiry?" When did I ever make any reflection on the character of the gentlemen and clergy of Oxford? It so happens that I only know the name of one of the persons who were concerned in getting up the petition in question; and of that one person, and of all who are connected with him, I may state, there are none more respectable for character, for learning, or for piety; and that it is absolutely impossible I could have said that their characters would not abide inquiry. Then it is said, that "the petition was got up by bad clergymen of the University of Oxford." Who those "bad clergymen" are, I am greatly at a loss to know. There must be a misprint — a misrepresentation here. Such words never could have been used by the Right Honourable Gentleman. All I said related, not to the character of the clergy, but to the inconclusive reasoning and the great ignorance which seemed to prevail as to the real state of the law, and the tenour of the Bill.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

The ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY presented petitions against the plan recommended by the Privy Council, — of members of the Society for promoting Christian Knowledge; of the minister and inhabitants of Hawkwell; and of inhabitants of Bruton. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

JAMAICA BILL.

LORD LYNDHURST. — I beg leave to present a petition from William Burge, Esquire, the agent for the Island of Jamaica, praying to be heard by himself, his counsel, agents, and witnesses, at the bar of the House, against the Jamaica Bill.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — I shall offer no opposition to the prayer of the petition; but I wish to know whether counsel could not be heard on the day (Friday) fixed for the second reading?

LORD BROUGHAM. — Suppose you give up Wednesday, and hear counsel on that day?

LORD LYNDHURST. — I fear that, if Wednesday were fixed, few of your Lordships would find it convenient to attend on that day. I beg to move that counsel be heard on Friday next.

Read, and leave given to petitioner to be heard on Friday next.

LORD BROUGHAM, the EARL of HAREWOOD, and EARL ST. VINCENT presented petitions from planters, merchants, and others interested in the colony of Jamaica; also, praying to be heard by themselves, their counsel, agents, and witnesses, at the bar of the House, against the Bill. — Severally read, and leave given to the petitioners to be heard by counsel on Friday next.

EDUCATION BILL.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — I wish to know from the Noble and Learned Lord (Lord Brougham), whether it is intended to bring on his Education Bill on the day for which it now stands? The Noble and Learned Lord has already postponed it on account of particular circumstances which have occurred in another place. Perhaps other circumstances, of more recent occurrence, in that place, may induce the Noble and Learned Lord to postpone it yet further.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Totally disagreeing from the conclusion that my measure, and the other matter alluded to, are the same in principle, yet I own that I have seen, with some anxiety, what has occurred in the other House, because it will have a bearing on a portion of my Bill, and on that part of it least likely to meet with the sanction of your Lordships. I think, therefore, that I shall exercise a sound discretion in a further postponement of my Bill, until I see what may be done on the matter referred to. I will, for the present, fix it for Monday week.

The EARL of RIPON. — I fear that my Noble and Learned Friend has assumed too early a date for the decision elsewhere on the point in question.

The second reading was then put off to Monday, the 1st of July next; and the Lords summoned.

TOWN CLERK OF SANDWICH.

The MARQUESS of SALISBURY. — Seeing the Noble Viscount at the head of her Majesty's Government in his place, I beg leave to present a petition from an individual named John Mourilyan, late town clerk of the town, port, and borough of Sandwich, in the county of Kent, complaining of having been removed from his office; and praying for compensation, and for inquiry into his case. As far as I am able to give an opinion on that case, I can only say that it is one of very great hardship; and, consequently, I consider your Lordships are bound to meet the wishes of the petitioner. By way of compensation for the loss of the fees and emoluments of his office, Mr. Mourilyan had granted to him, in November last, the income of 60*l.* a-year. Now, I will ask the Noble Viscount whether he considers that a sufficient remuneration? — whether, according to the Municipal Corporation Act, the petitioner is not entitled to a much larger sum? I repeat, that the case is one of great hardship; and I trust it will meet with the consideration it deserves.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — With regard to this case, I understand that it has received mature consideration, and the same principle of remuneration has been applied to that, as to all similar cases. The fact is, this gentleman demanded more than the full value of the income which he derived from his office.

Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

THE MILLION LOAN (IRELAND).

VISCOUNT DUNCANNON. — With regard to a question put to me a few days ago, by a Noble Marquess (the Marquess of Westmeath), as to the application of the residue of the million loan, which was voted for the relief of the clergy of Ireland, by advances on their claims for arrears of tithe, I wish, now, to state the facts connected with the case, which I have ascertained on inquiry. Of the million advanced, only the sum of 640,000*l.* was claimed by the clergy; there therefore remained a surplus in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of 360,000*l.* Of that sum 100,000*l.* was lent, by the commissioners, to the Board of Works in Ireland, and the remaining 260,000*l.* is to be applied to payment of tithes due to the clergy on the coming into operation of the late Tithe Act. The sum of 100,000*l.* advanced to the Board of Works, will, of course, be repaid to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. — A large portion of the million fund is unappropriated; but the purpose of that grant was, that the money should be assigned to the clergy. This sum was voted by Parliament for one purpose, and it has no right to be appropriated to another.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — I think that the Noble Marquess ought to be satisfied with the statement made by my Noble Friend (which I repeat). It is not intended to appropriate the money to any other purposes than those fixed by Parliament. The 100,000*l.* lent to the Board of Works will be repaid to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

DUBLIN AND LIVERPOOL STEAM PACKETS.

The EARL of WICKLOW. — I trust your Lordships will allow me to say a few words on the subject of the steam packets between Liverpool and Dublin. Captain Chappel, the commander of the packet station at Liverpool, has addressed a letter to me, complaining of what I stated on this matter last week. He says, — "I do not know whether this censure was intended to apply to Mr. Purcell or to me, or to both; but as it was calculated to be injurious to me in my character, I feel persuaded that your Lordship will do me the justice to remove such an impression, when I assure you that Mr. Purcell asked for the appointment entirely without my knowledge; and that no complaint was made to me about his charges." If it be any satisfaction to Captain Chappel, I will state, that so far from wishing to make any allusion to him, I never heard of him before, or that he occupied such a situation, or that he was alluded to in the appointment. This statement of Captain Chappel contradicts, however, what was said at the time by the Noble Earl (of Minto). The Noble Earl declared, that he knew nothing of the politics of Mr. Purcell whatever, but that the appointment took place on the recommendation of a most distinguished individual — namely, that of Captain Chappel. I never meant to cast any imputation on that gentleman, nor on Mr. Purcell, who has also written to me. Mr. Purcell was perfectly justified in accepting the situation, if the Government thought fit to give it to him. My observations were directed against the Admiralty, who did not sufficiently consider the interests of the public when they appointed an agent with the sole right of making what charges he pleased. I hope the Noble Earl will not create a monopoly for the benefit of any one individual, but will open the carrying trade to competition. If no arrangement be made to remedy this evil, and this system of overcharging, I shall submit a motion to the House on the subject.

The EARL of MINTO. — I admit that the Noble Earl has said nothing that could be held to apply injuriously either to Mr. Purcell or Captain Chappel. In consequence of what the Noble Earl stated on a former evening, I directed inquiry to be instituted into the course of proceeding actually adopted in this service at Liverpool; and if I had found that extortion, want of due attention, or impropriety of any kind had been practised, I should have immediately taken steps to remove the evil. Whoever is agent, I shall take care that things be so conducted that the public shall have no reason to complain.

The EARL of WICKLOW. — It is quite evident that the Noble Earl totally misunderstands me. I do not bring any charge against Mr. Purcell for overcharging; what I complain of is, that the Government gave Mr. Purcell the power of making exorbitant charges, and that there is no competition.

The EARL of MINTO. — The only profit Mr. Purcell gets is by the land carriage of the parcels; he gets none other. If he take advantage of that to divert parcels from their proper route in order to have them sent by his own coaches, he is guilty of an abuse; but there has been no such complaint.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Have we not heard quite enough of Mr. Peter Purcell?

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. — It is not fair to denounce, without, it seems, any just ground, Mr. Purcell, his carriages and horses, and everything else.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — I beg leave to move the second reading of a very important Bill, — I mean the Bills of Exchange Bill. This measure is introduced for the purpose of making perpetual an Act which passed two years ago, relative to exemption from the laws of usury Bills of Exchange at certain dates; and I think it is most desirable for the city, and the commercial public, that the sense of Parliament should be known on this subject as soon as possible.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON. — I should wish to have some opportunity of inquiring into the operation of the Bill, before it be passed. I intend to introduce certain alterations into the Bill in committee, to the effect that the Bill shall not be made perpetual. I do not, in the slightest degree, object to the second reading.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — Will it suit the Noble Duke to go into committee on Monday?

The DUKE of WELLINGTON. — Yes.

The Bill was then read a second time, and committed to a committee of the whole House on Monday next.

WINDSOR CASTLE STABLES BILL.

House in committee (according to order); Bill reported without amendment; and to be read a third time on Monday next.

ROMAN CATHOLIC RELIEF ACT.

The EARL of WINCHILSEA. — In pursuance of the notice which I gave yesterday, it now becomes my duty to present to your Lordships a petition signed by 3000 inhabitants of Wigan and the neighbourhood, praying for the repeal of the statute 10 George IV., commonly called the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act. If this petition had related to any measure now under consideration by your Lordships, I should have declined, in obedience to the usage of your Lordships' House, to present it; but as it relates to an Act that was passed long ago, and as it is very numerously signed, — there being attached to it signatures to the amount of 3000, all belonging to persons filling respectable situations in life, — I think that the sentiments expressed in it are certainly deserving of the notice of your Lordships. The petitioners are anxious for the repeal of the Catholic Relief Act. So am I; and I declare that I believe the same feeling is rapidly increasing in this country; I believe, I say, that the people of England are fast becoming desirous for the repeal of the Act which is falsely called the "Roman Catholic Emancipation Act." The professed object of passing that Act was, to give peace and tranquillity to Ireland. Now, I do not think that there is any individual, either within your Lordships' House or without it, who supported that measure in its passage through Parliament, who can now honestly lay his hand on his heart, and say, that he does not feel that the results which were then anticipated from it have not been realised? It may be in the recollection of those who did me the honour of attending to me at that time, that I then stated my conviction that there were two distinct bodies belonging to the Roman Catholic church, — namely, the Romanists and the Papists; and that though I was totally opposed to any measure which should go to alter the Protestant form of this Government, yet, to certain concessions, of a civil nature, to the Roman Catholics of this country, I was not wholly opposed. The Roman Catholics of this country, I do think, use the power they have acquired by this Act in a very different manner from the Roman Catholics of Ireland. With respect, however, to the means which were taken to induce your Lordships to agree to the concession of that power, I will say, that though it was stated in evidence on oath, before a committee of your Lordships' House, that the most objectionable doctrines of Catholicism were no longer held by British Catholics; yet, I believe those doctrines were only suspended for the time, and are now again in full force. I believe, if I had a committee of your Lordships, I should be able to show that all those doctrines which are most obnoxious and reprehensible in the Catholic creed were revived and re-embodied about the year 1836, in a manual of theology, published for the use of the Roman Catholic clergy. There — are to be seen all the most obnoxious doctrines that Papal Rome ever held. There — it will be found that some of the most ridiculous Papal bulls are still in force. The publication of this book I believe to have been the signal for reviving the doctrines to which I allude; and from that moment the Roman Catholic church put forth the whole of its power to destroy Protestant government, and undermine Protestant authority, in Ireland. The consequences of this have shaken the Protestant Church from its centre to its foundation. I may say from its centre to its foundation; because, if the church, as by law established, were upset in any single part of the empire, the whole must fall together, throughout the realm.

After the concession of the Roman Catholic claims in 1829, the ingenuity of man could not conceive a scheme so well calculated for the overthrow of Protestantism in this country, and the re-establishment of the Roman Catholic religion in its stead, as is the late scheme for national education, contained in the minute of Privy Council. I say this, because I am prepared to contend that the Roman Catholic religion only flourishes where ignorance and superstition reign; and that where a system of education prevails, in which only general instruction is to be given in religion, — ignorance and superstition must be the results. Would to God your Lordships, at the time of considering the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, had not listened to the voice of that individual whose evidence before your Lordships' committee weighed so much in inducing many of you to side with the supporters of the Bill! Would to God you had not listened to the voice of that individual, who called me a furious and intolerant bigot, although I can put my hand on my heart and say, that I am sincerely attached to the cause both of civil and religious freedom, and therefore not liable to the charge of intolerant bigotry! I believe I am as tolerant in my disposition as any man in this House. I opposed the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, not from intolerance, but from a belief that, if passed into a law, it would be found inconsistent with Protestant security; and I feel safe in stating this, — that that consideration is at length aroused all over the country. When, however, the measure passed into law, I said that I should be the last man who would seek to shrink from upholding it. From that day to this I have never made an observation tending to elicit anything of a feeling in the country which might interfere with the due operation of the measure.

I by no means flattered myself that the power then conceded to the Roman Catholics might be used by all of them, without attempting to trench on the rights of the established church, — without attempting, as a considerable body are now desirous of doing, to take measures for the destruction of everything dear to us. I stated, at the time, that the power granted would be so used, and that the Protestants would be obliged, eventually, to unite, and that the time might very possibly arrive, when England would see me the greatest agitator on earth. Power, given to Roman Catholics, your Lordships may depend upon it, will always be exerted against the security and interests of the Protestant Church: but this, the Protestant people of England never will suffer; this, the Protestant Dissenters, to a man, will join the members of the establishment in preventing, — in defence of the rights of conscience and of that happy constitution which has given to us, individually and nationally, a greater share of liberty than has ever yet fallen to the lot of any other nation under the sun. That the people are rapidly approaching to a conviction that England must retrace her steps in this matter, I am fully convinced. I will only add, that, though I am not at present prepared to make any motion on the subject of the petition, still I will say, that, if these officers go on as they have done, I shall certainly bring the matter under your Lordships' notice, by a substantive proceeding, at a future day.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I am anxious, for one, to offer some answer to that which formed the substance of the eloquent and impressive speech of the Noble Earl; I say eloquent and impressive, for such must everything be that comes warm from the feelings; — and from his feelings I fully believe that that Noble Earl always speaks, — for a more conscientious, fearless, and honest mind than the Noble Earl's, I am persuaded, does not exist. The appeal which the Noble Earl makes to all who had any concern in carrying the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act is substantially this, — that of those who assisted to pass the measure, there is not one who, if he had known, then, what he knows, now, would at this day agree to such measure; or who, if he were now to lay his hand on his heart, would say he does not repent of his share in it. The idea of the Noble Earl is, I take it, that, as at present informed, the then supporters of the Bill, if they do not repent of their share in passing it, at least feel great discontent and distrust in respect to its operation. On examining my own heart, and considering all the public events which have happened since 1829, when the Act was passed, with the large experience subsequent to that time which I have had of its working, and with some little acquaintance with the question, — having supported emancipation from the first period of my entrance upon public life, — I should, if it were to do afresh, advocate, to-day, the same opinions as I advocated then, and up to 1829, when the measure was carried, with all his characteristic firmness, by the Noble Duke. Some men, it is true, there are, who now profess themselves disappointed with the effects of the measure. But why is this? Because they entertained the most extravagant notions of the good that measure was to effect, — for they believed that a benefit withheld for years could do as much good, when at length it was conceded, as if it had been passed at first. They who thought much was to be expected from a measure passed under such circumstances, have no right to be disappointed if the results, at present, fall below their extravagant anticipations. If any one think that it is in the course of a few years that centuries of misgovernment can be rolled back, and the people of Ireland placed in the same condition, all at once, as if such misgovernment had never been, — if any one is so extravagant and romantic as to think this, — that man will, by no means, be justified in complaining of the disappointment of his anticipations. Why, it was all along of the very essence of the argument of those who supported the measure, that delay would be most injurious to the success of the measure, and most detractive from the benefits which, if it were passed in season, might reasonably be looked for from it. What else was the argument of Mr. Pitt, when he quitted the Administration upon this question? What was his argument, again, in the famous declaration with which he armed Lord Cornwallis, and by which the Union was virtually effected? What else was the argument to which, in 1805, Mr. Grattan lent the aid of his masterly eloquence? What else was the essence of Mr. Canning's argument, from 1809 down to 1827; what, but that it would be dangerous to the peace of the country that it should be thought we were withholding justice from the Roman Catholics; and that such a delay of justice could not fail to produce in Ireland that discontent which is a gangrene in its society, and which all that good government could do for years to come would be unable to eradicate from that ill-fated land? What was it they insisted upon, year after year, but that the longer a people were kept out of their rights, the less was the gift of them effectual and beneficial? And this is the truth. If he gives twice who gives quickly, he halves and quarters his gift who only gives after perpetual delay and delay. He, therefore, is most extravagant and romantic, who expects from a measure delayed, as this has been, the same benefits as if no delay had happened.

Thus much for the first part of the Noble Earl's observations. In reference to the second, I will say, that when your Lordships have gone on, year after year, withholding from the people of Ireland the rights of conscience, and the liberty of worshipping God in the way each man thinks right, "no man making them afraid;" — withholding, too, the removal of disabilities, because those on whom they press were of a different belief from yourselves; — I say, that if there be one man among you, who can expect that when

at last the thing is granted as a boon, and the pressure removed which has fixed discontent in the minds of a party forming the great bulk of the Irish people, until hatred, opposition to law, and dislike of English rule become a part of their second nature, — for custom is second nature; — if there be such a man, — for he is not deserving the name of statesman, — as to think that the people should all at once forget all that is past, and totally and abruptly change the character which for ages they have been acquiring, forming, and fixing; — I say that such a man has no right to be disappointed if the result fall below his expectations. It would be unwise to expect that such things could be accomplished by any act of human legislation; it is unjust to complain that the measure has failed, if it only fail to answer such wild and chimerical expectations. None of the friends of Catholic emancipation ever expected that that measure, alone, would be sufficient to correct all the calamities of Ireland. They always said that nothing could be done without that foundation; but they never said that the foundation was all that was required. It is just as if any one, knowing a supply of fresh air to the lungs to be necessary to sustain the life of man, should argue that that, alone, would be sufficient to keep him in health and strength. So with regard to Ireland; it is clear that the removal of the great obstruction to improvement in the habits of its population, is the chief requisite; but this is not enough: it is necessary, in order to introduce a better state of things, to remove other grievances that press heavily on the people. Thus much have I said of the injustice done to the great measure of emancipation, by the one-sided and partial views of the Noble Earl. But I should much mistake my own opinion, if I did not add, that I think the habitual factious dispositions which have grown up under the old system are equally inveterate on both sides; they exist not only in the minds of the Orangemen towards the Catholics, but in the minds of the Catholics towards the Orangemen. I deeply lament that Ireland should thus be made the prey of faction in its worst shape, that of religious rancour combined with political animosity — that the spirit of dissension should mix itself with the ordinary relations of society, and with all the affairs of life, — eating, as it were, like a foul ulcer, into the body politic. All unprejudiced persons must see that it will require a long course of firm, paternal, equal, and impartial administration of the law, as well as much improvement of the law itself, to eradicate this spirit, and make Irish society resemble that happier state of things which is to be found in this country. I have no manner of doubt that the task will be a difficult one; that the government of Ireland is a load too heavy for almost any shoulders; that it will be a hard thing to carry out, fully, the intentions of the Legislature, in granting Catholic emancipation, and thus to restore tranquillity to Ireland. But I am comforted by seeing that considerable progress towards these results has been made within the last nine or ten years; and if those principles which have generally guided men's conduct during that period should still prevail, and the Legislature should persevere in aiding the efforts of the Government by improving the laws, I should entertain, in spite of the apprehensions of the Noble Earl and the petitioners, confident and sanguine hopes of a successful issue. Having been all my life a firm supporter of emancipation, I was unwilling to allow this opportunity to pass without addressing these few observations to your Lordships

The EARL of WICKLOW. — I, also, cannot allow the important discussion which has arisen respecting the petition which has this evening been presented by the Noble Earl, to close without offering a few observations, — particularly as the first act of my political life was to give my support to the Roman Catholic Emancipation Bill. My Noble Friend having appealed to all the advocates of that measure to say whether the good they anticipated from it has been obtained, I am ready to lay my hand on my heart and declare that it has produced all the good I ever expected from it. If I were again called on to give a vote on the question, I would give it in the affirmative. All the additional information I have acquired since 1829, the more confirms me in my view. It is very easy to talk of evils as the result of a measure, — it is very easy to say that all the evils of Ireland are to be ascribed to the Act in question, — but it is very difficult to prove the truth of the assertion. It is not easy to say how much those evils might have been aggravated at the present moment, had that measure not passed. For my part, looking at the spirit which has been afloat for some time, not only on the continent of Europe, but in this country, I am induced to think that most disastrous consequences might have ensued, had Government refused to concede the measure to the unanimous wishes of the people of Ireland, and to the wishes of the great proportion of the people of this country. It was asserted in Parliament, when that measure was under discussion, — and the opponents of the Bill did not venture to deny it, — that the great proportion of the people of this country were favourable to the Bill; and the fact is proved by the circumstance that a majority of the representatives of the people demanded it, Session after Session, till at last no Government could have carried on affairs without conceding it. I have always considered that the Government of the day acted in the most prudent as well in the most honest and manly manner, in consenting to waive the objections they had previously entertained to the measure, and declaring that they could not administer the affairs of the country unless it were carried. I agree with my Noble Friend in regretting the evil influence of the Irish Roman Catholic clergy, but I dissent from his opinion that that influence is increased by the Emancipation Act. Before the passing of the Act, that influence was exercised in interfering with the elections to as great an extent as now; and I am as satisfied as I am of my own existence, that, but for that Act, it would have been, at this moment, much more formidable.

The EARL of RODEN. — Holding the strong opinions which I have always held upon this most important subject, I cannot help saying a very few words in reply to what has fallen from my Noble Friend who has just sat down. Never can I forget the words of that great man who so long filled the woolsack, "that the sun of England would set on the day when the Catholic Relief Bill should pass." I look upon the present condition of this country as far inferior to its condition before that measure became law. I remember that when the Bill was before your Lordships, there were certain regulations made, certain amendments proposed, to prevent the evils which it was feared would arise from it. I remember that one argument against the measure was, that there would be an increase of Jesuits in this country. And what has happened? Just what was stated would come to pass; for we find, in Ireland, large establishments of Jesuits, and in many parts of England also, set up for the very purpose of propagating the Roman Catholic religion. I have ever been taught to believe that that religion, as heretofore established in this country, would be calculated to destroy the civil and religious liberty of the people. I have seen nothing in any change that has taken place to make me suppose that any other effect is likely to be produced from it; and therefore I do conceive that it was most important, if it had been possible, to prevent this evil to which I have referred, — and particularly the power which would be exercised by the Jesuits. I know it has been the habit of Noble Lords to smile at the notion of that power; but I believe there is full ground for believing that the Roman Catholic faith is extending widely throughout this country. I believe that cannot be denied; and I dread that extension, inasmuch as I know that the power is used chiefly to effect temporal objects. In the library of the University of Dublin there is to be found a work of great antiquity, entitled Secreta Monita, which states "that princesses and ladies of quality are easily to be gained by the influence of their women of the bedchamber. Therefore, by all means, pay particular attention to their women, by favour of whom you will easily gain access to the family, no secret of which will remain hid from us." Now, I consider this extract somewhat applicable to that class of persons to whom I have referred, which is extending itself through England and Ireland, and, I believe, effecting a very great change in this country. I believe what my Noble Friend has stated, — namely, that there is a very strong feeling growing up with respect to this question. The Protestants of England, I am happy to see, are now awakening from their late apathy, in which they have lived ever since the passing of the Bill of 1829. I believe they consider that nothing can save this country from ruin, — from a tremendous crisis, — but their boldly coming forward and forcing the Government — be they who they may — to introduce some measure founded on such principles as history manifests to have been most advantageous to the interests of the country at large. I hope we shall be so overpowered with petitions on this subject, as will cause those Noble Lords, who may wish to shut their ears to the complaints of existing grievances, to attend to wishes so generally expressed. I trust this will be the case; and as regards any Bill that may be brought forward on the subject, I do hope it may be found beneficial to the people of England, and, above all, to the people of Scotland, who, I know, love the Protestant religion, and who, I trust, will not be backward in expressing their sentiments to Parliament on the important subject that now engages your Lordships.

lief Act; and I confess, that, if I were now placed under similar circumstances, I should do so again; but, looking to existing facts, I am not bound to say how I should act if such a measure were now proposed. At the same time, I think that many evils which have been attributed to the Catholic Relief Act, are more properly chargeable to the Irish Reform Act, which was, by an injudicious Government, flung into the hands of the democracy, when they did not seek for it. That Act has given the priesthood such power, that three fourths of the representation are now as completely in their hands as the nomination boroughs once were in those of their owners.

The petition was then read, and ordered to lie on the table.

PROTECTION AGAINST BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Read a second time (according to order), and committed to a committee of the whole House on Monday next.

COMMON PLEAS REGULATION BILL.

On moving the second reading of this Bill, —

The LORD CHANCELLOR said: — According to a very ancient practice in the Court of Common Pleas, serjeants have an exclusive privilege to act in that court. Now, the object of the present Bill is to modify the existing regulations respecting that exclusive privilege, in conformity with the Report of the commissioners of 1829; and I certainly think that this proposition is calculated to receive your Lordships' approbation.

LORD WYNFORD. — I, for one, certainly very much approve of the alteration which is proposed to be made by this Bill; and, without dwelling on its merits, I beg to express my hope that it will meet with the concurrence of your Lordships.

The Bill was then a second time, and committed to a committee of the whole House on Monday next.

EDUCATION BILL.

Second reading (which stands appointed for Monday next) put off to Monday, the 1st of July next, and the Lords summoned.

BEER ACT IN PART REPEAL BILL.

Recommitment (which stands appointed for Tuesday next) put off to Tuesday, the 2d of July next, and the Lords summoned.

COLONIES LEGISLATION BILL.

Committee (which stood appointed for this day) put off sine die.

SOUTH EASTERN RAILWAY (No. 2.) BILL.

Referred to the Standing Orders Committee on Tuesday next; and a witness ordered to attend.

SABBATH.

Petition for the better observance of, and for suspension of the business of the Post Office on the Sabbath, — of inhabitants of Winster. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Petitions for the better observance of, — of inhabitants of Shirland; Brailsford; Winster; and St. Alkmund, Derby. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CAMBER QUAYS (PORTSMOUTH) BILL.

Petition in favour of, — of inhabitants of Portsmouth. — Read, and referred to the select committee on the Bill.

CHURCH DISCIPLINE BILL.

Petition against, — of clergy of the diocese of Canterbury. — Read, and referred to the select committee on the Bill.

SCOTCH CHURCH.

Petitions for the further endowment of, — of the ministers and elders of the town of Dundee, in general session assembled: and of inhabitants of East Anstruther; Yarrow; Kilmalie; Salen; Farnell; and Craig. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

PRESBYTERIANS.

Petition praying that provision may be made for the instruction of soldiers of the Presbyterian religion in the tenets of their peculiar faith, — of ministers and elders of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland met at Edinburgh. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

POSTAGE.

Petitions for reduction of the rate of, — of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Dover: and of inhabitants of Culroy; Dunkeld; Broadclist; and Duntesbourne Militis. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FINANCES OF THE COUNTRY.

Petition of Samuel Wells, of the Fen Office, Serjeant's Inn, in the city of London, barrister at law, and register to the Honourable the corporation of the Great Level of the Fens called Bedford Level, taking a review of the financial condition of the country, and suggesting remedies for correcting the evils complained of, and praying for inquiry into the subject. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

PAPERS.

Annual Account of the directors of Margate Pier and Harbour. — Delivered, and ordered to lie on the table.

Thirteenth Report of the Commissioners of the Metropolis Turnpike Roads, North of the Thames. — Delivered (pursuant to Act), and ordered to lie on the table.

Copies of the answers received by the commissioners appointed to inquire as to the best means of establishing an efficient constabulary force, to the following query, circulated by them to magistrates in petty sessions and the guardians of unions: — "Are the beer-shops or public houses within your division the subject of complaint? and are they, in point of fact, ill conducted?" — Delivered (pursuant to Address of Tuesday last), and to be printed.

REDCAR HARBOUR (No. 2.) BILL.

Petition from Tynemouth, in favour.

Petition of the president of the Bristol Chamber of Commerce, Trade, and Manufactures, against.

Ordered to lie on the table.

Motion made by Mr. CAYLEY, and question proposed, — "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Mr. W. ORD. — I rise to oppose the motion. By the Standing Orders, no Report on a Private Bill can be received after the 14th of June. Besides, at this late period of the Session, I think it is quite useless to attempt to proceed with this Bill. I therefore move, as an amendment, that it be read a second time this day three months.

Mr. ALDERMAN THOMPSON. — I second the amendment. My principal objection to the Bill is, that it goes to levy a tax upon all vessels that shall pass the proposed harbour, even supposing they may not run within twenty miles of it, and perhaps not enter it once in twelve months. The House has always disapproved of allowing passing tolls to be levied on shipping in Private Bills, — so much so, that a measure was introduced and passed both Houses, repealing provisions of that kind which had been introduced into the Fishcar Harbour Bill.

SIR F. TRENCH. — I rise to order. I think it is irregular to discuss this Bill in the face of the Standing Order. We are now only at the second reading, whereas the Report ought to have been brought up some days ago.

The SPEAKER. — The House may enlarge the time fixed by the Standing Order for receiving Reports on Private Bills.

Mr. P. THOMSON. — I feel it my duty to oppose any Private Bill which proposes to authorise the levying of passing tolls on shipping. The House has already refused to sanction such provisions, and I entirely agree in the principle of doing so. The imposition of passing tolls must be justified on public grounds, and made the subject of a Public Bill. The Honourable Alderman has alluded to the repeal of the Fishcar Harbour Bill last year; but I am sorry to say that, instead of being able to carry that repeal by a Public Bill, I was obliged to pass a Private Act for the purpose. The parties interested in the Fishcar Harbour, however, were gainers by the measure, — for they actually received compensation.

SIR E. CODRINGTON. — Having been a member of the Select Committee on Refuge Harbours, I must say that, from the evidence which was adduced before that committee, and from a strict attention to the subject, I am satisfied that this Bill should be allowed to pass, — inasmuch as it will afford protection, in a very great degree, to life and property. The insurance of ships passing along the North-east coast at present is as much as 10 per cent.; and the imposition of a halfpenny per ton of passing toll will reduce that expense to the owners of those vessels. The construction of a harbour at Redcar would, I am satisfied, be the saving of nine tenths of the lives and property, now, annually lost on that part of the coast. Had there been a harbour of refuge at Redcar, the Forfarshire steamer might have been saved. Nothing is required but a reasonable outlay to improve the natural protection of the locality, which is so available, that a foreign vessel, which had drifted in between the two ledges of rocks, was saved from being wrecked, almost without knowing how. I shall, therefore, support the Bill. If the House do not choose to pass it, then, I say, let a Public Bill be introduced by the Government, and let them bear the whole expense of such a measure. It is the duty of the Board of Trade to protect the valuable lives and property that are too often lost on that exposed and barren coast. I am sorry to see that those whose own lives are not exposed to risk should evince so much indifference to the danger of others.

He jests at scars, that never felt a wound.

Mr. AARON CHAPMAN. — The Gallant Admiral's opinions are entitled to the highest respect on such questions as the present; but the Gallant Admiral is not so well acquainted with the North-east coast as he is with other parts of the world. Those who are locally acquainted with the coast have expressed their disapprobation of such vain and impracticable schemes as this Redcar Harbour. It is a mere coinage of the engineer's brain, who is a most obstinate person. Were the harbour in existence, I should object to that part of the Bill which goes to establish a passing toll. Were it even practicable, it would cost an enormous sum of money to complete it; and even were it completed, no vessel which could keep the open sea would risk going into it.

SIR G. STRICKLAND. — I must say that I am surprised at the observations of the Honourable Member for Whitby, whose evidence before the Refuge Harbour Committee was full of humane principles in reference to the scenes of misery which that Honourable Gentleman described as arising from the loss of lives and property by shipwreck. If proof be still required of the necessity of a refuge harbour at Redcar, I would refer Honourable Members to Lloyds' List, where they will find it recorded, that, within the deep bight, on the barren and exposed line of coast formed by North Sunderland Point (near the Fern Islands) and Flamborough Head, — a length of about 100 miles, — no less than 788 vessels were wrecked or driven ashore during 12 years, from 1821 to 1832 inclusive, — or an average of above 65 vessels annually. I admit that the principle of a passing toll is objectionable, if the object can be otherwise accomplished. But I have heard of no other plan by which the means could be procured for the construction of the harbour; and unless it be adopted, this dreadful loss of life and property must continue to be sustained. I wish the Government would take the matter up, and direct a proper survey to be made. Being convinced that the harbour can be made at a moderate expense, I shall support the Bill, which I believe to have for its object the preservation of life and property, and the prevention of much human misery and suffering.

SIR F. TRENCH. — That the North-east coast is in want of refuge harbours is true, but the levying of a passing toll I consider a principle most unjust. Besides, although such a harbour is required, I think it is quite plain that it should not be at Redcar, but rather at Scarborough.

[Laughter.]

Honourable Members may think me prejudiced in favour of Scarborough; but I do maintain that the harbour ought to be at Scarborough, and be made at the Government expense, because a reference to Lloyds' List, to which allusion has been already made, will show that three fourths of the shipwrecks on the North-east coast occur within the bight of Scarborough.

Digitized by Google

Mr. CRESSWELL.—I have seen many wrecks on the Northumberland coast, and I am confident that not one out of twenty of them would have been prevented by the proposed harbour; for not one vessel out of twenty, caught on a lee shore, would be able to work round Huntly Cliff to reach the harbour; and if she were able, and succeeded in doing so, she would not require the harbour, for she could then keep at sea. If the Bill be brought forward on a ground of humanity, I must only say that I do not think we have any right to gratify our feelings of humanity at the expense of the shipowners.

ADMIRAL SIR C. ADAM.—I wish to make one remark. I have taken great pains to investigate the merits of this Bill. Not trusting to my own opinion, alone, I have taken the advice of Captain Beaufort, the hydrographer to the Admiralty, who is decidedly in favour of a harbour at Redcar, and who says he knows no place more appropriate for the purpose.

Mr. H. LAMBTON.—I shall vote against the Bill, on the ground—which no one has attempted to dispute—of its establishing a system of general taxation under the provisions of a Private Bill. But if the Government of the country will take up the question of refuge harbours, I am satisfied that Members on both sides of the House will support them in such an undertaking,—and I believe that even my Honourable Friend the Member for Kilkenny would not object to the outlay of public money for such a humane and truly national purpose.

Mr. HUME.—I have several times recommended the matter to the attention of the Government, because I always thought it bad economy to allow our ships to be wrecked, and valuable lives lost, owing to a want of proper harbours. My objection to the present Bill is, the levying of passing tolls. When the Honourable Member for Devon moved for a commission to examine that part of the coast, I urged the extension of it so far as to include a survey of the north-eastern coast as far as Tynemouth, and even to the Frith of Forth, in order that we might have the opinions of the ablest men on this point. After what has fallen from the Gallant Admiral the Member for Clackmannan, I trust that this matter will receive the attention of the Board of Admiralty and her Majesty's Government. I do not believe there is a man in this House who would not gladly support the adoption of any real and well digested plan. I will go further, and say that there are many measures of great public utility connected with our naval service, which the Government might have brought forward, but which they have neglected. When I object to money votes, it is to injudicious and useless grants; but I have said again and again that the public money could not be better expended than in obtaining a survey of our coast, and improving our harbours. While, therefore, I shall vote against the Redcar Harbour Bill, I shall be equally ready to support any efficient general plan that may be proposed to accomplish that desirable object.

Mr. CAYLEY.—The Honourable Member for Whitby has represented this as a visionary scheme. Now, I have only to say that it has been recommended by Captain Beaufort, of the Admiralty, by Mr. Cubitt, and other eminent engineers, who have all reported that Redcar is the best place for a refuge harbour. I trust that good will arise out of this discussion; and, after what has fallen from a gallant member of the Board of Admiralty, that the discussion will be followed by something more than words.

DR. LUSHINGTON.—If this were a question whether harbours of refuge were necessary or not, or whether Redcar was a proper spot to select for such a purpose, I would not venture to obtrude my sentiments on the House; but as that is not the question, and I represent a large portion of the shipping interest, I feel it my duty to offer two or three remarks. The real question is, whether the House is prepared to impose a general tax on the shipping interest of the country for the purpose of forming this harbour at Redcar, when that interest has not expressed any opinion in favour of such a measure? There are no persons more astute in attending to their own interests than the shipowners of this country. None are more anxious for the preservation of human life. And no doubt can exist that they would have given their consent to the Bill, had they found it likely to be attended with benefit to themselves, or likely to prevent the loss of life and property. I venture to say, that if you inquire amongst the whole body of shipowners in London, you will not find half a dozen voices in favour of the Bill,—at least, amongst my constituents. I shall therefore vote against it.

Mr. INGHAM.—I do not rise for the purpose of advancing any further arguments against the Bill, but merely to exress an earnest hope that the Government ill act upon the suggestion of the Hourable Member for Kilkenny, and initute an inquiry upon the subject, with view to some general public measure.

SIR C. LEMON.—I shall vote against his Bill, because I feel that, if harbours re required, they ought to be built out of he public purse.

Mr. O'CONNELL.—The dictates of umanity render the construction of reuge harbours absolutely necessary; and he only question is, how the expense of heir construction shall be defrayed? I bject to the levying of passing tolls under his Bill; but I think that point might be onsidered in committee.

Question, as amended, put, and agreed to. Bill put off for three months.

LONDON CITY POLICE BILL.

Read a third time.

Mr. F. MAULE.—I have here several clauses which I intend to propose shall be added to this Bill by way of rider. The course I mean to pursue with regard to them is, to move that they be read a first and second time, and then be referred to the committee to which the London Police Bill was referred, in order that the committee may report that they are proper clauses to be inserted.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE.—I think, Sir, that this is a most extraordinary proceeding to adopt in reference to a Private Bill, or, at least, a Bill which we are, on one day, told is a Private Bill, and, on another, a Public Bill,—as it suits the purposes of the time. I do not object to the Bill as it now stands; but I do object to almost every one of the clauses, thirty-four in number, which it is proposed to introduce. Why were not these clauses introduced when the Bill was in committee? The truth is, they are of an objectionable nature, and therefore an attempt is made to smuggle them through by means of a committee up-stairs. They make a great alteration in the law, as they confer upon magistrates a summary power which they do not now possess. The other Bill is to extend fifteen miles round London, and this Bill is to form the model for a rural police. The House ought, therefore, to look at these clauses with the greatest jealousy. I object to their being referred to a select committee. If they are good, let them be publicly discussed in the House, for it is but right that two millions of her Majesty's subjects should know the law which is to guide them hereafter.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—I am sure that those Gentlemen who attended to the discussion, the other evening, will think that the Honourable Member for Finsbury is rather inconsistent. The same clauses were discussed in committee on the Metropolitan Police Bill, and agreed to by a committee of the whole House. Upon that occasion the Honourable Gentleman said, that if they were good on this side of Temple Bar, they were good on the other; and, now, the Honourable Gentleman turns round and complains of their being extended to the city!

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — Yes; but I did not say they "were" good for either.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I hope that the clauses which it is proposed to introduce will have the effect of removing the apprehension of the Honourable Member for Finsbury, touching the extension of the operation of this Bill to the rural districts. I trust that no such scheme need be apprehended. At the same time, I cannot understand why these clauses were not introduced at the proper stage. I think it highly improper to have recourse to this anomalous course of inserting them after the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. F. MAULE. — It did not occur to the committee to introduce the clauses till after the discussion which took place on the Metropolitan Police Bill. All the clauses, except two or three, are already the law of the land.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS. — I concur with the Honourable Member for Finsbury in condemning the course which has been pursued with respect to this Bill. It is a measure which affects so large a portion of the people, that it ought to have been made a Public Bill, and not left to the management of a private committee. I am opposed to these clauses, and will oppose them in every stage.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I think it might be better not to introduce the clauses into this Bill, but, on the recommitment of the Metropolitan Police Bill, I would introduce a clause to declare that these particular clauses should apply as well to the city as to the metropolitan district; and this would then come under the consideration of a committee of the whole House.

SIR R. PEEL.—In my opinion, whatever is the proper law for the metropolitan district, ought to be the law for the city; for there would be no good in establishing a new law for the police, if we did not include the city as well as that part of the metropolis, which is, in fact, the town. I would suggest that the present Bill should be withdrawn; and that, after the clauses shall have been agreed to in the Metropolitan Police Bill, a fresh City Bill should be introduced, containing these clauses, and that that should be pressed without opposition to the same stage as the present Bill now stands.

MAJOR WOOD.— Sir, on the part of my constituents, I must protest against its being thought that these clauses have been yet sufficiently considered in committee. They are, at any rate, peculiarly fitted for, and ought to be limited to, town districts.

Mr. F. MAULE. — Sir, as the Right Honourable Gentleman thinks that the course proposed would expose the discussion of the Bill to interruption, I will propose to withdraw all the clauses, except two or three necessary to be introduced into this Bill; and I now give notice that when the General Metropolitan Police Bill shall be under discussion, I will introduce words to declare that these clauses shall extend to the city. The first clause which I would add to the present Bill declares, that the Secretary of State, in case of emergency, shall have power to permit the metropolitan police to act within the city of London under the authority of their own officers, and the London police to act in the same manner within the metropolitan districts. Honourable Gentlemen will see that such a provision will be necessary to meet the disturbance generally attendant on the first establishment of a police force in any district.

Digitized by Google

Mr. GOULBURN. — It really strikes me that the course proposed will be subject to great inconvenience. You will have one Bill for the metropolitan police, and another for the city police. I think the better way would be, to postpone these two Bills, and introduce another, bringing both forces under one head.

Mr. WAKLEY. — Sir, I hope that the Noble Lord will accede to the request of the Right Honourable Gentleman; for, without it, it is impossible to do justice to the public. Two Bills are before the House, one for the metropolitan police, and the other for the London police. Looking at the two Bills, I see in them no uniformity, — one being a Private, the other a Public, Bill; and I should like to know which Bill is recommended by the Government? I desire that one Bill should be perfect, before we go on to legislate upon the other; and I hope that, if these clauses are brought up, they will be printed before they are taken into consideration, and that, therefore, the question, "That the Bill do pass," will not be put this evening.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I have no objection to adopt the course recommended by the Right Honourable Gentleman, and will therefore consent to an opportunity being afforded to consider the subject in a committee of the whole House.

Mr. LEADER. — I am not sure whether I am strictly regular in alluding to the subject to which I am about to refer, but I will take the chance of obtaining the attention of the House to the observations which I am about to make. I beg to draw the attention of Honourable Members to the seventh clause in the Bill; and I wish to be informed what is the meaning of the provisions contained in it? It purports to enact that the commissioner of police shall not hold a seat in Parliament. I believe that this enactment is especially aimed against an Honourable Member of this House.

[Cries of "No!"]

It is very easy to say "No!" — but I should like to be informed for what purpose the clause was put into the Bill? and unless some good reason be shown for its adoption, I shall oppose it.

Mr. MACKINNON. — Sir, I am sure that no instance can be cited, in which any attempt has been made to deprive a Member of his seat in this House, — by a Private Bill. If we make an objection in the case of the commissioner of police, the argument might, with equal justice, apply to the recorder, or any other officer of the same description. It might be said, perhaps, with some show of propriety, that the commissioner ought not to sit as Member for the city of London; but if the principle were to be extended beyond that point, I think that the House would act with great unfairness.

The SPEAKER. — The question now before the House is upon the subject of bringing up certain clauses. The section of the Bill to which the Honourable Members have referred, is not, therefore, under consideration.

On the motion of Mr. FOX MAULE, the clauses were then ordered to be printed, and to be further considered on Wednesday next.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS,

again, and for other Purposes therein mentioned," as desired by this House; and that they do request that the said minutes of evidence may be returned to them.

ADMIRALTY COURT.

Bill "to make Provision for the Judge, Registrar, and Marshal of the High Court of Admiralty, and to extend the Jurisdiction and improve the Practice of the Court." — Presented, and read a first time; to be read a second time on Friday next, and to be printed.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS (IRELAND).

Bill "to consolidate the Jurisdiction of the several Ecclesiastical Courts in Ireland into one Court, and to enlarge the Powers and Authorities of such Court, and to alter and amend the Law in certain Matters Ecclesiastical." — Presented, and read a first time; to be read a second time on Monday, 1st of July, and to be printed.

RETURNS.

Sugar. — On the motion of Mr. CRESSWELL, Return ordered —

Of all foreign sugar refined in bond in the port of London and the outports, and to what places, with the respective quantities, the same has been exported, from the 1st day of January, 1839, to the latest period.

Cotton. — On the motion of Mr. CRESSWELL, Return ordered —

Of the quantity of cotton, in number of bags and pounds nett weight, imported from the United States of America into Great Britain, from the 5th day of January, to the 5th day of June, in the years 1838 and 1839 respectively; distinguishing the ports from which shipped from the United States, and to which imported into Great Britain.

MISCELLANEOUS PETITIONS.

The following petitions were severally presented, and ordered to lie on the table; namely, —

Shannon Navigation Improvement Bill, — From the company of undertakers of the Grand Canal, praying to be heard at the bar of the House, or otherwise, against the Bill, and in defence of their corporate rights, privileges, and immunities, by themselves, counsel, and agents.

Postage, — For a low and uniform rate, — from the convener and commissioners of the eight southern districts of Edinburgh; and Falmouth union.

Lord's Day. — Two petitions from Winster, for better observance.

Poor Law Amendment Act, — From Stokesley union, for alteration regarding settlement.

Education, — From Cheshunt, against the proposed scheme.

Queen's Printer (Scotland), — Of the moderator and clerk of the United Associate congregation of Bristo Street, Edinburgh, against renewal of the patent for printing Bibles.

AFFAIRS OF PERSIA.

Mr. MACKINNON. — Sir, seeing the Noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in his place, I beg to ask a question of him with regard to the Persian mission. Her Majesty, in her Speech from the throne, said, "Differences which have arisen have occasioned the retirement of my Minister from the Court of Teheran;" and it appears that Sir John M'Neill has been in this country for some time past, and has had an audience of her Majesty. I wish to know, then, whether that mission has terminated? It appears, also, that the secretary to the embassy is still in Turkey, and is at Erzeroum, within eleven days' journey of Teheran; and it is further stated that there has been some substantial difference between this country and Persia, and that the Government of this country has refused to receive the envoy of Persia. I desire to be furnished with some information upon that subject. And I shall also request an answer upon a third point. We are aware that 12,000*l.* are allowed annually by the East India Company to defray the expenses of the mission to Persia; and I contend, that, although that is paid by the East India Company, yet that it is within the control of this House, as being also under the control of the Noble Lord. I wish to know, then, how that money is now expended? and whether the persons who compose the embassy continue to receive their salaries?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — The Honourable Gentleman has indulged in a very long exordium to a very short question. I might answer him in a very few words, but that I conceive it proper to set him right upon some of the facts which he has stated. We must all know that when differences arise between two Governments, it often happens that the envoy of one of them is withdrawn, without putting an end to any amicable communications which may have been opened. In the present instance, the difference which exists is very far short of an absolute rupture, and a temporary retirement of the mission has taken place. That is the state in which we stand with regard to Persia. Sir John M'Neill is at home on leave of absence, which was granted to him before the occurrence that gave rise to the retirement of his successor; and although he has had an audience of her Majesty, this must not be supposed to have been granted on the conclusion of this mission, but only on his return upon leave of absence. The chargé d'affaires has withdrawn from the territories of Persia on account of difficulties which have intervened in our relations with the Schah; but he was ordered to remain at Erzeroum, the nearest point to the Persian frontier, for the express purpose of being at hand to receive any communication which might be made. On the other hand, the Persian Government has sent an ambassador to this country; but he has been told that he cannot be received until the differences between the two countries shall have been arranged. The ambassador is now in London, and I have had some private communications with him. Now, for the last question, it has happened, as in previous similar instances, that the mission is not at an end, but has only retired. Sir John M'Neill is subject to the regulations which exist in other analogous instances, and his salary will be reduced by one half during his absence. The chargé d'affaires does the duties of the office, and receives the salary of the envoy. The expenses of the mission, therefore, go on as if the envoy had not returned from Persia.

Mr. MACLEAN. — As we are not at war with Persia, I beg to ask whether sufficient reparation has been made by the Schah for the insult offered to the messenger of Sir John M'Neill? I desire to ask, also, whether the Noble Viscount is satisfied with the explanation which has been given by Count Nesselrode of the conduct of Count Simonich and Lieutenant Viscovitch, in certain proceedings of theirs in connection with the negotiations with Persia? There is another question which I wish to put, and that will be all. I wish to ask whether any account has been received in this country (as we are not at war with Persia) of an outrage having been perpetrated upon Admiral Sir Frederick Maitland, of the ship Wellesley, and his boat's crew, off Bushire? An account has reached me from the Wellesley, by which I am given to understand that when Sir F. Maitland proposed to land, he was told that he should not land at the usual place of ceremony, but that he should go to the Custom-house. He refused to do so, however, but landed in the place usually appropriated to persons holding rank similar to his own. He was fired on by the soldiers of the Schah, and several of his men had bullets through their hats and clothes. He returned the fire, and killed two or three of the individuals who had opposed him. I beg to inquire, therefore, whether the Noble Viscount has received any despatches from the Wellesley, giving him an account of this outrage?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — Sir, with regard to the first question of the Honourable Member, I beg to state that no sufficient reparation has yet been made by the Schah for the outrage upon the messenger of Sir John M'Neill. As to the explanation of the Russian Government in reference to the conduct of Count Simonich, I can only refer the Honourable Gentleman to the papers which have been laid upon the table of the House, which contain matter from which he may infer an answer to his question. We are certainly not at war with Persia, though there has occurred a serious interruption in our relations with that power. With regard to the affair at Bushire, I have received notice of the occurrence; but the facts are not exactly as they have been stated by the Honourable Gentleman, although very nearly so. No difficulty was experienced by Sir F. Maitland as to his landing, and after his landing he had an amicable communication with the Government; but the difficulty which arose referred to the manner in which he should embark. The Governor insisted that that embarkation should take place at the Custom-house quay instead of the usual landing place of the residency; but Sir F. Maitland having been informed by those captains who were on the service, and had been accustomed to the manners of the place, that an indignity was intended to be offered to him which he ought not to submit to, therefore insisted on embarking at the quay opposite the residence. He had previously taken measures of precaution, and had the boats of the Wellesley ready. Shots were exchanged. He, however, embarked as he had announced his intention to do; and, in consequence, the resident of the East India Company had accompanied the Admiral to the Island of Karak. A communication was afterwards made on the part of the Government of Fars; and when the last accounts left, Admiral Sir F. Maitland was going back to Bushire, to have some communications with the authorities upon the subject.

SIR S. CANNING.—Before the discussion terminates, I should be glad to be informed by the Noble Lord, whether the confidential communications which he has stated to be going on between him and the Persian ambassador have ceased?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I have recently seen the ambassador, and shall, most likely, see him again before he quits England. The plan which he has submitted to me is of a nature to prevent its being received, here, officially.

Mr. MACKINNON.—Sir, I beg leave to move for a Return of the expenses of the Persian mission from May, 1837, to June, 1838.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I have no objection to the Return being made.

Mr. MACLEAN.—May I inquire whether there would be any objection to a Return being given from the despatches to which I have referred, showing the number of persons killed at the affair at Bushire?

SIR J. C. HOBHOUSE.—No one was killed, on either side.

MINISTERS' MONEY.

Mr. W. S. O'BRIEN.—Sir, I beg to inquire of the Noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland, whether he intends to introduce any measure, during the present Session, upon the subject of the payment of ministers' money in Ireland?

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH.—I think that it would be for the general convenience of legislation to postpone the arrangement of the question of the valuation of the city of Dublin until the valuation shall take place under the poor law.

AFRICA.

DOCTOR LUSHINGTON.—Sir, I have to ask the Noble Viscount a question relative to a matter to which I have before called the attention of the House,—I mean the subject of the loss sustained by certain British merchants, in consequence of an attack made upon them by the French, at Portendic, on the coast of Africa. I desire to know whether anything has been done in reference to the circumstances of that case?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.—Before I undertook to take any decided course upon the subject, I thought it to be my duty to refer to the Queen's Advocate. I received the Report of that officer only a few days ago, and have not yet been able to make any communication to the French Government; but I shall do so, immediately.

BANK OF IRELAND.

Mr. HUME. — Sir, I have to observe, in respect to my motion, having reference to Irish banks, that I think it would be better that one discussion, only, should take place on that matter, than two. I beg to ask the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, therefore, whether he intends to bring on his motion with regard to the Irish Bank Charter?—and I would express a hope that he will fix an early day for its discussion, in the event of his declaring his determination to proceed with the notice on this head, which he has given.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.—I agree with the Honourable Gentleman as to the expediency of having only one debate on this business. I wrote to Dublin as soon as ever I saw the motion of the Honourable Gentleman on the paper, calling the attention of the board of directors of the Bank to the circumstance, and suggesting to them that they should come over to be present at the discussion. I expect that they will be in town in a few days, and I will then state the day on which I will bring the subject before the House.

Mr. HUME.—I hope that it will be in the course of the next week.

TRADE WITH NAPLES.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON.—Sir, I wish to ask the Right Honourable the President of the Board of Trade, whether he has taken any steps with reference to the Neapolitan sulphur monopoly?

Mr. C. P. THOMSON.—A negotia-ion has been commenced with a view to he adoption of a commercial treaty advantageous to both countries; and I think hat, in the event of its being completed, he existing monopoly will be destroyed.

CUSTOMS DUTIES.

LORD GRANVILLE SOMERSET. – Will the Right Honourable Gentleman ay whether he intends to bring in any Bill for the regulation of the customs luties this Session?

Mr. C. P. THOMSON. — It will not e in my power to introduce any Bill luring the present Session, in reference to the customs duties. I propose, however, to introduce a measure upon the subject of bonding goods.

ELECTIONS JURISDICTION.

SIR R. PEEL. — Sir, I wish to ask the Noble Lord opposite, when he intends to proceed with the Elections Jurisdiction Bill?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — On Friday next, if convenient to the Right Honourable Gentleman.

EDUCATION.

SIR R. PEEL. — Sir, I hope the Noble Lord will state, with respect to the business to be taken on Monday next, whether he means to propose that the House should resolve itself into a Committee of Supply at the earliest period on Monday? or at what other hour? And as I apprehend that it will be impossible to make any motion in the nature of an instruction to the committee, if the rule observed last year be pursued, which was that of moving a grant to the National School Society and the British and Foreign School Society, — I think it right to notify to the House that no preliminary discussion will take place; but that the probability is, that the sense of the House will be taken on the votes.

Mr. HUME. — May I ask the Right Honourable Baronet opposite, whether his motion will be against the education vote?

SIR R. PEEL. — I intend to meet it with a direct negative.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I beg to state, in answer to the Right Honourable Baronet, that, on Monday next, I propose to move the Committee of Supply before any other business; and as I do not anticipate any discussion on going into committee, I shall propose the vote for education.

SIR R. PEEL. — Sir, in reference to the answer I have given to the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, I beg to say that I do not wish the Honourable Member to infer that I object to any vote for education, or that I desire to stultify my vote of last year in favour of the grant to the British and Foreign School Society; but I wish him to understand that I have no other mode left me of objecting to the proposed Government scheme of education, than to meet the motion for a grant of money for that purpose by a direct negative.

PRISONS BILL.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Sir, I beg leave to move that the Prisons Bill be now read a third time.

Mr. PAKINGTON. — Sir, I am sorry to say that I feel it my imperative duty to oppose the further progress of this Bill, and I trust I shall not in vain request the kind attention of the House during the period for which it will be absolutely necessary I should detain them. I have already stated the strong objections I have to the fourteenth clause, enabling the dissenting ministers to visit the gaols; but as that clause, against which I have already recorded my vote, may form the subject of a specific motion by the Noble Lord the Member for Marylebone (Lord Teignmouth), I will not now trouble the House with any observations in support of my objection to that particular provision of the Bill. With respect to the clause forbidding the officers to employ prisoners, I think that rule too strict. My further objections are to the second and third clauses, which give magistrates the power to order separate confinement, without any limitation or restriction upon them, whatsoever. I assure the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department that, in objecting on that ground to the further progress of this Bill, I have no intention or wish to act in any way that might be considered to constitute a groundless opposition: I give the Noble Lord every credit for a desire to improve the prison discipline of the country; but I submit that this important change in the principle of prison discipline throughout the kingdom admits of very considerable doubts as to its propriety. The Noble Lord, I believe, relies, for the support of this measure, on the results which have been shown to attend the system of separate confinement in the Penitentiary at Philadelphia, and on the report of the inspectors of the prison at Glasgow. That being the case, I must be allowed to refer to authentic returns in reference to the results of the system in the Penitentiary at Philadelphia; and in doing so, I do not trust to persons who might be supposed to be led away by their own prejudices or by private bias, — but to documents, the authenticity of which cannot be questioned. In page 334. of the book I hold in my hand, — and to which reference, on a former occasion, was made by the Honourable Member for Lambeth (Mr. Hawes), — I find it distinctly laid down that the system of separate confinement in the Penitentiary at Philadelphia has not produced those effects, in the suppression or diminution of crime, which its early friends anticipated; and that for the last three years, prior to 1837, the mortality in that prison had regularly and constantly increased, — thereby showing the injurious effects of the system upon the health of the prisoners. Again, in page 241., the letter of a medical gentleman demonstrates that its injurious effects were not confined to the bodily, but extended to the mental, health of the prisoners; for it is stated, that, while 17 out of 318 prisoners died, there were no less than 14 cases of insanity within a very short period of time. Indeed, the returns show the important fact that the mortality in the Philadelphia Penitentiary has been twice as great as that in the prisons of New Hampshire and other states, where the separate system is not in force. The first proposition, then, I lay down, is, that whatever degree of punishment may be alloted to certain crimes, the Legislature has no right to adopt any system which might incur danger to the bodily, still less to the mental, health of prisoners whose offences have brought them under the lash of the law; and I oppose this Bill, because I think — and I am justified in the opinion by the results I have stated — that the system it establishes produces both those effects. I beg, now, for a moment, to call the attention of the House to the recommendation of the inspectors of prisons with respect to solitary confinement. They suggest that each prisoner should be confined in an apartment 10 feet square and 10 feet high; — the prisoner to have no egress from this apartment. To this I object, as confinement unnecessarily strict. Objecting, also, to the provisions of the Bill with respect to the discipline of persons committed for safe custody, and not convicted, — provisions which have been left in a most unsatisfactory state, — and having my own strong feeling against the system fortified by the results which have arisen from it in America, I feel it my duty to resist the adoption, at a large expense, of such a system throughout England; and I shall therefore move that the Bill be read a third time this day six months.

Mr. DARBY. — I have much pleasure in seconding the amendment. The Bill will occasion large expenses, with very little chance of success. Neither the results at Glasgow, nor those obtained at Philadelphia, afford sufficient evidence to show that the system is practicable throughout the country; and on that ground I must support the amendment.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Sir, the objection of the Honourable Member opposite is at present confined to the system of separate confinement, — though that system has been approved by persons of the highest authority, who have seen it in operation in America. What is proposed by this Bill is, to enable the proper authorities in each county to introduce his system into the prisons respectively under their superintendence, if they shall think fit. The Honourable Member, however, seems determined that the system should be totally excluded from the prisons of the country. I have reduced the powers conferred by the Bill to the lowest possible degree; but now, after the question has already been so much discussed, I do not think it necessary to prove facts which have already been made matter of demonstration as much as anything can possibly be.

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON. — Sir, I have listened, with great attention, to the Honourable Member, and I must express my entire concurrence in the humane and considerate view which he has taken of this question. I must declare my disapprobation of the principle of intrusting to individuals connected with the government of prisons, the power of inflicting solitary confinement. I am aware that the evils of the present system are great; but still I must deprecate anything like hasty legislation in a matter of so much importance. I must say that the observations of the Honourable Member for Droitwich deserve the maturest consideration: and here I must take the opportunity of observing that, although I have not the honour to be connected with the part of the country in which the Honourable Gentleman resides, I am no stranger to his merits; for his reputation as a magistrate, and a chairman of quarter sessions, has spread far and wide. He has paid great attention to the subject of the regulation of gaols; and I am sure he is one of those who is willing to temper severity with justice and mercy. Although I should have been unwilling, in the first instance, however I may disapprove of this Bill, — particularly of the fourteenth clause, — to adopt a course calculated to put an end to the Bill altogether, yet, when I look at that clause, and consider all the circumstances, I feel it my duty, for the reasons I have before stated, to vote with the Honourable Member for Droitwich.

Mr. W. MILES. — When I hear Honourable Gentlemen place the system of separate confinement side by side with the system of solitary confinement, I must say that they cannot have read the papers laid upon the table of the House. I trust that the Bill will speedily come into operation, for I consider it the best system which has yet been introduced; and I shall give the Noble Lord my best support.

The House then divided: — Ayes 126; Noes 21; — Majority 105.

Main question put, and agreed to; Bill read a third time; clauses added; amendments made; amendment proposed, in pr. 11. line 8., to leave out from "superannuated" to "and" in line 38. — Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

On the question, "That this Bill do pass," —

LORD TEIGNMOUTH said: — If I had had the least expectation that the fourteenth clause would have formed part of this Bill, and become the law of the land, I certainly should have given the Bill my most decided opposition. Several Honourable Gentlemen who divided on the second reading of this Bill, did so under the impression that this clause would be left out. I, for one, must complain of the manner in which this clause has been smuggled through the House; and it may be remembered that the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin, whom I do not now see in his place, when this clause was originally brought forward, objected to its being discussed at so late an hour as eleven o'clock at night. The clause was then postponed; and since, the discussion has been stifled; and as Honourable Gentlemen could not beat us by fair argument, they have resorted to artifice. Many Honourable Members were induced to support the provision by the argument that, as prisoners were deprived of the means of obtaining such religious instruction as they, themselves, might wish to receive, and such as they might, if at liberty, have been able to procure, it is right that means should be provided of supplying that which has been thus taken away from them. But this is a perfect fallacy; because, in point of fact, religious teachers of all persuasions are permitted to go, and do go, into gaols. Besides, if the principle be worth anything, it must apply with much greater force to sailors in the navy, who are shut up in ships, and utterly deprived of the power of resorting to religious instructors of their own choosing; and it must also apply to soldiers serving on foreign stations. The real question is this, — Does there really exist any grievance on this head? Now, I have communicated with the chaplains of several gaols in different parts of the country, and particularly in London, Manchester, and Bristol; and I have learned from them that complaints are never made by prisoners on account of their religious scruples being interfered with. By the introduction, therefore, of this clause, the House will not remedy any practical evil, but it will establish a precedent which I cannot but regard as one fraught with danger to the established church. Sir, I have thought it my duty to make these few observations; but, at the same time, I will not put the House to the trouble of dividing.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — It is not my intention to discuss this question, again, on its principle; but I must protest against the statement of the Noble Lord, that this clause has been smuggled through the House. If ever there was ample opportunity given for the full discussion of any measure, it was given as to this clause; for it was, I believe, debated on no less than four several occasions, and every facility has been afforded for its public consideration. Now, it does so happen, that even on this very occasion, after the fullest notice for to-night has been given, scarcely one of the Honourable Gentlemen opposite, who are considered the leaders of their party, have thought it worth while to be present; and I think I may fairly infer, from their absence, that, after the full discussion which has taken place, they do not feel themselves justified in opposing the clause any further. I will now merely make one remark in answer to an observation which fell from the Noble Lord. The Noble Lord drew a parallel between those who are shut up in prison, and those who are embarked on board the ships of our navy, or who are in our army on foreign stations, without the benefit of religious instruction. But the Noble Lord must see this difference, — that those who enlist in the army, or who enter the sea service, do so voluntarily, and they know, perfectly well, to what extent they are to receive, or be deprived of, religious instruction; but, on the other hand, if you remove men into a prison, — away from all society, — from all opportunity of receiving that spiritual instruction to which they have been accustomed, — I think you are bound to provide it for them.

Mr. PRYME. — Although I respect the Noble Lord's motives, I cannot agree with him that, even supposing Roman Catholic prisoners have shown indifference, in confinement, to the consolations of religion, they are therefore to be refused the advantage of moral and spiritual instruction. I maintain the very contrary. Where the lives of individuals are at variance with the precepts of religion, it becomes the more necessary to teach them the value and importance of those precepts.

Mr. LANGDALE. — This question was fully discussed in two long debates, in which the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire and the Right Honourable Gentleman the Member for Tamworth took part. The Noble Lord, therefore, has nothing to complain of on that head. The Noble Lord has said that, by this clause, a blow is aimed at the established church. Now, that blow, I, for one, have never attempted to deal, and never will. I have been informed, that in districts where Roman Catholics are numerous, the Roman Catholic clergymen have been obliged to leave their congregations to attend to prisoners in the care of the state. It therefore appears to me just that the state should make provision for the religious instruction of those prisoners. It is now proposed to separate the inmates of prisons, in order the more effectually to give them moral and religious instruction. That being the case, I would ask, can the House refuse to furnish them with that instruction which, alone, they will be willing to receive?

Digitized by Google

Mr. ESTCOURT. — I object more particularly to that part of the clause which states, that whenever Dissenters of a certain denomination shall amount to a certain number, in a prison, a chaplain shall be provided for them, than as to the particular sect for which such chaplain may be required. I see no reason why fifty prisoners should be regarded, in this respect, of any greater importance than five prisoners. Is the soul of one of the fifty more valuable than one of the five? Besides, the chaplain to a gaol is a very important officer, whose authority would be considerably diminished by the introduction of other chaplains. I regret that the Noble Lord does not divide the House on this clause, — against which I must protest, as calculated to lead to very great inconvenience, and as being highly injurious to the prison discipline of this country.

Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL. — I must say, I think it rather singular that the Honourable Gentleman who has just spoken should have reserved his objections in point of detail, while he had advanced none against the principle of the clause, for this stage of the Bill. If the Honourable Member will move that the number be reduced, I will support him; and if, in the operation of the Bill, it is found to be too many, I am sure no objection will be made to reduce it. The Noble Lord has said that danger to the church will result from the principle of this clause. Surely the Noble Lord, who belongs to the Irish peerage, must be aware that the same principle is already acted on in the gaols of Ireland? and if it do not endanger the church, there, I see no reason for supposing it will do so, in England.

The Bill was then passed.

SITTING OF THE HOUSE.

On the motion of Mr. FOX MAULE, House, at rising, to adjourn till Monday next.

METROPOLIS POLICE AND METROPOLITAN POLICE COURTS BILL.

Mr. Fox Maule moved the Order of the Day for the House going into committee on this Bill.

On the question being put, —

Mr. SERJEANT TALFOURD said: — I really must oppose the further proceeding with this Order.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — It is the next Order of the Day.

Mr. SERJEANT TALFOURD. — Yes; but it was arranged that the Copyright Bill should have precedence.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I cannot think that this vote of money will take up any time, because, in fact, we already have, by law, the sum we ask; and the vote is only to enable us to put it to use. For some time I have been endeavouring to get this vote. The Government business is actually at a stand, and I must be excused if I press this motion.

CAPTAIN WOOD. — I take this opportunity of calling attention to a petition which has been intrusted to me, from Enfield, complaining that a new system of police is now to be introduced, founded upon a principle inconsistent with the chartered rights of Englishmen; and for the support of that arbitrary system a tax is to be imposed, which will press heavily upon all but the wealthy classes.

Mr. HUME. — The Honourable Gentleman is mistaken. This is another Bill altogether from that he is speaking of.

SIR ROBERT INGLIS. — I apprehend my Honourable and Gallant Friend cannot now present a petition on a subject which is not before the House.

Mr. WAKLEY. — I think there are serious objections against our going into this committee. It may, if you please, be called a mere matter of form; but the effect is to take money out of the pockets of the people. Here it is proposed to increase the salaries of the police commissioners to 1200*l.* a-year each. Now, I say, in the present state of the country, with an enormous debt pressing upon the people, we have a right to expect that the utmost economy should be observed in the expenditure of every shilling of the public money; instead of which I see nothing but the most reckless extravagance — an extravagance which, however, I admit, is more to be attributed to this House itself than to her Majesty's Ministers, who, really, sometimes show a disposition to be more economical, if this House would but let them be so.

Mr. F. T. BARING. — It is only proposed, now, to go into a committee of the whole House, in order to pass resolutions, which are a necessary preliminary to the introduction of the clauses which refer to the salaries.

Mr. GODSON. — The House is, decidedly, taken by surprise in this proceeding. The Right Honourable and Learned Recorder of London understood the Copyright Bill was to come on first, as the Gentlemen concerned in that measure were promised it should do. Now, you ask us for a grant of money, which appears to me to fix the House to a principle.

Mr. GOULBURN. — As I understand the question, it is proposed to go into committee upon the Metropolis Police Bill, in order to give a power of considering the increase of these salaries. To that course, I think, there can be no objection. With respect to the Metropolis Police Courts Bill, there may be some objection; but, as I understand, we are not to go into that, at present?

Mr. F. MAULE. — I merely require an increase of the grant, for the purpose of enabling the House to decide upon the propriety of increasing the salaries of commissioners and magistrates.

Mr. HUME. — When we go into committee, I shall, certainly, oppose the increase of the salaries of the magistrates to the extent contemplated.

The Order of the Day was then read; and the House resolved itself into a committee (Advances out of the Consolidated Fund).

Mr. FOX MAULE moved the following resolution: — "That an annual salary, not exceeding 1200*l.*, shall be paid out of the said Consolidated Fund, to each of the Commissioners of Police appointed to execute the Act for improving the Police of the Metropolis."

On the question being put, —

Mr. WAKLEY said: — Am I to understand that the House will be pledged by this vote? I, certainly, would rather the question were discussed in a fuller House, for many Honourable Members are absent, not expecting this vote to come on now.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — All that is asked by this clause, as far as it goes, is, to give each of the commissioners a salary of 1200*l.* a-year. When this proposition is introduced in the shape of a clause, Honourable Gentlemen will be at liberty to alter and amend that clause; but it is the intention of the Government to adhere to the amount specified, and I trust the House will affirm it.

Mr. MACKINNON. — I trust the Government will adhere to that amount. I shall support the salary of 1200*l.* a-year.

Mr. HUME. — I apprehend this resolution to be a mere initiatory proceeding, to enable the Government to introduce a clause in the Bill. When that comes to be discussed, the proper time will have arrived for deciding whether the salaries shall be fixed at 1200*l.*, or any other sum.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — Although I am a rigid economist, I have no objection to give the larger salary to those two very valuable officers, for their most meritorious public services.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — I cannot but think the whole of the Bills which have been introduced for the improvement of the metropolitan police, very clumsy pieces of legislation. Already has the House been favoured with no fewer than three or four editions of these Bills. The first was scarcely intelligible, and the resolution we are now called upon to sanction partakes largely of the same character.

Mr. GODSON. — I rise to order. I put it to the Chairman whether we are now in a position to discuss the Metropolitan Police Bill? — a resolution being proposed, which in no way binds the House, merely as the groundwork of a clause to be afterwards introduced into that Bill.

Mr. LEADER. — I also rise to order. I contend that my Honourable Friend the Member for Finsbury is perfectly in order, for the House is now in a Committee of Supply, in which it is competent for any one to speak upon any subject.

[Cries of "Order, order!"]

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER. — This is not a Committee of Supply.

Mr. LEADER. — I certainly understand that we are on Supply.

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — No, no!

Mr. LEADER. — Why, the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department calls upon us to give 1200*l.* a-year to each of these commissioners. I should like to know what that means?—whether that is not a money vote? and whether this is not the proper time for discussing the amount of those salaries, and any other matter connected with the Bill?

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS.—No, no! Order, order!

Mr. LEADER.—I shall certainly support my Honourable Friend the Member for Finsbury.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.—I beg to put the Honourable Member for Westminster right. We are not in a Committee of Supply, but in a committee of the whole House. Before we can discuss a money clause in any Bill, it is necessary to have a resolution,—not in a Committee of Supply, where any topic may be broached, but of the whole House,—as the foundation of a clause which may raise hereafter any points for discussion, when once that clause has been incorporated with the Bill. I hope Honourable Gentlemen are not endeavouring, by the course they are taking, to fight off the Copyright Bill.

Mr. WAKLEY.—I maintain that my Honourable Colleague is quite in order in now discussing the principle of this resolution. If the House be not in a Committee of Supply, this resolution is for a grant of money,—— —and I will take the liberty of moving, by way of amendment, that 800*l.* be substituted instead of 1200*l.*; and I shall divide the House upon that. Everybody is commending the manner in which the commissioners perform their duties. Now, 800*l.* a-year, each, has enabled the country to procure the able, zealous, and most effective services of those two officers; and I do not see why this House should squander the people's money by unnecessarily increasing the salaries of those, or any other functionaries, when so much distress and misery are abroad, unrelieved.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE.—I am now fully satisfied I was in order, for, upon looking at the Orders, I find that the head under which the present resolution is noticed, introduces the Metropolitan Police Bill; and that is quite sufficient to warrant me in referring to it in the few observations I intended to offer. I have always objected to voting away more of the people's money than was absolutely necessary, and I shall therefore support the amendment. I do this on principle. My object is not, as has been stated by the Right Honourable Gentleman below me, to defeat the Copyright Bill. If I mean to defeat or support any measure, I always do so in a direct and open manner. I beg to inform the Right Honourable Gentleman, that, whenever I intend to support a particular motion, I never manage to arrive, "just five minutes too late, by the Hastings coach."

["Hear, hear!" and laughter.]

Mr. HUME.—I must bear my testimony to the very efficient manner in which the commissioners perform their duties. No man in London—not even the worthy coroner himself—ever devoted more time, energy, and talent to the public service—I may say, "from daylight to sunset, and during the night—than these gentleman have done."

The amendment was then negatived; resolution put, and agreed to.

Mr. FOX MAULE then moved the following resolution:—That in aid of the charge of maintaining the metropolitan police, there shall be paid out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, an additional yearly sum, not exceeding the rate of two pence in the pound, upon the additional rental which may be assessed in any place which may hereafter become part of the metropolitan police district.

Agreed to.

Mr. FOX MAULE then moved the following resolution:—That an annual sum, not exceeding 20,000*l.*, be paid out of the said Consolidated Fund, towards defraying the charge of the metropolitan police force, on account of the horse patrol and the Thames police; and also such further sum as may be necessary for the payment of superannuation allowances to certain officers of the police.

On the question being put,—

Mr. HUME said:—I very much doubt the policy of the resolution, and I think it ought to be the subject of an annual vote. I have often regretted we have not had an opportunity of reviewing, every year, the conduct of this force. The fact of these sums being voted out of the Consolidated Fund, leads insensibly to takin-the control out of the hands of Parliament. We have already taken the control out of the hands of the parishes; and we ought to have an annual opportunity of discussing the whole establishment of the police force in the Estimates.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I do not wish to object to the future consideration of the point raised by my Honourable Friend, because I do think, with respect to the police force, it becomes a matter worthy of consideration, whether Parliament should not have reserved to itself the opportunity for an annual consideration of its establishment? But the question will be still open to my Honourable Friend; and I submit to him, whether he had not better reserve this point — which I admit to be an important one — to the committee?

Mr. HUME. — I do not see how a future discussion will obviate the difficulty. I shall propose, as an amendment, to leave out the words "Consolidated Fund." That will leave the question open.

The CHAIRMAN. — I do not perceive how I can put the amendment proposed by the Honourable Member for Kilkenny. The money must be taken from some source; and unless another source than the Consolidated Fund be specifically substituted, the amendment must be, that the resolution be withdrawn altogether.

Mr. HUME. — Then I shall move that the resolution be withdrawn.

CAPTAIN WOOD. — I agree with the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, that it would be more constitutional that this vote should come, annually, under the superintendence of the House.

Mr. HUME.—Well; if it be understood that the question shall be raised before the committee, I have no objection to withdraw my amendment; but I give notice that, on a future occasion, I shall raise the whole question of the police force being paid by annual estimate.

The resolution was then agreed to.

The House resumed Resolutions to be reported on Monday next.

On the question, "That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee of Supply," —

Mr. SERJEANT TALFOURD said: — I must again interfere, and repeat that the understanding was, that nothing should precede the Copyright Bill but the Prisons Bill. I know that, as the time appointed has now expired, I must, according to the terms of the contract, give way; and I cannot expect that her Majesty's Ministers will postpone their important business to mine. But, at the same time, I must and do complain of the conduct of the Government in introducing the last Order of the Day before the Copyright Bill.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.—If my Honourable and Learned Friend will allow me to say one word, perhaps I may be able to suggest something which may obviate the inconvenience he complains of. He knows, perfectly well, that I do not wish to throw any impediment in his way; but there is one vote for civil contingencies which it is absolutely necessary for the public service that we should take. Now, if the Government waive the order of precedence, and take the Copyright question first, will Honourable Gentlemen agree that the public service shall not be interrupted on account of the lateness of the hour we shall then have arrived at? If so, I have no objection to take the Copyright Bill first.

Mr. HUME. — I certainly must object to money being voted after twelve o'clock. Many Gentlemen will not attend.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Then my Honourable and Learned Friend will clearly see that no alternative is left to me but to proceed with the public service.

The question was then agreed to.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of Supply.

Question put, "That a sum, not exceeding 70,000*l.*, be granted to her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge of civil contingencies, to the 31st day of March, 1840."

Mr. HUME. — There are several items in this vote which appear to me to be inconsistent with a proper system of economy; — for instance, there is 1950*l.* for the state clothing of trumpeters of the Life Guards; then, there is 514*l.* for silver trumpets for the same. This really appears to me a most unnecessary expense. I perceive, also, that there is a heavy charge on account of the Shannon navigation; — is this to be understood as preparatory to the Bill which will be brought forward on that subject? There are several sums for commissions. I should like to know whether we are to expect any results from these commissions? Is there to be any legislation?

Mr. F. BARING. — The expense incurred by the Shannon Navigation Commission is under the Bill of 1836, which was passed in consequence of what had taken place in 1835. Another of these commissions is that which was appointed to investigate the matter of the Canadian boundary, — a matter of much consequence, and with respect to which some arrangement was necessary. All the papers relating to this matter will be laid before the House with as little delay as possible; and every item of the expenditure will be fully explained.

Mr. HUME. — Some of these commissions have now been going on, I believe, for thirteen years, without any satisfactory results, in the way of legislation, having been derived from them — at least, that I am aware of. I find an item, too, in this vote, of expenses incurred in investigations preparatory to granting corporations to the towns of Manchester and Birmingham. Surely, those towns which desire to have corporations, should pay these expenses, incurred expressly for their benefit, themselves.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — These expenses were incurred in making investigations under a most important and most useful Public Act; and, of course, must be defrayed out of the public money.

Mr. COURTENAY. — The Right Honourable Gentleman's argument would be good, provided the charters were required by the public, and the public received any benefit from them; but, as to Birmingham and Manchester, such is not the case. Counsel's opinions have been taken with respect to those charters, and by them it is declared that they were improperly granted, and are illegal; and so, it appears, they are considered even by those at whose instance they were granted, — for they have not yet dared to levy a rate under them. And why? Because they know that, if they had done so, the question would have been decided by the constitutional tribunals of the country, whether or not the Crown has the power to delegate to a particular party in any borough the power of levying taxes? If, then, those charters which have been granted to Manchester and Birmingham are illegal, as I contend they are, it is most unjust that the public should be called upon to defray the expenses that may have been incurred in granting them. I say that, when a charter is given at the request of certain parties in a town, without reference to the general feeling, it is fraudulent to compel the people of England to pay for that which is a robbery of their rights; and if the Honourable Member for Kilkenny will divide against this item, I shall certainly support him.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Sir, I protest against trying, by this vote, the question of the validity of any act which the Privy Council may perform, or of any charter it may grant. But, Sir, I contend that these expenses are not incurred for charters. If a charter be applied for, is not the Treasury to make inquiry as to the propriety of granting it, or not? And if that point be conceded, is it not proper that the expense attendant upon such inquiry should be paid? I say, then, Sir, if ever there was a case in which a clear ground for a vote was made out, it is this; but I protest against arrogating to ourselves the power to go into the question of the policy of these charters, or of the conduct of the Treasury, on such a vote as this.

Mr. COURTENAY. — I do not go into the policy of the charter; but we object to being called on to pay for what we consider an illegal charter.

Mr. POULETT THOMSON. — It is too much to say that any charter is illegal, until that question shall have been decided by the proper tribunal; and I must say that, in this case, there has been no desire whatever on the part of the opponents of the charters to bring the question of legality to a fair test, while every obstacle has been thrown in the way of working these charters. But the Honourable Gentleman is mistaken in supposing that this item has at all to do with the legality of the charter in question, or its illegality. I would ask the Honourable Gentleman and the committee, what course the Privy Council could take, other than they have done, when applied to, to grant a charter of incorporation to any particular town? They could not take, and act upon, the mere statement of the parties, whether for or against, without inquiry as to the correctness of such statements. The Privy Council employ competent parties to investigate and ascertain whether the facts stated to them are or are not true; and, upon the report of those parties, they decide whether the charter shall be granted, or not. The expense, so incurred, could not be asked for either of the advocates or of the opponents; — still it is a necessary expense, and the Government must come to the House for a vote to defray it.

Mr. COURTENAY. — What has fallen from the Right Honourable Gentleman convinces me that he is no lawyer. To tell me that the opposers of the charter have not done anything to bring this question to issue, is absurd. It is not for them to commence proceedings; but for those who are acting under the charter of the corporation, by making and levying a rate, that would be resisted, — and so the question of legality or illegality would be brought before the proper tribunals for their decision. Rob me, and I will resist, — ego vapulo tantum. The opinion I have given on this subject, is that of several very eminent legal men. I believe there are no less than seven of the most eminent lawyers at the bar who have said that these charters are illegal.

Mr. HUME. — There are several items in this vote which ought, properly, to be included in the Civil List: — and, considering the very ample Civil List which the House has granted, I trust they will not be again brought forward in the vote for civil contingencies. Here is also an item of 326*l.*, for making observations on the planets. We have already voted large sums for scientific purposes; and I think all these matters ought to have been included in that vote.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I have a list, here, of a lot of commissions, which have entailed an expense of two or three millions upon the country; and I know not what they have done for it. It would be invidious to pick out any one commission; but I hope, before long, that a full examination will be instituted into the whole of their proceedings; and, in a future Session, I shall test the sincerity of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny's professions against abuse and extravagance, by calling upon him to support me in a motion for such an investigation; and I believe we shall find that all this money has been thrown away, and that no benefit to the country has resulted. Here we are called upon to pay a very large sum for the expenses attending the mission of the late Lord High Commissioner and Governor-General of Canada: and I believe I speak correctly, when I say that all that was done by that Noble Lord, and those who went out with him, was to make matters much worse than they were before. We are charged also with 2234*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.*, for expenses incurred on board the Hastings, in conveying the Lord High Commissioner and his suite. I should like to have a return of all these expenses, item by item; for never was money so completely thrown away before. I would always provide the state with efficient servants, and pay them properly, and shall be always ready to support grants for that purpose; but here we have a Noble Lord, with an ample fortune, who goes out to Canada, and does nothing, — worse than nothing, I may say, — and, on coming back, the country is saddled with this enormous expense, which we are told is a mere trifle, and it is said that the Noble Lord is, himself, 10,000*l.* out of pocket. I protest against this wholesale waste of the public money.

Mr. GOULBURN. — There is nothing, perhaps, more unsatisfactory than a vote for civil contingencies, on account of the nature and variety of the items it contains. The Honourable Member for Kilkenny has referred to the amount charged for the expense of the commissioners sent down by the Privy Council to make the necessary inquiries preparatory to granting charters of incorporation to certain towns under the Municipal Act. Now, I am inclined to agree with the Honourable Gentleman, that those are expenses which ought to fall on the parties who require their services. This is a principle which, I think, cannot be opposed. In the ordinary course of proceeding, in any matter which is for the benefit of some great town, — as, for instance, if a town is to be supplied with water, with gas, or if any other improvement is to take place, — the parties must come here for a Private Bill; to obtain which they must show to Parliament sufficient reasons for passing such Bill, by witnesses and evidence brought forward at their own expense. Now, what is the difference of the circumstances, when they come to the Government to ask for a charter of incorporation, in order to enable them to conduct their own municipal government, and to obtain the other advantages to which a municipal corporation is entitled, and which, but for the Municipal Act, would have been to be obtained by a Private Act of Parliament? To say, then, that the expenses incurred in making out the claims for such charters of incorporation should be paid by the Government, and charged to this House, is a monstrous proposition, and, if acted upon, would lead to indefinite expense.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — Before this question is decided, I would ask the committee whether they desire that the benefit of municipal institutions should be extended to the large towns of this country, or not? If they do, I trust they will not throw a difficulty in the way, which must act as a prohibition against granting charters of incorporation to many of those towns. The Privy Council have applications for charters from various towns, and in every case there is a large number of petitioners both for and against the charter; and, without inquiry and information, we could not discover which side have the majority: accordingly, we employ certain intelligent officers of engineers to go down and make the inquiry. In one case they found that a very large number of the signatures to the petitions were fictitious: this kind of fraud appeared on both sides. In the case of Sheffield, a clear case for refusal was made out, and the charter was consequently refused. Now, who would you call upon to pay the expense of the inquiry in that case? There is no legal power of levying a rate for the purpose; and, unless the public will pay it by a vote of this House, there is no legal method of recovering those expenses. And, under the Municipal Bill, there is no power given to levy a rate to defray the expense of any preliminary inquiry which the Privy Council may think necessary to be made. The case of a Private Act of Parliament does not appear to me to be analogous to this. In this case, if the House refuse to pay these expenses, a bar will be set up against these inquiries altogether, and no means will exist of confirming municipal institutions in our large towns, except by the expensive process of Private Acts of Parliament.

Mr. HUME. — The Noble Lord says there is no analogy between the two cases, of a town requiring a Private Act for improvement, and a town requiring a charter of incorporation from the Privy Council. I consider the analogy to be complete. Suppose the inhabitants of a town wished to introduce into it a supply of water or gas: the course they would take would be, to subscribe the amount necessary for defraying the expense of a Private Act of Parliament; and in the event of a Private Bill being thrown out, does the Noble Lord mean to say that the House of Commons should be called upon to pay the expense incurred? The argument of the Noble Lord, therefore, is not at all in point.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON. — I understand that the advocates of the charter of incorporation for Manchester have subscribed no less a sum than 3000*l.* to promote their object; and I can see no reason why they should not be called upon to pay the cost of this preliminary inquiry: and I believe there would be no difficulty, in any case, upon those who defend the charter, to defray these expenses by private contribution.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — This discussion has certainly taken a most singular turn. We have gone on from trumpeters to commissioners, and from commissioners to municipal corporations, until I scarcely know what is the question we are really discussing. If we are to come to a division, let us know what we are to divide upon, and let us confine ourselves to the consideration of that question. Upon the matter of municipal charters, I think my Honourable Friend's argument cannot be maintained. He has instanced the case of a town requiring a water or gas works; but there is no analogy between that case and the case of municipal corporations, even as regards the public good. Is the Municipal Act to be carried out? — and if so, in what manner? Not by Private Bills; for the Parliament, by the Act itself, has vested the power of granting municipal institutions in another tribunal — the Privy Council. It is the Privy Council which is to decide, and they must judge of the expediency upon the information they obtain. The Municipal Act was passed for the public good, and the public ought to defray any reasonable expense for these preliminary inquiries.

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON. — Sir, I always understood that her Majesty's present Ministers came into office with a determination to cut down all unnecessary expenses; and yet it would appear that, during the last four or five years, a greater degree of extravagance has been carried on in these commissions than was ever before known. As to this matter of corporations, I think there is full information on the table of the House, to enable the Government to decide whether corporations are necessary, or not, without sending down commissioners. I believe this item in the vote is necessary only for the maintenance of a system of extravagance and jobbing; and if any Honourable Gentleman will divide against it, I will support him.

Mr. F. BARING. — As to the payment of these expenses of preliminary inquiry, the Noble Lord the Member for Liverpool and the Honourable Member for Kilkenny say that there would be no difficulty in obtaining the money by private subscription: but I confess that I, for one, am not much inclined to sanction that course; for we know that in such cases it is usually the longest purse, and not the justice of the cause, that wins. But suppose we were to adopt the course that is recommended, and say to parties who apply to us, under the Municipal Act, for a charter of incorporation, "We will not give you a charter until you bring forward such evidence as we shall require to show the necessity for it;"—would not those parties apply to the Court for a mandamus to compel us to carry out the provisions of the Act?

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON.—The parties must prove their case.

Mr. F. BARING.—Prove their case! What power have you to call upon them to bring forward a single witness? And suppose, on inquiry, it should appear that the opponents to the charter have opposed it improperly, and that the whole expense has been incurred by their unnecessary opposition, would it be just, in such a case, to charge the expenses of such inquiry on the applicants? On the other hand, suppose the opposition be fair, and that there is no ground for the application;—are we to compel the parties who oppose the charter, and who are brought before you, of necessity, to defend their rights and privileges,—are we to say to them, "We will not hear you, unless you consent to pay these expenses of inquiry?"

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON.—I think, in all measures of private or local benefit, the expense should be paid by the parties who make the application. In Railway and all Private Bills, you call on the parties to the Bill to pay the expenses of supporting it; and on those who oppose, to pay the expenses of the opposition. I see no reason why the same principle should not hold good here.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK.—The Noble Lord does not appear to understand the nature of the expense for which this item is charged. Each party, for and against, does pay the expense of his own evidence; but this is an expenditure incurred in sending down persons to judge between the parties.

SIR T. FREMANTLE.—I object to this item, because I think it is a charge which the public ought not to be called upon to pay. By the Act of Parliament, the Privy Council is appointed as the court to decide whether these charters shall be granted, or not. It is presumed that one party applies for the charter of incorporation, and that another party will oppose it; and that the Privy Council will proceed, like any other court, to hear the evidence on both sides, and to decide accordingly. I say, then, it is quite clear that the intention was, that each party who came before the court should prove their own case, and at their own expense. And if the opposition is strong, the applicants ought to be told,—"The evidence is not sufficient; you must prove your case more completely before we can grant the charter." But the system the Government go upon is this,—that if the parties cannot prove their own case, they will send down commissioners to endeavour to prove it further.

Mr. BROTHERTON.—I think the objection, in this case, does not come with very good grace from Honourable Gentlemen opposite. There appears to me to be some justice in the public being called upon to pay in this instance. It has been found, in one case in particular, that in the petitions presented for and against the charter, thousands of the signatures were forged. Now, how was that to be ascertained? The object of the Privy Council was, of course, to do justice between the parties; and they, accordingly, sent down these commissioners to inquire. It is necessary, to enable the Privy Council to decide, that these inquiries should be made, and they cannot call upon the parties to pay the expense; therefore the Government are compelled to come to this House for them. I am opposed to extravagance as much as any man; but I do not begrudge the expenses of these commissioners, because I consider a great public service is rendered by them.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL.—The Honourable Member for Kilkenny has contended that these are expenses which Manchester, or any other town, requiring a charter of incorporation, ought to pay. I admit that it would be most unreasonable to throw on the public the expense of stamps, and other expenses attending the granting of charters of incorporation; but the charge contained in this vote is not at all of that nature. This charge is really for the expenses of the Privy Council, to enable them to obtain that information, without which they could not arrive at a satisfactory conclusion in any case. The Privy Council is, undoubtedly, a court,—but not merely to decide between one party in a town and another party. The great party to be considered is the public — the public, on the one side, and the applicants for the charter on the other; and, to guard against injury to the public, it is necessary that the facts should be known. There cannot be a doubt that the Privy Council require this information, which these commissioners obtain for them. The question, then, is, how is it to be obtained? In my opinion, it is much more economically and much more satisfactorily obtained by sending down responsible persons to inquire upon the spot, than by bringing witnesses up to London. Then, by whom is the expense to be defrayed? You cannot call upon those who apply for the charter to pay it, — there is no law which enables you to do so; — and, on the other hand, it would be a denial of justice if you were to refuse to investigate before you decided.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I agree that it is a matter in which the public are concerned, that justice should be administered between the contending parties by the court to which the decision of their case is referred. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman says that commissioners are sent down, to prevent the necessity of putting the parties to a still greater expense by bringing witnesses up to London; therefore, he argues, that they ought not to be called upon to pay the expense so incurred for their benefit. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman might as well contend, on a cause brought before a court of law being referred to arbitration, that therefore, because expense would be saved, the public, and not the parties interested, ought to bear the cost of the arbitration.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — It is of importance to the public that charters for establishing municipal corporations should not be improperly granted; and, on the other hand, that they should not be improperly refused. It is necessary, therefore, that the court which has to decide should ascertain the actual facts of each case by means of officers of their own, in whom they can place confidence.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS. — I entirely agree that the public ought not to be called upon to be at the expense of these preliminary inquiries. When I heard that 3000*l.* had been subscribed by the advocates of the charter in Manchester, I thought, of course, that that was for the purpose of defraying these necessary expenses. Why should the public be called upon to bear the charge incurred for conferring a benefit upon Manchester, Sheffield, or Birmingham, in which they do not participate? I feel so strongly the objection to this item in the vote, that I shall move that it be not allowed.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — The Honourable Gentleman's argument is this, — that the public is not benefited by what may be done with regard to Manchester, Sheffield, and Birmingham; and that, therefore, it ought not to be called upon to bear these expenses. Will the Honourable Gentleman allow me to ask him what benefit Manchester, Birmingham, and the other towns derived from the inquiry that took place into the state of the corporation of Coventry, — and yet the inhabitants of those towns were called upon to bear their share of the expense. The Municipal Act was passed for the benefit of the public, generally; and the course the Privy Council has taken is this; — not to decide upon the representation of either the applicants or the opponents of the charter; but to ascertain the real facts, by means of their own servants, in order that the public interest may be effectually protected. It is said that they ought to require the parties to enter into a bond to pay the expense of this preliminary inquiry. Why, who ever heard of such a condition to the granting of a charter? Nothing but a necessary expense has been incurred; and if the House refuse to sanction this vote, it will be tantamount to a declaration that no more charters shall be granted.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS. — The Honourable and Learned Member has referred to the city I have the honour to represent; but he must recollect that Coventry had enjoyed a charter for 400 years before the other towns, that have been mentioned, were established. In the one case, the right has been admitted and possessed for many centuries; while, in the other, the right has never been enjoyed, and is now, for the first time, applied for; — therefore, there is no analogy between the two cases.

Mr. WAKLEY. — We are told that there will be a great number of these applications for charters: if, then, we were to sanction this expenditure, we should be only opening a fruitful source of patronage for the Government. These expenses are for objects purely local; and to make the public pay for such objects, is neither fair nor just. The Government have sent down commissioners to the various towns, but we have not been told what those commissioners have done; and I would call upon Honourable Gentlemen to show any other body of men, acting judicially, who are intitled to send out persons at the public expense to make inquiries relative to the cases which come before them for decision. I really do not understand these estimates; for, in one place, I find a sum of 11*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.* for conveying the Prince and Princess Hohenlohe from Woolwich to Ostend. If his Highness had come over to this country in order to work some miraculous cure, he might surely pay the expense of the journey back.

SIR S. CANNING.—I was, before, in possession of the committee, but yielded my right in order to allow Honourable Gentlemen to run down the hare which they had started. I have allowed the discussion relative to the corporation charters to go on for an hour and a half; but the Honourable Gentleman has now started a new hare.

Mr. WAKLEY.—The Right Honourable Gentleman is completely mistaken. It is not a hare I have started; but a prince and a princess. With regard to the expense of obtaining charters, I think the burden ought to be borne by the parties who apply for them; and I hope the Honourable Member for Coventry will divide the House against the vote.

Mr. WARBURTON.—The object of these municipal corporations is, to confer a new character upon the towns and boroughs on which they are conferred, by placing them under popular government and control; and in granting these charters, if the Government were to decide upon the ex parte statements of either the one side or the other, instead of instituting inquiry free from party bias, I think they would be open to well-deserved censure. I consider that they do perfectly right to send their own commissioners to inquire and ascertain whether these corporations ought to be granted, or not; and that they also do right in calling upon the House to defray the expense of such inquiry.

Mr. C. BULLER.—The establishment of corporations in large towns is a matter of great importance to the public, as well as to the towns themselves. Now, take the case of the Bristol riots;—what a degree of alarm and apprehension was excited throughout the whole country from the want in Bristol of a good police, and an efficient municipal executive to put that police in force at the proper time. These riots disturbed the peace of the whole community, and cost the country many thousands of pounds, besides the expense it entailed on the people of Bristol. I say, then, that the proper municipal government of these large towns is a matter not merely of local concern, but one which interests the public generally. I wish the Government would take on itself to propose a plan by which, in all cases, the locality should be freed from expenses incurred in improvements that concern the public generally.

Mr. PRINGLE.—For all matters of local concern, the expense should be borne by the locality. At this moment, we have a Police Bill for the city of London before the House; and, although the public at large must be benefited by the establishment of an efficient police in that city, the expense is charged exclusively upon the locality. The cost of turnpike roads, which are also for the advantage of the public, is always borne by the localities in which they are situate. And I contend that, if ever there was a question confined to local, and not to public, interests, it is of whether a town shall be governed by a municipal corporation, or not? And it would, I think, be introducing a bad precedent, if the House were to decide that the expenses of granting such corporations should be defrayed by the public.

Mr. W. MILES.—When the riots took place at Bristol, it had municipal institutions and a municipal police.

Mr. F. BERKELEY.—I believe that nothing was more marked at the time of the Bristol riots than the imbecility of the municipal authorities of that city.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS.—I shall not divide the committee on this occasion; but if this charge should be brought forward in another Session, I shall certainly oppose it.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK.—The Honourable Gentleman will allow me to suggest that the better course would be, to give notice of a motion for leave to bring in a Bill to levy these expenses on the towns, themselves, applying for the charters.

SIR STRATFORD CANNING. — That part of the vote for civil contingencies, to which my attention has been more especially directed, and to which I would draw the attention of the House, is connected with some matters that have fallen under my own observation. The head of "Special Mission," in page 6., is what I would refer to. I am perfectly aware that these estimates have reference rather to the future than to the past; but, as the past is, in some degree, an indication of the expense to be incurred in the future, we should not be discharging our duty if we allowed any portion of these estimates, in regard to which there may be any doubt, to pass without consideration. And I hope this will be my excuse for the few observations with which I shall trouble the committee. The first thing to which I would call attention is the charge for the embassy of Sir Charles Vaughan to Constantinople; and I would beg the committee to recollect the peculiar circumstances connected with that embassy. The amount charged in the present estimates is only a part of the expense which it is said was actually incurred; and when it is considered that the embassy did not succeed, — that, in fact, the ambassador never reached his destination, — I think the amount is such as to call for some explanation. There is another item to which I wish to call attention, and which relates to the excursion of Mr. Macgregor and Doctor Bowring. Under this head, I find a charge of 2,579*l.*; and how, and for what object, so large a sum has been expended, I am unable to ascertain. Having missions to all parts of the civilised world, and efficient officers in every country to which British commerce extends, I should have thought that the Government might have obtained all the information they could require as to those measures which might be necessary for regulating our commerce, without sending out these gentlemen for that purpose. This is not the first time that such matters have appeared in the Estimates; and, when we consider that one of those gentlemen was a Member of this House, and a supporter of the Government, I think we have a right to ask for some explanation. There is another item to which I will very briefly allude, — the expenses of the Earl of Durham in the mission to Canada. This mission was certainly different from any that precede it, here; and I think the amount of the expense, alone, is sufficient to cause our attention to be directed to it. In making this remark, I am anxious to guard myself against any chance of misconstruction, for I am aware of the delicacy of objecting to what may be called personal expenses. In speaking of those of Lord Durham, I feel it necessary to say, that that Noble Earl has not drawn, on himself, any — even the slightest — ground for a charge of misapplication of the public money in the expenditure of his mission. Nevertheless, I do think that the great amount of the expenditure of that mission does require some explanatory statement. The committee would scarcely believe, unless they saw the estimate, that the expenditure of the Noble Earl was on a scale, and at the rate, of about from 50,000*l.* to 55,000*l.* a-year. Is it to be contended that the representative of the Crown, sent out to a republic, — or I should rather say to a colony with republican habits, and more particularly with habits of republican plainness and frugality, — should be required to live in the style of the first Nobleman in his own country, — and this, too, in a colony where there are few persons with large fortunes, and where, consequently, there are no large establishments kept up? I can scarcely imagine how the Noble Lord could manage to expend so much money in so short a time.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — How does the Right Honourable Gentleman make out that the expenses of Lord Durham's mission amounted to 50,000*l.* or 55,000*l.*?

SIR S. CANNING. — With some deductions, I find that the personal expenses of the Noble Earl were 32,000*l.* or 33,000*l.* This, it should be observed, was not for a whole year, but for a period of only eight months; and then it should be recollected that the Noble Earl most generously applied 10,000*l.* out of his own private funds for his personal expenses. This sum, it is true, was not paid out of the public money; but it serves to show the great amount of the expenditure on the mission, for the period I have mentioned. The Noble Lord must, in fact, have carried on the mission at a rate of Oriental expenditure; and this appears the greater, when we recollect who and what the Noble Earl was before he was called to the House of Peers, — that he was a Member of the House of Commons, and a distinguished Member of that party which has arrogated to itself, almost exclusively, the merit of economy. When it is recollected that that Noble Lord, as a Member of the Commons, denounced, almost from the very spot on which I now stand, the expenditure incurred by the mission of a Right Honourable Gentleman, now no more (the late Mr. Canning), in the embassy to Lisbon, — when these circumstances are borne in mind,—it is impossible not to feel surprise at the great amount of the Noble Earl's expenditure in this Canada mission. When I allude to these circumstances, let it not be supposed, for a moment, that I am influenced by any personal feelings with respect to them. Nothing is further from my thoughts.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Hear, hear!

SIR S. CANNING. — My Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to cast a doubt upon my statement. Does the Right Honourable Gentleman mean to impute to me any personal feeling towards the Noble Earl on the present occasion? From the silence of the Right Honourable Gentleman, I infer that he does mean to impute to me personal feeling in this matter. If so, all I will say at present is, that the Right Honourable Gentleman does not know me: but, whatever may be the impression of the Right Honourable Gentleman, they shall not deter me from discharging my public duty; and I will again say that there are good grounds for calling the attention of the House and the country to those items, and for requiring some explanation respecting them.

Mr. C. BULLER. — I am unwilling to divert the attention of the committee from the real question before it, by any reference to the rather out-of-the-way and uncalled-for remarks of the Right Honourable Gentleman who has just addressed it. If any Honourable Member, at this, or at the other side of the House, had made any one remark imputing personal feelings or motives to the Right Honourable Gentleman, himself, as arising out of bygone recollections, it would give some ground or colour for the heat which he has shown.

SIR S. CANNING. — The Honourable and Learned Member ——

[Cries of "Order, order!"]

I throw myself on the House.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

My remarks had reference more to what I saw than to what I heard. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman sat behind the Right Honourable Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), and could not know what I complained of.

Mr. C. BULLER. — If any Honourable Member at this side had imputed a personal motive, or sought to cast a suspicion of it, on the Right Honourable Gentleman, that might have justified him in some of his remarks; but it was the Right Honourable Gentleman who chose to be his own commentator on his own remarks. It was he, and he only, who gave us his recollection of what had been said or done by Lord Durham as to the Lisbon mission. For my part, I am sorry to find the Right Honourable Gentleman bringing back those recollections of bygone transactions, which I had hoped would have been allowed to slumber, in quiet, in Hansard's Parliamentary Debates. These things are not mentioned, or thought of, as far as relates to the present vote, by any one at this side. Now, as to the expenses of Lord Durham's mission, I am sorry to find the Right Honourable Gentleman has taken that view of them which he has stated. He has spoken of the Noble Earl as the representative of his Sovereign in a republican colony.

SIR S. CANNING. — I said a colony with republican forms.

Mr. C. BULLER. — Well; with republican forms. I hope that this debate will not go out to Canada; for certainly the people of those provinces — at least, those of English origin — will not be flattered by that assertion respecting their "republican forms." To come to the question of expense, — and I quite agree that the country has a right to every explanation on this subject of expenditure, when it is called upon to pay for it; — I suppose the Right Honourable Gentleman would not desire that a nobleman going out as the representative of his Sovereign in a province almost hostile, should go in less state than his character would require; and to that state, alone, did Lord Durham, and his friends on his behalf, aspire. Many Honourable Gentlemen present well know that the expenses of living are much greater in Canada than in this country; and at the time Lord Durham arrived there, Quebec was suddenly filled with military, and of course the prices of everything were much enhanced. Then, there was no House for the Governor's residence. Lord Gosford, who had no family, and whose stay was expected to be very short, occupied merely a small bedroom and sitting-room, — the same rooms that he had occupied when aid-de-camp to Lord Dalhousie. Accordingly, the House of Assembly was fitted up as the Governor's residence, and with as little expense as possible. Then it was necessary to lodge the Governor's suite, and houses had to be taken for that purpose. Next, — it was requisite that the Governor General should go to Montreal, and remain there during the greater part of the winter: of course, it was necessary to lodge his suite. This could only be done by taking houses; and in Montreal the custom is, to let houses for a certain period of two years. And to show that the expenses so incurred were no more than the necessity of the case required, I need only say that the houses so taken for the use of Lord Durham and his suite are at this time occupied by Sir J. Colburne; and although these expenses are charged as attendant upon Lord Durham's mission, they are in reality for keeping up the state of Sir J. Colburne. Then it is to be remembered that the mission of Lord Durham was of a nature that would call for greater expenses than ordinary missions; — the staff was far greater; — and on going out to supersede the powers of the Government of the province, it was necessary to take out many officers who are not required in missions or embassies of the usual character. On the advantages of Lord Durham's mission, I will not now stop to dilate; but I think no one will contend that the orders which were issued by Lord Durham, in his capacity of Governor General, were not calculated to do good. I will mention one, — that for instituting the inquiry into the state of the waste lands and the Crown lands of the province, — and which I confidently hope will lead to an improved management of those lands, — lands that, I trust, will soon become a source of great wealth to the colony, instead of being a subject, as they have been heretofore, of constant bickering and expense: this, alone, will far overpay the whole expense of the mission. Reverting again to the expenditure, — there are many matters which seem altogether to have been overlooked by the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite. One of these — and it is no inconsiderable item — is, the expenses of the delegates from all our North American colonies, with the exception of Newfoundland, who came to confer with the chief commissioner. There were also many official persons in Canada at the time, to whom, as well as to the officers of the various ships of war in the harbour, it was necessary to extend that hospitality which was to be expected from the high station and character of the Noble Earl. Then there is the great expense of travelling. The Noble Earl was obliged to travel 1500 or 1600 miles, partly on land and partly by steam-boats; and these last occasioned a very heavy expenditure, as the Noble Earl had to engage them exclusively for the use of himself and suite. I think when all these various items are considered, it will not be said that the expenditure incurred by this mission was unreasonably large. The Right Honourable Gentleman has done full justice to the liberality of Lord Durham, which induced him to defray out of his own private fortune those expenses which, in such cases, it is always usual to call upon the country to pay. I have, therefore, no occasion to offer a word on that point. I have only further to add, that, if the public service in which Lord Durham was employed has been expensive, the fault is not Lord Durham's, but has been consequent upon the nature of the service in which he was so engaged; and I must say — and the House is aware that I have no lavish notions of expense — that the expenditure was not more than, under the circumstances, was absolutely necessary.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I am glad this discussion has been raised, because of the explanation that it has drawn forth from the Honourable and Learned Gentleman. I will not for a moment profess to be enabled to form an estimate of the expense which ought to be incurred in a mission such as that of Lord Durham to Canada. It would be difficult for any man to do so. I think, however, it would be better, in future cases, to give the Governor General a specific amount for his expenses, than to allow him an unlimited power of expenditure; for, however well his discretion might be exercised, the other plan would be more satisfactory to the country. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman has fully explained, that the greater part of the 30,000*l.* which Lord Durham's mission has cost, was incurred in travelling and other necessary expenses, and in providing suitable residences for himself and successor and their suites. This ought to have been stated by the Government, and then all misapprehension would have been avoided. I think, too, it is the duty of the Government, in such cases, not to place any Governor in such a situation with regard to expense, as shall give the public an opportunity of drawing invidious though unjust distinctions, in his favour, as compared with his successor.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — I am relieved from the necessity of going into the details of the amount of the estimate of Lord Durham's expenses as Governor General of Canada, by the very complete explanation which has been given by the Honourable and Learned Member for Liskeard; but at the same time, as I am connected with that department of the Government whose duty it is to investigate all these charges, and to express their opinions upon them, I should shrink from that duty if I did not come forward and state that these items do not appear to me, or to my Noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies, to be open to any fair objection, or to bear about them any marks of unnecessary and improper extravagance. I agree with the Right Honourable Gentleman who last spoke, that it would not be proper, in all cases, to leave these expenses entirely to the discretion of the Governor; but there are some cases in which it is absolutely necessary, that such a discretion should be allowed—but always upon the understanding, that whatever is done, shall be done under the responsibility of the Government, and is to be submitted to Parliament. I can see no reason why a person going out on a special mission, and without salary, should not have his expenses allowed, unless it should appear that any extravagant and unnecessary expenses have been incurred by him; and in the case of Lord Durham, not only did that Noble Lord receive no salary, but he defrayed the whole of what may be termed his personal expenses, amounting, as we have been told, to 10,000*l.*, out of his own private fortune, — calling upon the state only to pay those sums which were expended, bonâ fide, for the public service. There is one item in the amount, which has not been explained, and to which I will now refer; that is, the sum charged for reimbursing the expense incurred by the commander of the ship which conveyed Lord Durham and suite to and from Canada. Now, with this, Lord Durham had nothing whatever to do; all he did was, to send to the Admiralty an account of the number of persons he should require accommodation for, leaving it to the captain of the ship to provide that accommodation as he might think proper; which is the usual course in such cases. I have thought it right to give this explanation, knowing that considerable misstatement has gone abroad upon this subject. There is one other point upon which I would touch before I sit down;—I mean the expense incurred in sending out two gentlemen — Mr. Macgregor and Dr. Bowring—to make certain inquiries relative to our commercial relations in the East. The Right Honourable Baronet, who has adverted to this point, seems to think that our diplomatic agents in the different parts of the world ought to have sufficient commercial knowledge to render it unnecessary that any further expense of this nature should be incurred. I was certainly surprised, considering the opportunities he must have had of judging upon such subjects, to hear the Right Honourable Gentleman say that he considers that that detailed knowledge, which the Government require, is possessed by those parties. It would be most inexpedient, when the vast interests of this country are so materially involved in our commercial transactions, — when we consider how important it is, in negotiating commercial treaties, that accurate information should be obtained, — that the Government should not take care to send persons from this country to the foreign ports, to confer with our diplomatic agents there, and to obtain and communicate that information, which those agents do not and cannot be expected to possess. Mr. Macgregor is not so well known in this House as the other gentleman whose name has been mentioned; therefore, I may be allowed to state, that no public servant ever entitled himself more to the gratitude of this country, or rendered more services to the interest he was sent to protect, than that gentleman; and his exertions contributed not a little to the successful negotiation of the late commercial treaties which have been entered into. I have felt bound, therefore, to embrace this opportunity of rendering my testimony to the high merit and eminent services of this gentleman.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I should be unwilling that this debate should close, without offering a few words to the committee, with the view of explaining away a misapprehension which seems to have arisen in the mind of the Right Honourable Gentleman (Sir S. Canning), in reference to a cheer to which I gave utterance. I must say that the Right Honourable Gentleman has scarcely done me justice; for if I did, by that cheer, express anything like an opinion, it was from motives of which the Right Honourable Gentleman cannot reasonably complain. I deny any intention of expressing the slightest improper feeling towards the Right Honourable Gentleman; but I did think that we ought not to mix up with the discussion of this vote old recollections connected with the name of Canning, for the purpose of influencing members of the committee either one way or the other. Suppose I had been in the House at the time Lord Durham made his motion about Mr. Canning's mission to Lisbon, and suppose I had voted with Lord Durham (then Mr. Lambton) upon that question,—what on earth could that have to do with the present discussion? I have to apologise to the Right Honourable Gentleman for any reference to former transactions and feelings that may have been inferred from my cheer; but the Right Honourable Gentleman is, himself, responsible,—for the first allusion to those matters was made by himself. My wish was, to have this question discussed upon its own intrinsic merits. The Government felt, in sending out Lord Durham on this special mission, that it was not to be considered as a mere matter of money; and they considered, that, in intrusting the Noble Lord with that power which it was intended by Parliament that the Governor General of Canada should be invested with, it was not advisable to place any limit upon the exercise of his discretion in this matter. At the same time, it was not our wish to apply any rule to this case of Lord Durham's mission, which did not apply to all similar missions; and I think, if those Honourable Gentlemen who find fault with the expense in this case, will apply the analogy of other similar expeditions which are strictly applicable, they will find that their complaints have very little foundation.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I feel called upon to say two words with regard to the employment of Mr. Macgregor and Dr. Bowring. The Right Honourable Gentleman (Sir S. Canning) seems to think it somewhat extraordinary that the Government, having agents in all foreign ports to which British commerce extends, should think it necessary to employ other persons to make inquiries with respect to commercial matters, in so far as they concern the wellbeing of this country. I must, however, be allowed to say that the assistance the Government has derived from those gentlemen has been in the highest degree beneficial. Mr. Macgregor was employed to a very great extent in negotiating the commercial treaty with Austria; and his aid in that matter — a most important one for the commerce of this country — was such as could not be expected from any ambassador or diplomatic agent; and I can assure the House, and the Right Honourable Gentleman, that I feel particularly obliged to Mr. Macgregor for the very important services he has rendered. Then, again, as to Dr. Bowring,—he has been employed, in a similar manner in Turkey, Syria, and other places in the East, to make inquiries, and to ascertain how far our commercial relations with those countries might be extended and improved. He has made a very favourable Report, and at the same time a most valuable one, as containing statistical and other facts of considerable interest. We have been accused very often, by Honourable Members opposite, of neglecting the commerce of the country,—of taking no pains to ascertain what means there were available for extending it,—and of caring only to maintain ourselves in official power; but, now, the Right Honourable Gentleman comes forward, and complains of our not being contented with the information to be derived from our diplomatic agents, and that we are entailing expense upon the country by employing persons competent — peculiarly competent — to inquire after, and obtain for us, that information by means of which the commerce of this country may be improved and enlarged. And I may be permitted to add, that more has been done within the last few years, to extend our commercial relations with foreign countries, than at any former period. With regard to the small sum of money these missions have cost, I am prepared to contend that the benefit conferred upon the country far more than justifies such an outlay.

Mr. HUME. — I object to continuing the discussion upon a vote of Supply at this hour of the night. As regards the missions of Dr. Bowring and Mr. Macgregor, I must say that, as far as I can judge, the Reports which those gentlemen have furnished us with, contain more practical information than we have derived from all our ambassadors, put together.

MULLINGAR.

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH.—As the matter of which I have given to the Noble Marquess, opposite, notice, merely has reference to the appointment of a magistrate in the county Westmeath, of which I entirely disapproved, I should have contented myself with the expression of that disapproval, if some extraordinary circumstances had not arisen in the course of the proceedings, which have compelled me to pursue the matter up to the present moment. I do not know how, very well, I can now let it rest, as these deeds, of which I complain, are done in a county now deeply demoralised by agitators and agitation, and in which six murders were committed within the last fortnight of the last year and the first month of the present year. The Noble Marquess, a short time since, stated that he considered this a stale matter; but he must remember that it is not above a month since the correspondence upon this subject was laid upon the table; and ever since then I have been every day employed upon the Irish Committee. The questions which I have to put to the Noble Marquess relate, in the first instance, to the appearance of two letters in the correspondence;—the one dated the 21st day of August, 1837, from Mr. Drummond to Mr. Fitzsimon, stating that he then inclosed the Government Reports for his perusal; the other is Mr. Fitzsimon's answer to the aforesaid, dated the 23d of August, and acknowledging the receipt of the Report, and stating that he then returned them. These letters not having appeared at the investigation at Mullingar, and it having been understood from the short-hand writer's report that Mr. Fitzsimon swore that he received these Reports on the first day of grouse shooting, the Noble Marquess will have to account for the appearance of these letters; because, although the first day of grouse shooting—namely, the 20th of August—fell on a Sunday, if Mr. Fitzsimon's evidence be true, he must have received Mr. Drummond's letter one day before it was written; and that I cannot account for. Perhaps, however, it may be intended to assume that the original Reports were returned to the Government, although it appears throughout the whole of Mr. Fitzsimon's letters and evidence, that it must have been the original Reports he still held; because, in Mr. Peter Fitzgerald's evidence, page 22., it is positively sworn that, on or about the 25th of June, 1838, when the investigation took place, these original Reports were in the possession of Mr. Fitzgerald, the witness, at the time he was delivering his testimony. Then, again, the Noble Marquess will have to account for the non-appearance of the letter of Mr. Sheil to Mr. Drummond, of the 6th of September, wherein he (Mr. Sheil) stated "that the charges preferred against him by the Government officers were totally unfounded," as well, also, as that letter of Mr. Drummond's to me of the 14th of May; and this latter letter is of peculiar importance, because it must be remembered that by the evidence it appears Mr. Sheil had had an interview with Mr. Drummond in the month of September, wherein he stated that Lord Normanby was perfectly satisfied with the conduct of Mr. Sheil. Notwithstanding this, it appears by the papers that, on the 11th of December, Mr. Drummond wrote to Mr. Rowan for copies of the Reports, which he then stated had been unaccountably lost or mislaid; whereas, on the 23d of the same month, I, having written to Mr. Drummond on the subject, got no answer until, in the succeeding month of June, I brought the matter before your Lordships. Mr. Drummond wrote to me to account for this omission, by stating, as he had previously done in his letter to Mr. Rowan of the 11th of December, that the papers, having been suddenly called for by Lord Morpeth in London, had been sent, along with my note, wrapped up in them, to the Irish Office, in obedience to that requisition; so that, if what Mr. Drummond wrote to Mr. Rowan on the 11th of December was true, my letter, which was not written until the 23d of December, must have gone to London before the 11th of that month, — namely, ten days before it was written! These trifles I hope the Noble Marquess will condescend to account for. The next point to which I have to advert is, the remarkable omissions in the evidence which has been laid on your Lordships' table, and which I will go through seriatim. The Government officers having received due thanks for their behaviour during the election, it was not until the conduct of the agitators, who were the partisans of the Government, were involved in these proceedings, that they (the Government) consented to receive fabricated charges against their own officers; and at page 5. of the evidence, after the words "constable of police," in Mr. Decluzeau's evidence, it should have been left to appear "that these counter charges had not been left in his possession long enough for him to copy them, but that he was obliged to return them on the spot by an orderly dragoon." Not a word of this appears in the evidence as furnished by the Government.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.— What is the Noble Marquess reading from?

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. — From the short-hand writer's notes (which were not corrected at the Castle of Dublin; and it will be found that everything will fit into its place, and that there is no composition!) — The next omission is also in page 5., after the inquiry from Mr. Decluzeau whether he was an Orangeman? and whether he had so expressed himself in the canal boat, on his way to Mullingar? The question was put by Mr. Robert Tighe, the barrister, with whom it appeared he had travelled; and his answer was, "that he did not state in the boat he was an Orangeman, or had been one, or ever said he had been one. He did not speak to an individual in the boat, but to Mr. Tighe himself, and another lawyer; and he thought he was speaking to gentlemen." Mr. Tighe objected to this being put upon the minutes; Mr. Decluzeau was desirous that it should appear; but the chairman overruled that gentleman; — a pretty instance, in my opinion, of the impartiality of the Government commissioner to the Government officer! The next omission is at page 7., where it is stated that "Mr. Decluzeau was thunderstruck at the gross insults he had received during the election, and he knew not for what cause he was spit upon and insulted." Again, at page 12., after the words "Colonel O'Donoughue, he believes, is in England," in Mr. Rowan's evidence, "he (Colonel O'Donoughue) spoke favourably of Mr. Decluzeau in a letter;" that letter was produced, but objected to on the part of Mr. Sheil, and allowed by the commissioner. Now, if the Noble Marquess will look at the top of page 14., he will find that the following passage is suppressed. The words in the Government evidence are, "witness saw a wounded officer." As it ought to stand, it should read thus:— "Captain Fawcett, of the Scots Greys, was struck while commanding a body of troops." At the bottom of the same page are found "words to that effect." An omission, however, follows, of "Mr. Sheil addressed nearly the same words to him;" and added, "that if they had been left to their own police (the Westmeath), there would have been no disturbance, and they wanted no northern or strange police there." The Noble Marquess opposite must recollect that it was by his own orders the Louth olice were sent into Westmeath; and his is the way they were permitted to be eated by a person maintained in the ommission of the peace. Again, at page 7., after the words "during the election," he following passage is suppressed: — Did you see him insulted? — No; but I aw spits on his coat." At page 18. there is a very remarkable omission. The matter relates to the constitution of the court. A witness, who had been summoned by Mr. Decluzeau from Kilbeggan, refused to attend, and the commissioner was respectfully called upon to enforce his attendance, but replied, "This is an inferior court; I have no power to compel the attendance of any witness." Here I must observe upon the constitution of those arbitrary courts, wholly unknown in this part of the United Kingdom, but favourites of the Noble Marquess's Government in Ireland, — courts not having the power, even, to summon witnesses, — held by judges under, possibly, secret instructions, — by judges wholly dependent — looking to the Lord Lieutenant for his favour; the opinion of whom, even if honest, the Lord Lieutenant might wholly or only in part promulgate. In this instance, there was strong reason to suspect secret instructions; because, at pages 29. and 35., we find the commissioner employing his time in an inquiry as to whether I was a member of a liberal club, — a subject quite out of the line of the matters of investigation. The next omission is at page 20., as to the attendance of another witness who refused to come. Mr. Decluzeau's counsel requested that it might be inserted on the minutes, in order to meet any inference that might be attempted to be drawn in consequence of Mr. Decluzeau not producing him. and even this the commissioner refused to permit to appear on the minutes. Two more instances of gross partiality appear by omissions made at page 21. A Mr. Francis Smith, a magistrate, was examined, and left the table. Mr. Decluzeau's agent was out of court during his examination: the consequence was, that a material question was omitted to be put to him, respecting the irritating language used towards Mr. Decluzeau, before he exhibited the warmth of manner in repelling the charge to which the witness had deposed. The commissioner refused to put the question, or allow it to be put, as the witness had not requested to make any explanation. The counsel then observed that the object of the Government was to elicit the entire truth. Not one word of this is upon the minutes. Then a Mr. R. Smyth, a deputy lieutenant of the county, was called in to be examined; and on being asked whether he was in court during any part of the examination, he answered, "Only for a very few minutes;" when Mr. Fitzsimon objected, and his evidence was not received. This objection was made, although Mr. Fitzsimon and Mr. Sheil were both allowed to remain in court during the investigation, and to be examined, themselves, afterwards. The next omission is at page 42., in Mr. Sheil's own evidence. He was asked whether Mr. Drummond ever stated to him that the Earl of Mulgrave was satisfied with his conduct in those transactions? In the Government Report of the evidence the answer is, "Witness thinks he did." But the true version is as follows: — On the question being put, Mr. Sheil's agent said, "Don't answer that question. Witness has an objection to answer that question." After a pause, Mr. Sheil said, "I think he did. Will you allow me to think? Am I to say yes, or no?"

I shall now refer to the dealing of the Government with myself in this transaction, which has been most unfair, because I have unflinchingly served my Sovereign in the situation which I fill, as it was my duty to do. In the month of October last, for the first time, I saw that letter, dated the 20th of August, 1838, and addressed by Mr. Drummond to Mr. Sheil, in which was the following passage: —

His Excellency desires me to add, with respect to the charge of your having been found drinking in a public house, that his Excellency regrets that an imputation so utterly unwarranted by the real facts of the case should have been made, and so industriously circulated against you.

Now, in the latter part of this minute, is this passage: —

His Excellency has yet to notice the charge brought against Mr. Sheil, of being found drinking in a public house, at a late hour, by the police. No such charge had been made, it must be observed, in the reports of chief constable Decluzeau and Mr. Rowan, nor had it ever been brought before his Excellency in any authentic shape; on the contrary, every statement that had been made to the Government relative to these transactions, showed that such a charge was without foundation. Nevertheless, as the report had been circulated, and as Lord Westmeath, in the course of his correspondence with the Government, had complained that Mr. Sheil had not been proceeded against under the Spirit Licence Act, his Excellency considers that Mr. Brooke acted agreeably to the spirit of his instructions by inquiring into the truth of a statement seriously affecting the conduct and character of a magistrate; and his Excellency entirely agrees in the opinion given by Mr. Brooke, that "the witnesses on both sides concurred in negativing the charge."

I should like to know where such a statement can be found? It must have been pretended to be either in a debate in this House, or in my correspondence with the Government. It cannot be found in any report of any debate; as to whether it can be discovered in the correspondence with the Government, let the correspondence speak for itself. With the permission of your Lordships I will read the following letters: —

(Letter from the Marquess of Westmeath to Viscount Morpeth.)

Clonyn, 17th October, 1838.

My Lord, — My attention has within these few days been directed to a letter going the round of the newspapers, dated the 20th of August, signed T. Drummond, and directed to Mr. Sheil, a magistrate of this county, in which is the following passage: — "His Excellency desires me to add, with respect to the charge of your having been found drinking in a public house, that his Excellency regrets that an imputation so utterly unwarranted by the real facts of the case should have been made, and so industriously circulated against you." It would be difficult to understand, without some explanation, to whom this allusion has reference; but as there were discussions in the House of Lords upon the subject, I cannot for a moment suppose, that it is directed against me, or to anything which might have passed there, or otherwise, — when, even if it had, I would not, out of respect to the dignity of that place, plead to it in any official letter to a Minister. It must, therefore, I presume (supposing the insinuation to have any reference whatever to me), arise out of some part of my correspondence with the Government upon the subject; and I am somewhat disposed to think this may be so, owing to a passage in what is termed the "Minute," which is to be found in the same publication, where, towards the close, is the following passage: — "Nevertheless, as the report has been circulated, and as Lord Westmeath, in the course of his correspondence with the Government, had complained that Mr. Sheil had not been prosecuted under the Spirit Licence Act," &c. &c. When a copy of that Minute was forwarded to me, I merely acknowledged the receipt of it; I did no more, because I thought it so partial to the real offenders, so manifestly unjust to the officers of the Government, and that it had so evidently passed over the principal features of the whole question, that making any appeal against so strong a political bias would have been totally useless; but now, when I see the purpose to which some of the parties implicated are enabled to turn it to assail me, I must beg leave to put the matter upon its proper footing, denying that in any shape it can be fairly inferred from my correspondence with the Government, that I thought Mr. Sheil should have been prosecuted for drinking in a public house; but I thought, and still think, and maintain that opinion, that the whole party should have been prosecuted under the Spirit Licence Act. Whoever reads the sixth section of the 6 and 7 Will. IV. cap. 38., must admit it. The party were found in a common public house, late — after hours. They were not inmates, for there were not beds for a tenth of them; it would be a gross perversion to pretend it. Whether Mr. Sheil came in after the police, or was there before them, is a distinction without a difference. He completely identified himself with the disturbance going on, by not actively interfering to prevent it; and after the temporary lull which was marked by his introduction of Mr. Fitzsimon to Mr. Rowan, the disturbance (to use a moderate term when applied to the company and the transaction) was recommenced by the grossest insults being heaped upon the chief constable of police, who, never let it be forgotten, is authorised by the powers of the Act to have cleared the house himself without the intervention of any magistrate, if none had been present; so that the only justifiable cause, even if it had been sustained, for Mr. Sheil going there, quite falls to the ground; and finally, lest anything should be supposed deficient in the case on which I advance this opinion, glasses were upon the table, and the odour of whisky is proved to have been pervading the room.

It is therefore clear that, as to me, this insinuation ought to be cleared up, by the Government denying its application, or a repository acknowledgment made for it. I regret having been driven to suppose it possible it could have intended it. I have, &c.

Lord Viscount Morpeth, &c. &c. &c.

Dublin Castle, 21st October, 1838.

My Lord, — I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 17th inst., adverting to a portion of a communication addressed, by the order of the Lord Lieutenant, to Mr. Sheil, a magistrate of the county of Westmeath, which had arisen from transactions that had been made the ground of public inquiry.

Having laid your Lordship's letter before his Excellency, I am directed to acquaint you that, when the decision of the Government has been promulgated upon matters of a similar character, it has not been usual to enter into subsequent explanation with those who might consider themselves parties interested; but upon the present occasion his Excellency regrets to observe that your Lordship, in speaking of the decision which had been communicated by the Government, has been pleased, in the official letter addressed to me by your Lordship, to accuse it of political bias, of being partial to the real offenders, and manifestly unjust to others. His Excellency cannot fail to consider these terms as equally unwarranted by the facts of the case, and unbecoming in a person continuing to hold a situation of local authority under the Administration whose proceedings and motives he thus arraigns, and who, when he assumes in his official correspondence so unjustifiable a tone, must be held to have disentitled himself to that consideration which the Government would otherwise have been most ready to extend to the office which he filled.

I have, &c.

(Signed) Morpeth.

The Marquess of Westmeath.

In the letter I have just read, it will be seen that the Noble Author (Lord Morpeth) states that he wrote it by the direction of the Lord Lieutenant. It is purely an official letter, therefore; and, although offensive, cannot be felt to be in the slightest degree personal to me. It was, however, no doubt, written with a view to induce me to resign my office, which I have determined not to do; thinking, by remaining, I can best serve my Sovereign, whose commission I bear. I will now just turn, for about five minutes, to the Lord Lieutenant's minute. It is most important, as it shows the species of thimble-riggery to which the late Irish Government had recourse:—

His Excellency has had under his consideration the minutes of evidence recently held at Mullingar, before Mr. Brooke, Q. C., into certain transactions which occurred at that town, during the contested election for the county of Westmeath.

With respect to the dispute which took place at the court-house on the morning of the day above named, between Mr. Fitzgerald and chief constable Decluzeau, it appears to his Excellency that there are grounds for believing the conduct of both parties to have been hasty and intemperate; but as the subject was investigated by the magistrates at the time, and as it seems to have been the prevailing impression that both parties were to blame, and that the matter should be allowed to rest, his Excellency does not deem it expedient to take any further steps in reference to this part of the occurrences which have recently been the subject of investigation; but his Excellency feels called upon to observe, that in the conduct of chief constable Decluzeau, there appears to have been a harshness and want of civility,—an absence of a disposition to oblige, and to render the police arrangements conducive to the convenience and accommodation of the public. The constabulary regulations strongly inculcate upon all members of the force, "how very incumbent it is on them to act in the discharge of their various duties with the utmost forbearance, mildness, urbanity, and perfect civility towards all classes of her Majesty's subjects; and that upon no occasion, or under any provocation, should they so far forget themselves as to permit their feelings to get the better of their discretion, and conduct themselves rudely or harshly in the performance of their respective offices."

Now, it appears in evidence that Mr. Decluzeau had been placed by the sheriff to keep a certain passage clear in the court; that he was obstructed in the performance of his duty by the witness, Peter Fitzgerald, who shook his clenched fist in his face, and called him "an Orange crutch from the North." Mr. Decluzeau was assisted in this duty by a sub-constable of the name of Ghee. Mr. Fitzsimon was pleased to state that the sub-constable Ghee should be taken by the collar and dragged out like a dog. The verdict of his Excellency upon this is,—"that the use of these precise terms is not confirmed by the rest of the evidence;" although it was sworn to, and not contradicted. But his Excellency softens it down into the admission that Mr. Fitzsimon had said "that the constable ought to be taken prisoner by the neck." Thus, then, his Excellency condemns Mr. Decluzeau for having obeyed the orders which the high sheriff had given him, the which if he had hesitated or refused to do, he would have been liable to be dismissed; and the high sheriff was not called by any of the parties who wished to impeach the reports made to the Government, to show as to whether those reports varied, in the slightest degree, from the truth. It appears in evidence that the witness Fitzgerald, for his part, stated in the court that sub-constable Ghee ought to be "dragged out like a dog;" and furthermore, Fitzgerald added,—"Do you see that puppy there? By God! if I had my pistols, I would shoot him!"

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.—No; I think the Noble Marquess ——

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH.—Does the Noble Marquess doubt it? Let him look to page 8. The summary was this,—that Mr. Decluzeau was condemned for want of forbearance and urbanity, for executing the orders given to him by the same Lord Lieutenant who had maintained Captain Gleeson in the same situation as Mr. Decluzeau after he had told his superior officer on duty, Captain Vignolles, "That he did not care a damn for him." But, to proceed with the minute I was reading:—

His Excellency regrets that Mr. Fitzsimon, instead of at once complaining to the sheriff, should, under any impression, however strong, of the improper conduct of the constable, have addressed him in such terms when engaged in the discharge of his duty.

With regard to the occurrence at the public house on the evening of the same day, the facts appear to be as follow:—Mr. Rowan directed the police to patrol the town on the night of the 11th of August. He divided the force into three divisions, one of which he took under his own command, intending to visit the public houses which he should find open at a late hour. About twelve o'clock he came to the house of a Mrs. Carberry, a publican, where loud cheering was heard. The door was closed, but admittance was immediately given to the police. A number of persons were found in the shop and lower part of the house; some said they were waiting for the morning canal boat, others that they had come to see their friends. On proceeding upstairs Mr. Rowan found a small room full of company: he desired chief constable Decluzeau to count up the number; and intimated that those who were lodgers might remain, but that the others must retire. At this moment Mr. Fitzsimon and Mr. Sheil arrived, having received information that the police were acting without a magistrate. It appears in evidence that the house in question had been taken for two of the candidates, Mr. Chapman and Sir Richard Nagle, and that the greater number of the persons then assembled were respectable freeholders who had dined at the house. Dr. Carr, of Moate, one of the party, states, that he always lodges at Mrs. Carberry's house when he comes to Mullingar.

The first pretence was, that Mr. Sheil had received information that the police were acting without a magistrate. Where is that found? At page 24. of their own evidence, the witness, Carberry, swears that he left Mr. Rowan with the police at his mother's house; and he was the person that all the parties had sworn had gone to inform them of the police being there. It does not appear from Mr. Sheil's evidence, that he ever pretended to Mr. Rowan that he had come there to act as a magistrate. Mr. Fitzsimon, in his cross-examination, admitted that it was not in any part of his statement to the Government, and that he would not undertake to say from whom he had heard it. Not a single witness swore that he had told Mr. Sheil any such thing. How, then, therefore, can the Noble Marquess for one moment set up such a justification for Messrs. Sheil and Fitzsimon on this occasion? Mr. Sheil admitted that he knew Mr. Rowan; that he had sat upon the bench with him; and yet, although he was standing by him on that occasion, did not give him the slightest assistance until Mr. Fitzsimon had twice insulted Mr. Decluzeau, who, Mr. Fitzsimon, himself, admits, legally speaking, as he is pleased to term it, was authorised, and would have been justified in clearing the house of the whole of them, — which Mr. Decluzeau swears he would have done, if Mr. Rowan had not been present. What ensued? Mr. Rowan gave his orders that all but the lodgers should retire. That gentleman then left the House, and then his Excellency was pleased to draw a conclusion condemnatory of him, for ever having gone there, in the following words: — "In this view Mr. Rowan appears to have concurred, for he left the house, and withdrew the constabulary, without taking any further proceedings; and his Excellency is of opinion that, that in so doing, he exercised a proper discretion." Now, your Lordships will look at the matter as it stands in the Lord Lieutenant's minute, where it is stated there were lodgers there, and respectable freeholders there. The witness Carberry, the son of the owner of the house, — and it ought to be remarked that though she was resident in the town, she herself was not produced, — stated that there were only four or five beds in the house: that his mother occupied one; that he had another for himself; that he had two sisters living in his mother's house; and that she kept a servant boy and girl besides, who were both at home during the time of the election. The idea, then, of their being forty or fifty lodgers in that house was utterly ridiculous. Then his Excellency states that the greater number of persons there assembled were respectable freeholders; and a person of the name of Carr, dignified in the present evidence by an M.D. after his name, but who swears himself to be a village apothecary in Moate, states "that a man of the name of Mara, and a man of the name of Falton, were the only freeholders there, except one Magawly, who was a freeholder 'by report.'" His Excellency further states that Dr. Carr always lodges at Mrs. Carberry's when he comes to Mullingar, — which is most important for your Lordships to know; and he admits Mr. Fitzsimon to have said, "that if he had known Mr. Rowan was there, he would not have come to the house." If this be so, the obvious question to ask was, — when he had found it out, why did he not go away? And his Excellency goes on to recite, "that Mr. Sheil observed to Mr. Rowan and others, that he was sorry the Louth police had been introduced into the county; and that if the peace of the town had been committed to the care of the Westmeath police, those scenes would not have occurred. That such an expression, used in such a place and under such circumstances, was indiscreet; that such representation should have been made in private, and not in a public house, and on such an occasion, nor in the presence of the men and the principal officers of that body." So, then, his Excellency actually did know what sort of a place it was, and that it was a public house, and he censures Mr. Sheil for having insulted the police! What, then, becomes of the truth of Mr. Sheil's own answer to Mr. Drummond, in the letter which has been suppressed? Mr. Sheil, in his own evidence, acknowledges, in page 41., that the charges preferred against him, which accuse him of this very offence, "are totally unfounded." Notwithstanding his Excellency having pointedly censured him, and thus shown that he had not told the truth, this person remains in the commission of the peace. The principal outburst of insolence in the public house had been levelled at Mr. Decluzeau; and it was attempted to screen that by an apology offered to Mr. Rowan, which Mr. Rowan stated he had refused to accept at the expense of Mr. Decluzeau, who had been the object of so much malevolence.

Mr. Sheil was in court, and heard all Mr. Rowan's evidence, and might have contradicted him. Mr. Rowan's evidence completely sustained his report; and yet Mr. Sheil ventured to state, in his letter to Mr. Drummond, that "the charges against him were totally unfounded." His Excellency proceeds, then, to censure Mr. Decluzeau for having snapped his fingers in Fitzgerald's face. But his Excellency quite keeps out of sight that Fitzgerald had said in court, — swearing by his Maker, — if he had his pistols, he would shoot Decluzeau. This provocation was wholly put out of sight.

It is necessary for me to inform your Lordships that I was grossly libelled in the Pilot Dublin newspaper, after having brought the matter under your consideration. I did not bring it under your Lordships' notice as a question of privilege, but I went to the Court of Queen's Bench, where I was sifted on my oath as to what I had said in this House, and whether I had stated anything that was untrue. The court unanimously made the rule absolute for the libel. Mr. Sheil stepped in to aid Mr. Barrett, the editor, and filed an affidavit for this purpose. In that affidavit Mr. Sheil undertook to relate the circumstances which passed at the public house. A copy of that affidavit, regularly attested by the clerk of the Crown, was sent down, in order that Mr. Sheil might be examined as to the substance of it, and that it might be shown that the account in that affidavit varied very materially from the version of it given by him on the investigation. Mr. Sheil tendered himself to be examined and sifted to the bottom; and yet, on this point, he sheltered himself under the strict rules of a Nisi Prius Court, and refused to be examined out of the affidavit, because the clerk of the Crown was not brought down to prove it. I now come to state that the libel before mentioned was circulated, by the common ballad singers, throughout the country; and in the body of it is to be found a letter from Mr. Sheil to the newspaper, connecting itself with the libel; yet this person is still in the commission of the peace for the county. I did not wish to persecute Mr. Barrett for that flagitious libel; and it was agreed, that on his pleading guilty before the beginning of last term, he should not be brought up for judgment, and an apology was to be made. The whole term, however, was spun out before the parties could be got to make the apology; the consequence of which is, that Mr. Barrett will have to be brought up for judgment in the next term; but had that apology been made, I should have been in a position to have brought the matter more fully before your Lordships. I will now proceed to comment on the thing called an opinion— if it can be called a judicial opinion framed in such a manner and from such a court. The commissioner stated that I did not attend. He might, no doubt, have learned that I never intended to have attended; I did not understand the constitution of the court, and had no duty to perform in it. The commissioner then goes on to state, —

> I found, amongst others, a letter of Lord Westmeath to Lord Morpeth, of the 5th of May, in which, after stating that he is naturally entitled to be considered in the arrangements, he requests "to know on what grounds the investigation is to be made, — whether upon the reports severally made by Mr. Rowan and chief constable Decluzeau to the Government, or upon the communications which I (Lord Westmeath) have thought it my duty to make to the Government, and also in the hearing of the Ministers of the Crown in the House of Lords, or upon both?"

Now, when it is recollected that I made that inquiry, utterly in ignorance of the report of the government officers upon the transaction, it is nothing less than ridiculous to suppose that I should have that letter quoted as a motive for my attendance. It is so palpably absurd, that it is not necessary I should take up your Lordships' time by demonstrating it. The commissioner then concludes his report in the following words: —

> I felt, therefore, that the investigation of those charges came within the letter and spirit of my instruction; and I shall only observe, that the witnesses on both sides concurred in negativing those charges.

The commissioner made this monstrous assumption, although the triumphant refutation of its applicability will be found by your Lordships in my letter of the 17th of October, already read. The Morning Chronicle, also, in August last, indulged in a furious tirade against me, for having brought this matter under your Lordships' notice. It was a scurrilous attack, and I do not deem it worth my while to notice it before your Lordships. Upon the whole, I have stated the treatment I have received for serving my Sovereign faithfully and zealously; and I shall continue to do so, disregarding all the malevolence of whomsoever it may displease.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.— I assure your Lordships that it is not my intention to detain you at any length; and this is the less necessary, as the Noble

Marquess has not concluded with any motion.

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. — I wish merely to state the question to which I require an answer. Will the Noble Marquess consent to the appointment of a select committee to supply the omissions in the evidence which I have noticed?

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.— This is so stale a subject, that I shall certainly not enter into it at any length. With respect to the minutes of evidence, they were taken down by Mr. Brooke himself, and he did not pretend to give the questions and answers. As to the two letters, I cannot explain the reason why they were not produced at the inquiry, except that they appeared to be exceedingly irrelevant. There was no intention of suppressing any letter; but as no copy could be found, one was made of the original minute, and, in a note, it was expressly stated that this copy might probably differ slightly from that in the Noble Marquess's possession. It is not possible for me to go into all the points of this worn-out and, as I must call it, trivial case, before your Lordships; but I must observe that, as regards Mr. Sheil entering the public house, he did so under pretence that the police were acting without the authority of a magistrate; and, at page 35., in the evidence of Mr. Fitzsimon, it appears that the parties were proceeding "in consequence of hearing that the police were acting without the authority of a magistrate." At the time, although it appeared that a slight degree of blame — for circumstances arising out of the heat of the moment — might be imputed to Mr. Sheil, yet I determined upon making no further investigation. But the desire manifested, as well on the part of Mr. Sheil as of others, induced me to grant the investigation. I must say, however, that the Noble Marquess makes attacks on those who are absent, which are neither proper to take place in debates in this House, nor consistent with the character of such an assembly.

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. —Name, name!

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.— I will name Mr. Drummond. The Noble Marquess, on a former occasion, described that gentleman as having been guilty of "equivocation," with respect to some papers; and was it right that, without any ground for it, the Noble Marquess should do this? Was it consistent with the character or credit of the House? The Noble Marquess is rather in the habit of indulging in loose statements, and this was an instance of that practice. The papers were missing in the early part of last year; search was made for them, and letters were written to many parties; and when they could not be found, copies of the minutes were furnished. Then, again, with respect to Mr. Sheil,—I do not think that the Noble Marquess has, any more, adopted the usual course of a Peer of Parliament, in speaking of him, than he has done when speaking of Mr. Drummond. The charge, indeed, was not in his speech in Parliament, but in his letters to the Government, in which he called upon them to prosecute Mr. Sheil under the Spirit Licence Act. The clause of the Act alluded to by the Noble Marquess refers only to persons "drinking, tippling, or gaming." The Noble Marquess specifically states that Mr. Sheil was at a tumultuous assembly; and it is not fair to Mr. Sheil to infer that he comes under the operation of that clause in the Spirit Licence Act.

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. — I never did mean to insinuate anything of the kind.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.— Without trespassing further on your Lordships' indulgence, I will only say that I feel bound not to consent to the appointment of the committee proposed.

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. — I shall detain your Lordships but a very short time in reply, because, as this is a subject resting upon evidence now on the table, and as the Noble Marquess has carefully avoided the whole of that, he has left me the less to say. I remember a Noble and Learned Lord, not now in his place, who once remarked that the best way of escaping from a case resting solely upon evidence, if it pinched, was to pass over that part altogether; a suggestion which the Noble Marquess now seems to have recollected and availed himself of.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

The Noble Marquess calls this a stale case; yet he cannot deny that when the first papers were produced, I brought it forward immediately. The Noble Marquess objected that that was not fair, as the papers were yet damp from the press; that so there is no pleasing him. The Noble Marquess assumes that the Government copy of the evidence must be correct, because Mr. Brooke took it down himself.

Digitized by Google

That would not have necessarily followed: but it so happens that Mr. Brooke did not take it, himself; but another person, who, if my proposal were agreed to, would correct it on his oath before a select committee. The Noble Marquess will persist in the truth of the evidence, that Mr. Sheil went to the public house, supposing that there was no magistrate with the police; and he now quotes Mr. Fitzsimon's evidence at page 35.; but the Noble Marquess carefully avoids referring to Mr. Fitzsimon's cross-examination upon that subject, p. 37., which is as follows:—

Witness is asked to point out in any part of his statement to the Government, where he says he went to Carberry's in consequence of having heard there was not a magistrate with the police.

Witness does not find such a cause stated there; but finds that he expressed his belief that the police were accompanied by a magistrate.

Did you hear it, or did you not hear it? — I distinctly heard it; that the police were on that evening acting without a magistrate.

From whom did you hear it? — I will not now undertake to state from whom I heard it.

Again, —

Witness does not recollect that the messenger said anything to witness, or in witness's presence, when he went to Sir Richard Nagle's lodgings.

And your Lordships will recollect that I have already quoted from Carberry's evidence, page 24., who was that identical messenger, "that he had left Major Rowan with the police at his mother's, when he went to Sir Richard Nagle's lodgings," — where Mr. Fitzsimon was, and went from, — he, who will not state who it was that told him there was not a magistrate with the police, nor from whom he heard it. On his own evidence the Noble Marquess is confuted.

The Noble Marquess, still avoiding the real subject now in dispute, refers to a former debate, in which he states that I attacked Mr. Drummond for equivocation. Now, I am free to own, some phrases are best omitted, on all occasions, in your Lordships' debates; and I should be sorry wantonly to wound the feelings of any absent person; but as to Mr. Drummond, the facts remain just the same; and the Noble Marquess cannot get rid of the difficulty by this counter attack. Mr. Drummond could not, by possibility, have sent my letter with the reports before the 11th of December, to the Irish Office in London; for my letter was not written until the 23d of December. The obvious inference is, that the reports did not go to London at all; more especially as we find, by Fitzgerald's evidence, that he had had them in the previous August, had kept them ever since, and had them in the succeeding June, when he was delivering his testimony.

The Noble Marquess has been pleased to accuse me of making loose statements. Let him look to his own statements, and see whether they are loose or not. Let him turn to Hansard's Debates, in Sir Richard Nagle's case, in 1835.

[Cries of "Order, order!"]

The Noble Marquess has made a grave accusation against me, and in this case it is hardly fair to confine me within the strict line of rule.

LORD HOLLAND. — I rise to order. If the Noble Marquess be allowed to produce reports of former debates, there will be no end to it.

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. — Well, then, I will not go so far back. Let the Noble Marquess remember his having coolly contradicted me when I had stated that he had released two persons from the gaol of Mullingar for most serious offences, without exacting any security from them to keep the peace. I knew the fact when I stated it, yet I had a second reference on that fact; and I then, in this House, repeated the circumstances, when the Noble Marquess was unable to say one word to them. So much for loose assertions. Now, my Lords, one word more, and I have done. The Noble Marquess still holds out upon my having intended to say Mr. Sheil had been drinking, because I contended he should have been prosecuted under the Spirit Licence Act. The correspondence which I have read to your Lordships is a sufficient answer to that assumption. Upon the whole, the Noble Marquess has made no defence whatever for having, as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, treated me most unfairly, for having, in execution of my duty as lieutenant of the county of Westmeath, served my Sovereign honestly against the Noble Lord's political partisans.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL.

The Order of the Day for the House resolving itself into a committee on this Bill having been read,—

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE said: — As your Lordships permitted the second reading of the measure to pass without explanation, you will, probably, expect some statement from me on the present occasion. The object of the Bill now on your Lordships' table, is to render perpetual a law that has been temporarily in force during the last two years. The Bill has been under trial; the experiment has proved successful; and I do not hesitate to say that it would be a great boon to the commercial interests of the country, if it were rendered permanent. Some time ago, inquiries were instituted for the purpose of ascertaining the expediency of renewing the charter of the Bank of England. One of the results of that inquiry left no doubt that a measure such as I now desire to see renewed, was a measure not only of justice and expediency, but almost of necessity. The Bank of England was accordingly relieved from the operation of the usury laws; and, in a year or two afterwards, it was thought to be only just and reasonable that the latitude afforded to the Bank of England should be extended to all other commercial bodies, and that they should enjoy similar facilities in the transaction of business. A Bill was introduced in the House of Commons, which came up to the Lords; and the Noble Duke opposite persuaded your Lordships to limit its operation to two years. That Bill became law. Bills of exchange are now discounted at rates exceeding 5 per cent.; and the experiment has proved not only harmless, but eminently beneficial: I therefore contend that it should not be a measure enacted and re-enacted from time to time, but that it should be embodied in the permanent legislation of the country. I say nothing of the bearing of the usury laws upon the landed interest; the object of the present measure is merely to remove a bar which operates to the disadvantage of the mercantile community. When your Lordships go into committee, I shall propose a clause extending the operation of the measure to collateral securities. India bonds, Exchequer bills, and other negotiable securities, are frequently lodged to guarantee the payment of the promissory notes given when loans are obtained. The deposit of these securities has, in the present state of the law, the effect of rendering a discount exceeding 5 per cent. illegal. Feeling that it is the duty of the Legislature to render all securities for money borrowed as perfect as possible, and to afford the borrowers every reasonable facility for making them as complete as circumstances permit, I shall certainly feel bound to submit to the committee the proposition to which I allude,—confidently believing, however, that it will meet with no opposition. I trust that your Lordships will not object to the principle of the measure before you; and, consequently, will allow the commerce of this great country to look, in times of need, for that assistance which it cannot now obtain.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON.—I am not so much opposed to the measure itself, as to its being made perpetual. My objection to its being made so is, that it holds out temptation for the commission of a vast number of frauds; many of which have come to my knowledge in consequence of the intercourse which I have had with a number of persons who are more liable to frauds than others,—I mean officers of the army and their families. Although, therefore, I am anxious that the Bill should pass, in order to relieve the public from any oppression lying upon the commerce of the country at this particular moment, yet I feel that the general profits of trade in this country cannot be expected to yield an interest of more than 5 or 5½ per cent.; and that your Lordships should not hold out to the public the permanent expectation of a higher rate of interest than that,—and enable those whose dealings have been fraudulent in intention to carry that fraudulent intention into execution, with respect to the unfortunate individuals to whom I refer. I think that your Lordships, therefore, may protect those persons from such misfortunes, while providing for that which it is said to be necessary that you should provide for at this present moment, with a view to the interests of commerce, and limit the duration of the Bill to the 1st of January, 1842. When your Lordships go into committee, I shall move an amendment to that effect.

The House then went into committee.

On the 1st clause being read,—

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE said:—I beg to move, that after "or any such bond or loan," the following words be added:—"or upon the security of any Exchequer bills, or of any public annuities, or of any India bonds, or South Sea stock."

LORD WYNFORD.—There is one point, here, with regard to which I am anxious to call the attention of your Lordships. By the present measure, after a Bill at twelve months becomes due, exorbitant usury may be charged; and unless some proviso be introduced to prevent this happening, young men in the army, and others, may be induced, when the first note is expired, to give another note, and so to be robbed on that to an exorbitant extent. I shall move a proviso to be added to this first clause, to prevent interest being paid on notes overdue at more than 5 per cent. after the first twelve months shall have expired. If this proviso be not added, cases of the most extravagant nature will occur. I know that it is usual for money lenders to lend money at very great amounts of interest; and, as the Bill now stands, they are still left at perfect liberty to do so.

Clause, as amended, was then proposed.

LORD WYNFORD. — I beg to move my amendment as a proviso to the first clause.

LORD ASHBURTON. — This is, undoubtedly, a question of considerable importance. I have been of opinion, for many years, that, if your Lordships were to pass a Bill to do away with all measures relating to the interest of money, money, like everything else, would find its level in the market. I agree with the Noble Duke in the view he has taken of the measure. I should further state, as a circumstance that ought to induce your Lordships to pause on this subject, and to give it some consideration, that, however desirable this measure may be in theory, it is in opposition to the practice of every other state on the face of the earth. There is no other country, either in Europe or in the New World, in which there is not some restriction, by law, on usury, except in the town of Hamburgh. This example of the experience and practice of mankind is an authority against having no restrictions on money lenders. If this Bill should pass, bills could be discounted at any rate of interest, though they might have twelve months to run. I hope that your Lordships will adopt the amendment proposed by the Noble Duke,—not at once to pass this measure, but to give it a little further time of probation,—inasmuch as it will not be a great inconvenience to the public to give that further time; and, upon the whole, it will be the right course to pursue. I have made inquiries among various classes of well-informed people, as to what has been the effect of the alteration in the usury laws. I believe that, as to its working, with respect to this country, the benefits have been very much overrated. I very much doubt that any practical good will arise from it. I am convinced that much increased confusion is created in the circulation of the country through the assistance given by the Bank. I doubt very much whether any increase of capital can be brought into the market by an increase of interest. My opinion is, that unfortunate persons, and persons reduced to great distress, would be induced to give great interest, if it were permitted them to do so. Whatever your Lordships may think of the measure, I do not consider it will contribute any considerable aid towards doing away with the distress which is supposed to exist. I have been informed by solicitors in town, that many usurious transactions have been opened; and, certainly, were it not for the pressure which is supposed to exist at this moment,—(for that would make me hesitate, in disposing of this question, to say anything which might tend to produce increased inconvenience, and perhaps injury), — or if this Bill had come before the House in quiet times, when the question could have been more safely discussed, I should have moved that it be sent to a committee up-stairs, and there I could produce some information which would surprise your Lordships. I am told that very extensive usury is now commonly obtained; and that this greater facility of raising money on usurious terms has vastly increased the number of improvident young men. For these reasons, my desire is that the measure should be temporary, rather than permanent. This would give further time to perfect an inquiry into the operation of the relaxation of the usury laws. Leaving it, then, to others to discuss what are the causes of the present state of things in the money market, and leaving it to the Noble Viscount at the head of the Government to consider whether the Bank of England has acted right in the late transactions; — leaving these subjects, I will only say that I believe that, by the exercise of a little common sense, and a little of that prudence which the people of this country always apply under their difficulties, the present unfavourable state of affairs may be expected speedily to right itself. I certainly shall vote for the motion of the Noble Duke.

The LORD CHANCELLOR. — With regard to the amendment of the Noble and Learned Lord (Lord Wynford), I would observe that the effect of it is perfectly unattainable. The effect of it would be, that a party, not bringing his bill within the circumstances allowed by my Noble and Learned Friend's proposition, would cause to be issued an illegal instrument. A bill being a negotiable security, who can say which of those presented to him is legal? So that the effect of the amendment would be, not only to vitiate those bills to which it applies, but all others. I conceive, therefore, that your Lordships cannot entertain the motion of the Noble and Learned Lord. But I beg to call attention to the ground on which it has been urged that the measure would operate prejudicially to parties pressed for money. A party has raised a sum of money, by bill, at 5 per cent. At the expiration of the period to which it is to run, he finds he cannot pay it, — not from any fault of his own, but because, from the change in the value of money, it cannot be had on the same security. The holder of the bill may be willing to trust him, but not at the same interest as that at which the money was originally borrowed. But if he were bound by law to provide payment for the bill, and yet were precluded from raising it by paying a higher rate of interest to the holder, he would naturally go next door, and procure the money at 8, 10, or 12 per cent., for the purpose of meeting the Bill. Extortion will be sometimes practised, under any bill system that can be devised. The only question is, how it can be most effectually restrained. In this country, and in this town, as in all countries and all great towns, if one man have money which he wishes to turn to profit, and another must needs have money, at any rate, to supply his wants, the parties will deal with one another on some terms or other; and a bargain advantageous to the monied man will be struck, because the borrower will have the money if he can get it. Now, by this Bill, a party will be enabled to borrow money at a higher rate than 5 per cent.; but if the law were against such borrowing, what would be the effect? Why, the lender must and would lend at a greater rate, because he has to indemnify himself against the risk of detection in a breach of the law, over and above the ordinary risk of losing his money. The interest he would charge would, therefore, be proportionably higher; or, if not, he would insure the life of the borrower, at his expense. The more pressure, therefore, that there is applied to the business of lending, and the more severely high interest is prohibited, the less is the benefit derived from the loan by the borrower. I cannot conceive a state of things in which making 5½ per cent. discount legal could have a burdensome or oppressive effect on the party borrowing. The easier and lighter the transaction is made, the less the party borrowing would have to pay.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON. — I am most desirous that the House should not extend this power of discounting bills at a higher rate of interest than the usual rate, for more than two years, or thereabout. I wish this, with a view to put upon their guard people who, having money, are liable to extortion. I have met with instances of sufferers in this way, who have been led to believe that the profits of trade reach the same per centage in general. I say two years, because I think that that is the period for which the measure may be wanted by the state of trade in this country.

LORD WYNFORD. — After what has fallen from my Noble and Learned Friend who fills the woolsack, I have no objection to withdraw my proposition.

On the question, on "the proviso limiting the duration of the measure till 1842," being put, —

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE said: — I certainly think that the experience of the last two years affords a better reason for making this a permanent law, than for our having recourse to temporary expedients from time to time. Of course I should agree to the Noble Duke's proposition, if I could see the necessity of putting people upon their guard as to their own interests, or of teaching them the value of money. If money lenders be prevented from lending money at the market rate of interest at the time, they will, in consequence, go all the further in extortion; and thus the borrower will be obliged to pay, not only for the risk of loss, but for all the additional charge which the resort to all sorts of subtleties, induced by the state of the law, may prompt the lender to demand. I certainly cannot consent to the amendment.

SHIP PROPELLER COMPANY BILL.

Mr. Cayley having moved that the Bill be read a second time,—

Mr. BROTHERTON said: — I rise to oppose this Bill, because I consider it to be a measure that is extremely injurious to a most worthy individual. The short facts of the case are these: — About five years ago, letters patent were obtained by a gentleman named Bennet Woodcroft, for an invention of which the object of the present Bill is to deprive him. I hope, therefore, that the House will not lend its sanction to a company having such an object. The invention, for which Mr. Smith has obtained a patent, is precisely the same as that which was patented by Charles Cameron about ten years ago; it will therefore be impossible to support the validity of Smith's patent. Under such circumstances, looking upon the Bill as a means for upholding an invalid patent, I shall move that it be read a second time this day three months.

Mr. CAYLEY. — I beg to say that I have no connection whatever with the company. The House has probably already heard of the application of the Archimedian screw to steam vessels, a discovery which I understand has been investigated by many naval men, and the Board of Admiralty, who have all expressed themselves favourably of the invention. It does not interfere in any way with Mr. Woodcroft's patent; and even if it did, this House is no tribunal to try the merits of the two inventions. Parties have subscribed a large sum for the purpose of obtaining the present Bill and of establishing a company; and if there be any undue interference with Mr. Woodcroft's patent, he has his remedy in another court.

SIR C. BURRELL. — I readily consent to the second reading of this Bill, because I believe the invention will be a great improvement in the navigation of the river, as by it all swell is done away with, and the consequent danger to small craft, and loss of life, avoided. I do not profess to know much about the invention; but, from what I have heard of it, I have no doubt it will be found to be a decided improvement upon the present system.

Mr. BROTHERTON. — I am prepared to prove, if the House will allow me, that the present plan is inferior to that of Mr. Woodcroft, and that the Lords of the Admiralty have given Mr. Woodcroft a written opinion that they consider his invention an "ingenious improvement" upon the screw propeller.

Digitized by Google

Mr. BENETT. — I do not see that this House has anything to do with the merits of rival patents. I understand that there are two existing patents for the application of the Archimedian screw to steam vessels. The present company has purchased the other, and rejected Mr. Woodcroft's patent; and hence the opposition of that Gentleman to the present Bill.

Mr. BROTHERTON. — I am instructed by Mr. Woodcroft to say that his patent has never been offered to the Ship Propeller Company. However, as the sense of the House appears to be against the amendment, I shall withdraw it.

RETURNS.

East India Company. — On the motion of Mr. CRAWFORD, Accounts ordered —

Of all moneys supplied from the revenues of India, since the Return made to the order of the House of the 12th day of December, 1837, towards the payment of expenses in England chargeable on those revenues, particularising, as before, monthly and annually:

Digitized by Google

1. The amount of bills drawn by the Court of Directors on the several Governments of India, in separate accounts of each Presidency, for moneys paid into the London Treasury of the East India Company, with the rates of exchange at which such bills were issued:

2. The amount of remittances, in separate accounts, made by the several Governments of India, and by the East India Company's agents in China, to the Court of Directors; specifying the dates of remittances as advised in the registers received from India, and the dates when the same were received into the London Treasury; whether the due payment of those remittances were protected by the hypothecation of goods, or by any other security, with the rates of exchange at which such remittances were made:

3. Amount of bills drawn by the East India Company's agents in China, on the several Governments of India, with the rates of exchange at which such bills were issued at Canton:

Also, an account of remittances received from India or China, since the last Return, in silk, or any other description of goods, specifying the invoice cost in Indian currency, and in British sterling money, with a statement, if sold, of the nett proceeds realised in London:

Also, an account of any remittances received into the London Treasury of the East India Company, in repayment of advances made in India on account of her Majesty's Government; and also made applicable towards the payment of expenses in England, chargeable on the revenues in India.

CANADA.

Mr. PAKINGTON. — I wish to ask the Under Secretary for the Colonies whether the Government have received any further information from Canada, by the late arrivals, respecting the Clergy Reserves Bill, which has been passed by the Legislature of Upper Canada? As difficulties are understood to have arisen with regard to that Bill, I wish to ask the Right Honourable Gentleman what is the nature of those difficulties? whether they are likely to be removed? and when it is the intention of her Majesty's Ministers to lay that Bill before the two Houses of Parliament, as directed by the Act of 1791?

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — No further information has yet been received from Canada on the subject. Her Majesty's Ministers are not yet informed whether or not the Address to the Governor of Upper Canada, required by the Act of 1791 in such cases, has been voted by the Legislature of that province; and of course no further step can be taken, here, until that point be ascertained. But a subsequent question has also arisen, — namely, whether the form of the Bill in question, by which the Imperial Parliament is empowered to deal with the clergy reserves under certain restrictions, is strictly constitutional? When any further information is received from Canada on this subject, I shall be happy to communicate it to the Honourable Gentleman.

SUPPLY — NATIONAL EDUCATION.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of Supply (Mr. Bernal in the chair), —

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said: — Having already explained my views with respect to the grant which I propose to move for, and which is to be applied to the purposes of education, I do not think it necessary to enter upon the general question. The objections which have been taken, or which may be taken, to the proposition of the Government relative to education, rest on a great principle, which was fully discussed before the Speaker left the chair. It may be contended, that education ought to be left entirely in the hands of the established church, and that the state ought not in any way to contribute, by a grant of the public money, to place education in the hands of any other persons than the members of that church. That, however, is not now the point at issue. The question now is, whether the House will consent to grant the sum of 30,000*l.* for the purposes of education, or altogether refuse that grant? — for that is the proposition which the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth has declared it to be his intention to move.

[Cries of "No, no!"]

I certainly understood that to be the Right Honourable Gentleman's proposition; and that the ground of his objection was, that the money, instead of being placed at the disposal of the Board of Treasury, is to be placed in the hands of a board composed of the members of the Privy Council. I must confess that I cannot see any good ground for that objection. I can understand the great argument, that the state ought not to encourage any doctrine not taught by the established church, and that we ought not to encourage, by a parliamentary grant, the propagation of any system of education not founded on the tenets of that church; — I can understand that argument; and if it be one upon which Honourable Gentlemen opposite are agreed, I think it is full time that they should assert the principle, and refuse to consent to any grant which is not to be placed at the disposal of the church. But, with respect to the question, whether the sum to be voted by Parliament ought to be placed at the disposal of a board composed of members of the Privy Council, or a board composed of members of the Treasury? it does not appear to me to constitute any ground for refusing that vote, to say, that the fund to be voted ought to be placed at the disposal of the Treasury. Indeed, I think it would have been a better argument, if the reasoning of Honourable Gentlemen opposite had gone the other way. Suppose that there had been a Committee of the Privy Council; that the grant for the purposes of education had been formerly placed at the disposal of that committee; and that a proposition had been made to change the Committee of Privy Council for a committee of members of the Treasury; — then I think Honourable Gentlemen opposite would have had tolerable grounds for objecting to that change. They might, in such a case, have said that the Board of Treasury had other and more important duties to attend to; and that such a board could not be so efficient as a Board of Privy Council, established solely to distribute the grants made by Parliament for the purposes of education. If Honourable Gentlemen opposite had objected to a board composed of members of the Treasury, they might have made a tolerable argument; but when the change is the other way, it does seem to me an extraordinary assumption, on the part of Honourable Gentlemen opposite, to suppose that the Government can give implicit credence to the statement, that the real objection against this vote rests simply on the ground of the transfer of the power of disposing of it from the Treasury to a board of members of the Privy Council.

Such is not, then, the real ground of the objection which has been taken to this vote. The objection really is, that Honourable Gentlemen, opposite, entertain a strong and conscientious opinion that no grant should be made by Parliament for the education of the children of Great Britain, on any principle, or on any system, not approved and sanctioned by the established church. They object to any grant for education that is not given by the church, or in accordance with the doctrines taught by that church. That is the real objection to the vote. On the principle upon which that objection rests, I have already stated my opinion,—and I shall not trouble the House with a repetition of it; but I beg to bring before the House the fact, that the difficulty which has now arisen appeared at an early period after the formation of the two societies,—namely, the British and Foreign School Society, and the National School Society, — which have undertaken to promote the education of the people by voluntary contribution. Joseph Lancaster, with great industry and great success, undertook the formation of schools, in which the chief object was to provide education for the poor at a cheap rate. That gentleman was a member of the Society of Friends, and those who supported his schemes were either members of the same denomination of Christians, or Protestant Dissenters; and they, in consequence, laid it down as a necessary condition that the children of all sects should be admitted into the schools. It was laid down as a rule, that the children of Protestant Dissenters, of Roman Catholics, and of members of the established church, should all alike be admitted, and on the same terms. For the schools so formed George III. sent the sum of 100*l.* to Joseph Lancaster, with the purpose of enabling him to extend the benefit to them. Indeed, at the first establishment of them, several members of the Royal Family contributed to their support, and took a share in their management. Not alone George III., but Queen Charlotte, the Prince of Wales, and their Royal Highnesses the Dukes of Kent, Cambridge, and Sussex, all took an active part in the same work. At that time it was generally agreed that Christians of all classes should be enabled to send their children to those schools. There was no insuperable objection to such an arrangement. After a time, however, those who differed from this opinion separated from the society which had been formed by Joseph Lancaster, and set up the national schools, under the name of "National School Society," in connection with the church; and in the records of the British and Foreign School Society I find a correspondence which subsequently took place with a view of uniting the two institutions. Both had branches at Canterbury, in which children were educated under their respective regulations; and the friends of the British and Foreign School Society agreed, at a general meeting, to present an Address to his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, as president of the diocesan school, with a view to effect a junction of the two schools, upon the principle that Roman Catholics, Protestants, and Dissenters should be admitted, without obliging the children to repeat the Church Catechism, or to attend any church but that which their friends were desirous they should attend. His Royal Highness the Duke of Kent was requested to become the medium of communication with the most reverend prelate. This was in the year 1813. His Royal Highness accordingly wrote to his Grace, stating that his Grace might rely on his most zealous exertions, in conjunction with those of the society, to promote the cause of education among the poor, which he knew his Grace had so much at heart.

Such were the opinions of the Duke of Kent, who has ever been a warm friend to the British and Foreign School Society. The answer of the Archbishop was to the effect that the diocesan school of Canterbury was united with the National Institution, and subject to the same rules which governed that society. Among them was one which required that all children should be instructed in the liturgy and in the catechism of the established church; and he therefore humbly submitted to his Royal Highness that, under these circumstances, it was impossible for him to admit the adoption of the Lancasterian system. From that time, this effort at reconciliation having failed, each has gone on upon its own principles. What, then, is now proposed? It is proposed that a Committee of the Privy Council shall be formed, with a view of applying to these two societies the greater part of the funds voted by Parliament for the purposes of education; but it is also proposed that the committee shall not refuse to receive applications for aid from poorer districts, where education is much wanted. Neither is it laid down by the proposition which I have submitted, that we shall altogether exclude other schools, because such schools may not belong to either the British and Foreign School Society or National Society. It is upon these grounds, therefore, that I now ask the House to grant this vote. It appears to me, that the principle which the Government has laid down is the one most likely to obtain the support of a great number of the people, and that principle is the one on which the British and Foreign School Society has acted. The object of that society is to teach the Scriptures during the week, and to allow the children of each sect to go to their own peculiar places of worship, to receive instruction in religion from the teachers of their own sect. Such are the principles upon which the Government propose to act, and which I think are more just than the principles of those who hold the opinion that no school should be supported or encouraged by the state, unless in connection with the established church. I do not mean to say that such is the opinion held by the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire, or by the Right Honourable Gentleman the Member of Tamworth; but I believe it to be the opinion of a considerable portion of Honourable Gentlemen opposite. The Right Honourable Baronet gave me a lecture the other evening upon the danger of open questions. Now, I do not mean to deny that there may be those dangers which the Right Honourable Baronet, who has had much experience on the subject, pointed out upon that occasion; but still there may be a question whether, if there be any difference of opinion existing amongst a party, it is not as well to avow it at once, and to say, "We do hold different opinions,"—instead of attempting, by means of a vote on some incidental matter, to conceal that difference of opinion? I do not mean to say that the Noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire, or the Honourable Gentleman the Member for Newark, has asserted opinions which either of them does not conscientiously entertain, or that he will be wanting in sustaining those opinions; but, however that may be, I must say that the opinions they have expressed are entirely at variance with those of the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire and of the Right Honourable Gentleman the Member for Tamworth. Therefore, although this may not be an open question on the other side of the House, it may be well to consider whether we ought to put the whole education of the country in the hands of the established church, or adopt the principle which has been acted upon by the British and Foreign School Society,—which has been supported by George III. and his Royal Highness the Duke of Kent,—and which is also the principle for which the Government now contend. I move, Sir, "That it is the opinion of this committee, that a sum, not exceeding 30,000*l.*, be granted to her Majesty, for public education in Great Britain, in the year 1839."

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON.—I feel it my duty to meet the motion of the Noble Lord with a direct negative; and, in doing so, I should not have thought it necessary, but for what fell from the Noble Lord at the commencement of his speech, to explain that my objections, and the objections of other Honourable Members on this side of the House, do not apply, in the slightest degree, to any grant for education conducted upon proper principles, and tending to a right direction. I could scarcely have conceived that the Noble Lord could have so utterly misunderstood, or so unjustly misrepresented, the sentiments of my Honourable Friends. Let the Noble Lord put us to the test. Let him move for the same grant as last year, or for even a much larger grant, conducted on the same principles, — and he will then ascertain what the opinion of this side of the House is upon that point. I call upon the Noble Lord to put us to that vote, and not to forget — what he seems to have forgotten — that it was most expressly stated by my Noble Friend (Lord Stanley), that his main objection was, not to the transfer of the grant to the Privy Council, but to the alteration in the principle of its application. If the Noble Lord will propose such a vote, I think I can venture to promise that there is not a Member on this side of the House who will not give it his full and cordial support. But if the Noble Lord will not take that course, — if he tell us that the vote of 30,000*l.*, which he now proposes, is to be conducted and confirmed upon the principle of the minute of the 3d of June, — if I find that that minute of the 3d of June contains within itself the power of reviving the former minute of the 13th of April, — if I also find these two minutes closely connected together, — and if, on the other hand, the forms of the House preclude me from bringing forward a vote on the principle of last year, — then I repeat that I have no alternative, and it becomes my duty to oppose the vote now before the House. Throughout the whole debate of last week, aspersions, similar to that just now uttered by the Noble Lord, have been cast upon the zeal of Honourable Gentlemen on this side of the House in the cause of education. The Honourable Member for Liskeard went so far as to say that the whole of this side of the House was opposed to all education of the people; and the Honourable and Learned Member for the Tower Hamlets, a learned judge, thought fit to pass sentence against us on this point; but he gave judgment in a way, I hope, unlike that in which he is accustomed to give judgment elsewhere, — namely, without hearing the evidence. Have those Honourable Members looked to the lists of endowments and subscriptions for schools emanating from Members on the Opposition side of the House? Recurring to what is done in the cause of practical education by Honourable Gentlemen around me, I must say, without meaning any disparagement of the exertions of Honourable Gentlemen on the other side of the House, that my Honourable Friends need not shrink from the comparison. These are the real practical proofs of zeal. I respect the man who gives 50*l.* to a school, or spends several hours a-day in superintending it, much more than the man who merely gives his support to a minute of the Board of Education, or enrols his name as the member of some society; more especially when I remember that such minute goes not to the maintenance of sound religious education, because I consider it indispensable that intellectual enlightenment should go hand in hand with religious instruction. I remember a remark of Rousseau, who says that there is many a man who will express philanthropic views when a case is related about the Tartars or the Chinese, who yet will button up his pocket if a beggar pass his door. If we do not combine religious instruction with literary education, we shall do worse than if we left the people uneducated. If you give a man no education at all, you leave him an ignorant boor; but if you give him education without religion, in many instances you make him a dexterous knave; and, at all events, you do not fit him for the right discharge of many of the most important personal and relative duties which will devolve upon him. I will read to the House, in connection with this subject, some important statistics collected by M. Guerry, who states that, in the department of Finisterre only 14 in 100, and in Morbihan only 15 in 100, of the male adult population can read and write. In three of the departments forming the ancient province of Berry, the proportion is only 13 in 100. These are precisely among the departments in which crimes against the person are most rare. Crimes against property, too, are much less numerous. In Finisterre, only 1 person out of 29,000, on an average, was convicted of any crime against the person; in La Creuse, only 1 in 37,000. On the other hand, in the department of Du Doubs, on the frontiers of Switzerland, which stands as second on the list of educated departments, and where no less that 73 in 100 can read and write, 1 out of every 11,000, on an average, has been convicted of crime. In the department Du Haute Rhin, in like manner, 71 out of every 100 can read and write, but 1 out of every 7000 is convicted of crime. Is it my intention to deduce from these statements any argument against education in general? Certainly not. But they show that, where utilitarian knowledge is made the first object, religious knowledge is wholly neglected; that where, as in France, the higher ranks are accustomed to entertain sceptical and irreverent feelings with regard to religion, there the seeds of evil are sown amongst the people, and no good harvest can be expected.

Without religion, education is rather an evil than a benefit; and what security is there that, by the plan of the Noble Lord, religious education would be promoted?

Now, if the House will grant me its indulgence, I will attempt to show that, in these requisites, the Government plan is deficient. While that plan professes to extend popular education, it will discourage the plans already in operation, and check the exertions now making to educate the people by means of private benevolence; and, in the next place, it fails to provide any safeguard for religious education. The Government plan of education is comprehended in the Treasury minute of the 3d of June, which, I find, referred to the former minute of the 13th of April; the latter is not abandoned, for the words are, — "The plan is postponed until a greater concurrence of opinion is found to prevail." Who is to be the judge of that greater concurrence? The very cessation of excitement might be construed into a feeling of greater concurrence by some. Some few articles in a newspaper, — some few petitions like that presented, the other night, from Scarborough, about which so much noise was made, but which afterwards turned out to have been signed by only twenty-five persons, — might sufficiently appease Ministerial scruples. There is no security that the plan will not be resumed, so long as it is not abandoned, but only postponed. I have a right, in considering this subject, to take into account the Treasury minute of the 13th of April, as much as that of the 3d of June, as forming a part of the Government plan. How would the House consider the subject, if any civil right were proposed to be invaded, and the plan were postponed only, and not abandoned? What would the Noble Lord think, if, as in the case of his great ancestor when suffering under the tyranny of Charles II., a Bill were brought in, abolishing the trial by jury, — and on a great disturbance being thereupon excited, it was not withdrawn, but postponed? Would not the prospect of its revival be hailed with greater scorn than its first proposition? Postponement would not, in that case, be esteemed any security; and why should it in this? I find that the system of proportional grants is to be discontinued. Under the existing plan, great advantage is derived by the people, not merely from the sum granted from the public Treasury, but from a much larger sum which it elicits from the hands of private benevolence. The National Society, for instance, has received 12,000*l.* from the Government; and that amount has called forth no less than 222,000*l.* in voluntary contributions. Not only will the proposed plan tend to check that benevolence, but it will open the door to all kinds of irregular applications. With what confidence can the Noble Lord go on with that plan? Is it a light thing for him to attempt to force it on the country, with a majority of five only in this House in its favour, and with an overwhelming majority out of the House against it? Let the Noble Lord have the very best plan that can be devised, — let it be as free from objection as is desirable, — he cannot force it on the country while it is unwilling to receive it, and has no confidence in it. The best laws would be rendered inoperative, if they had nothing but force to recommend them. Look at the case of the reforms of Joseph II. The hostility called forth against them was not so much directed against the reforms, themselves, as against the attempt to force them upon the people, against their opinions and feelings, by the hand of despotic authority. I object to the division of education into general and special, — because it must either lead to a total indifference to all religion, and general infidelity, as it has done on the Continent, or it must lead to interminable controversies amongst the parents of the children. The children must either be allowed to lapse into perfect indifference, or they must be warned, day by day, against conversion from one system to another. I entertain the strongest objection to the introduction of different versions of the Scriptures into the National School. I believe the introduction of the Douay Bible cannot stand alone. If it be granted to the Roman Catholics, on what ground can we exclude the version of the Unitarian? If the permission be granted to one, it should be granted to all. When I consider that this regulation applies, not merely to all the schools, but to the model school also, then I confess my alarm and apprehension are increased, and my belief is, that the plan of the Noble Lord affords no security for religious instruction. The Noble Lord has, this evening, declared, that he believes the object of Honourable Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House is, to give the church the ascendancy in the matter of national education. That doctrine has not been asserted from this side of the House. The Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire did not assert it; and my Right Honourable Friend the Member for Tamworth expressly renounced it. It is not fair, then, to impute such a wish to this side of the House, when we do not entertain it. What we object to is, a plan for withdrawing from the control of the church those schools which are connected with her. Nothing could be more injurious than to introduce a system for preventing the clergy of the established church from having the superintendence of their own schools. I have rather anxiously watched how the Honourable Gentlemen from Ireland have treated this subject. I understood the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin to say that he did not think there could be any great objection to the clergy visiting the schools, but that they ought to be placed under a Central Board composed of laymen.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — No, no!

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON. — I so understood the Honourable and Learned Gentleman. I will quote an authority upon this point, which I think will have some weight with Honourable Gentlemen from Ireland. About four years ago, a Select Committee on Education was appointed on the motion of the Honourable Member for Waterford, who did me the honour to nominate me on that committee. Before that committee, there was examined the Rev. Dr. Wiseman, the principal of the English Roman Catholic College at Rome, — undoubtedly an acute and able man, — and to his evidence I beg to call the attention of the House; because it is very remarkable, that, whilst the Roman Catholic Members opposite are calling out and objecting against the clergy of the Church of England having the superintendence over the schools limited to the members of their communion, and prefer the superintendence of a general board of laymen, — by the system practised in the Papal states, there is not a single layman employed either in the Central Board or in the rural schools dependent on that board. Here is the evidence of Dr. Wiseman. He was asked, —

There is a superintending Board of Education in the Roman states, is there not? — There is the congregation, as it is called, appointed to superintend the system of education throughout the states. Are there any laymen upon that? — The congregation is composed entirely of ecclesiastics. Must the schoolmaster necessarily be a clergyman? — I am not aware of any law requiring it; but I do not think I know of any instance to the contrary in rural schools. By whom are the schools for females generally conducted? — In every village there are generally two matrons supplied by a sort of semi-religious order in Rome, called the Maestre Pie, who have a house in Rome, from which they are sent out to the respective villages.

Now, I really think that this fact ought to show Honourable Members opposite that those on our side of the House are not so unreasonable in the principle we advocate. But it has been said that the results of the system pursued in other continental countries are in favour of the proposed Government scheme. I do not think that the assertion of the successful results of the mixed system of education has been made with a full knowledge of the facts. In Prussia, the system of joint education has been tried in several districts, and found to fail; and I believe that, under the system now acted upon throughout that country, there is not a single school which is not in connection with some church or other. It is true that an instance has been given of one school in Switzerland; but that instance is by no means applicable to the proposed system, neither does it bear any analogy to the schools in other parts of Switzerland, with respect to which I wish to direct the attention of the House to another part of the evidence taken before the committee to which I have already alluded, — I mean the evidence of Dr. Bowring. Dr. Bowring was examined as to the state of education in Switzerland; and a newly framed code for the schools in the canton of Thurgovia was produced, to which much importance and value seemed to be attached. The committee examined Dr. Bowring as to how far the Protestants and Romanists were educated in the same schools. The chairman asked him, —

Are the Protestants and Catholics educated entirely together? is the religious instruction given together with intellectual? — It is rather uncommon to find, in Switzerland, a district which is not principally occupied by the partisans of one or the other of the great religious sects. In general, there are Catholic villages and Protestant villages; and from that natural sympathy which exists between individuals of the same religious opinions, there is a tendency among strangers to settle among those whose religious opinions are the same as their own.

I then put the following question to Dr. Bowring: —

As to the Roman Catholics and the Protestants, the practical point would be, how religious instruction is managed in those schools where Catholic and Protestant come together. One of your recent answers rather tended to show that such cases were not common, because whole villages are mostly of the same persuasion; but if there are cases in which they do intermix, how is the point of religious instruction managed?

Now, let the committee observe the answer of Dr. Bowring to that question. He said, —

I confess it is a question I never asked, because I am in the habit of dislocating inquiries of this sort from any investigation into religious opinions. I have looked through the law of public instruction of the canton of Thurgovia, which I have now before me; and I do not see, from beginning to end, any reference to the religious opinions either of children or parents.

In that last point, however, Dr. Bowring was wholly mistaken as to the fact; for I afterwards called his attention to the 68th article of that very law. It enacts, that —

Parents who are prevented by the great distance of their residence, or by the inaccessible state of the roads, from sending their children into the school of that religious persuasion to which their place of abode is ascribed, may receive from the Commissioners of Education the permission of sending their children to a school nearer to their residence, if belonging to the other religious persuasion. In granting that permission, the commissioners are to take care the school be not overcrowded.

This article evidently shows in the canton of Thurgovia a general system of prohibition, or, at least, discouragement, of Protestants and Roman Catholics being educated in the same school, — allowing only particular exceptions on account of vicinage. On the whole, I am of opinion, that whether regard is had to the state and condition of things at home, or to the system of education practised abroad, there will be found great reason to distrust the proposal now brought forward by the Noble Lord opposite for the adoption of Parliament. If, then, I am asked in what manner I think the national education ought to be conducted in this country, — if I am asked, not merely to point out the defects in the system now proposed, but also to show how the public education could be conducted on safe and proper principles, — I would answer by pointing to the immense improvements which have taken place in education since the commencement of this century, and especially within the last twenty years, through the exertions of the National and the British and Foreign School Societies. Looking to the results, both in this and other countries, — looking to the great amount of religious differences in this kingdom, — I must say, it appears to me that the system which best promises success, is that which has heretofore been pursued. I wish the National School Society to continue in its career, developing education with the same amount of assistance it formerly received from the Government. I wish the British and Foreign School Society to continue its career, receiving the same assistance as heretofore; and taking the two societies together, I must say that, under the present circumstances of the country, such a course would be best calculated for the development of practical education throughout the empire. Indeed, the only difficulty which encumbers this question is that put forth in the second minute, — namely, with respect to the poor districts, in which there are no contributions raised from private sources, and, consequently, no share allowed of the public grants from the Treasury; and which districts, therefore, remain destitute of education. I admit that such cases occur, and I also admit that they ought to be provided for. But could anything be easier than to provide a remedy for this defect without departing from the existing system? Let grants be made to the National, and British and Foreign Societies, for the purpose of enabling them to assist districts from which there come no local contributions — let the Government give that sort of aid, only guarding against favour being shown to any sectarian body. To an extension of the general grant for such a purpose, I am sure, all on this side of the House would give the fullest and most cordial support. But the case is different when you propose to give additional powers to Government; and when that Government explicitly states it will not be bound by any rule of proportion, or within the limits of these societies. As to the exercise of discretion, I have no confidence that, under the proposed system, the board would dispense the funds with discretion: I contend that the system ought to be guarded by the allotment of fixed and certain proportions, so as to put the present or successive Government beyond the suspicion of undue partiality. But, Sir, the principle which, after great consideration, I have come to the conclusion that it would be best to adopt, is that of the minute of August, 1839; and I must inquire why that principle has been departed from? I admit that those principles may not look as well on paper as the proposition for a Central Board, regulated by a uniform system, and having schools branching from it all over the country; but they will work infinitely better. If I were to point out what appears to me the great fault which arises out of modern legislation, it is, that Parliament is constantly endeavouring to apply uniformity and centralisation to conditions of circumstances essentially different from one another, in attempting to apply the same franchise and regulations to opposite states of society; — for instance, — to direct the same principle to small towns as to large populous cities — to the sheep-walks of Northumberland as to the factories of Lancashire. The real question, now for consideration, is, how to turn the greatest number of persons into a right principle of education, and to inculcate a knowledge of religion and the practice of virtue. The proposed system, however good in theory, affords no security that in practice it will produce these results. I fully admit that, in considering any system of education, the church has no right to claim the superintendence over the instruction of the children of Dissenters. On the other hand, I claim, with equal firmness, that the church — which of late years has made such meritorious exertions in the furtherance of education — shall not be slighted or set aside by any new project propounded to Parliament. The opponents of the proposed scheme on the part of the church join most heartily in the demand for intellectual light; they have no fear for the citadel of truth, unless the enemy, like the Gauls of old, can surprise it in the dark —

Defensi tenebris et dono noctis opacæ.

But then we have a right to ask that the state should not hang out false lights, — that it should not, like the coastmen of Cornwall, in former days, place its lights on shoals and quicksands, — lights that, instead of guiding the wanderer to his haven, serve only to bewilder and destroy him. If the principle for which I contend is departed from, I believe that no satisfaction will be afforded to the people. We tell the promoters of the scheme that they have confounded two things that are essentially distinct; we tell them that it is one thing to show all possible forbearance and kindly feeling to those who walk, as I believe, in error; and it is quite another thing to protect and propagate the error itself. It is one thing to tell the Roman Catholics — for they, after all, are at the bottom of the system — that perfect equality of civil rights should be granted to them in spite of their religious differences; and another thing, to tell them that those differences are now mere trifles, and ought not to stand in the way of a united state education. From my very early years I have been a supporter of what has been termed Roman Catholic emancipation. I have made some sacrifices to that opinion. I differed from my family upon it; and, rather than compromise my own views upon that subject, I preferred remaining out of Parliament for several years; nor did I enter it until 1830, the year after that question was carried. I claim no merit for my conduct on that occasion; for I acted only as every other Member, in my place, would have done. But still I am entitled to say that I have shown myself as ready to support the claims of the Roman Catholics, when I thought them just, as I am to stand firm against them, now, when I think them encroaching and iniquitous. And if the views on education, which I have now set forth, seem to Honourable Gentlemen opposite, as they have said, narrow-minded and illiberal, I have the satisfaction of remembering that they did not seem so to Mr. Wilberforce, — they did not seem so to Lord Somers, — they did not seem so to Locke. Nay, more, if I wished to characterise the system now proposed in a few expressive words, I know not where I could find any more apt or appropriate than in the language of a greater man than any even of those I have just mentioned, — the prince of modern philosophers, and the pride of human wisdom, — Lord Bacon; who, in one of his best Essays, says, —

Contrariwise, certain Laodiceans and lukewarm persons think they may accommodate points of religion by middle ways, and taking part of both, and witty reconcilements, as if they would make an arbitrement between God and man . . . There are also two false peaces or unities — the one when the peace is grounded but upon an implicit ignorance, for all colours will agree in the dark; the other, when it is pieced up upon a direct admission of contraries in fundamental points. For truth and falsehood in such things are like the iron and clay in the toes of Nebuchadnezzar's image, they may cleave, but they will not incorporate.

On all these grounds which I have urged on the committee, I trust that it will not consent to the system proposed by the Noble Lord opposite (Lord John Russell). I trust that the committee will weigh well the numerous petitions which have been laid on the table of the House, — petitions not coming from any particular place, not emanating from any single sect, but speaking the universal opinions of the people; I trust that Honourable Members, on coming to a vote, to-night, will not overlook the circumstances that the proposed scheme has, so far, been forced by a small majority against the wishes of the people; I trust that the voice of the people, which has been heard on this subject with no common emphasis, will not pass unheeded, and that their representatives will not tamely consent to that which the constituencies have indignantly resented, but will show that the views of the majority of the House are in conformity with those of the majority of the people.

Mr. BAINES. — Sir, as it has been my lot to sit, for two successive Sessions of Parliament, upon school committees, to inquire into the practicability of establishing a system of national education — and as I have devoted much time to the consideration of the subject of that education — I find it to be impossible for me to give a silent vote on this question; but I shall not trespass at any great length on the attention of the House. The Noble Lord, in the observations which he has addressed to the House, has confounded two things essentially different: he supposed that the plan of education which the Government proposed in the minute of Council, of the date of April the 10th, was identical with the plan proposed on the 3d of June. Sir, I take them to be very different; and I am ready to admit that the plan of the 10th of April was open to considerable objection. I felt the force of those objections, and stated them both in public and private. That plan, however, has since been altered, to obviate the objections then urged against it. The Noble Lord seems to think that the present plan is open to the same objections as the former one; but I deny this to be the case. I would ask whether it was not a part of the original plan, that a chaplain of the establishment should be appointed to the normal school? and whether a second minister, of some dissenting denomination, was not also to attend to give instruction? and, in addition to this, I say they might have had the attendance of a clergyman of the Roman Catholic persuasion at the school, who must have been introduced as a part of the system, for the purpose of carrying this plan into effect? In the modified plan there is nothing of this kind introduced. In the first plan, such an arrangement was formerly proposed as to allow two or even three versions of the Scriptures to be used in the schools; but there is nothing of the kind to be allowed under the present plan. It may be said, however, that Ministers have reserved to themselves the power of revising any portion of their former plan: but have not the country and the House also reserved to themselves the power of putting an end to it if such an attempt were made? The Government say that, in deference to public opinion, they would alter the plan: is it not clear that the Government is responsible to public opinion, if they attempt to carry the plan into effect, as originally proposed, by any indirect mode? Honourable Gentlemen opposite assert that Ministers would revive the plan when Parliament might not be sitting: but are there no means by which the people could make their voice heard to prevent them doing so, even if this House should not be sitting? I will venture to say, that any Minister of the Crown who should dare to carry, when Parliament is prorogued, any obnoxious scheme into effect, in opposition to public opinion, would soon be brought to a sense of the danger that he had incurred, and the breach of trust that he had committed. The parts of the former plan which they have retained, I contend, are most desirable, — namely, that there shall not be a grant of public money for any school, without the Government having, on that account, the right of inspection; and, also, that no money shall be paid out without due responsibility being secured. This part of the plan I fully approve of; and I think that it places the grant of money for education on a proper footing. I heard, with great pain, the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire express some doubts as to the integrity of those to whom the expenditure of this money will be intrusted. The Noble Lord has long acted with those Gentlemen; and it was with great astonishment that I heard such imputations thrown out, so unnecessarily and so unjustifiably. I recollect the charges that were brought against the Noble Lord when he introduced his plan of education into Ireland, — a plan which the House was told was nothing more nor less than an attempt to restore Popery in that country, and the first step to render it the established religion of this country. I recollect how the Noble Lord treated these accusations; and I hope that the Government will manifest the same courage as was then displayed by the Noble Lord, and will persist in their present plan of education.

But, Sir, I cannot help adverting to another point of some importance. It has been said that the adoption of this system would endanger the religion of the establishment. Now, the Dissenters might complain that all the members of the Committee of Privy Council for Education are members of the establishment, and that, thus, they have no control whatever there: but how the construction of this committee can be dangerous to the church, I confess that I cannot understand. I think it would have been objectionable to have ministers of the establishment acting as members of this committee; for it would have led to complaints and dissatisfaction among other parties, if the applications of Dissenters to have ministers of their respective denominations placed on the board were refused. With regard to the petitions that have been presented, — and more particularly the petitions of the Wesleyan Methodists, — most of them are applicable to the original plan, and not to the one now before Parliament: and if the parties were made acquainted with the alterations that have been made, they would see that the grounds of most of their objections have been removed. I find that most of these petitions against the plan that has been abandoned, have emanated from the Wesleyan Methodists: but there are very large bodies of Methodists who have not petitioned on the subject; and there are also large bodies of Dissenters who have refrained from doing so. Since the plan has been modified, I am satisfied that most of these objections have ceased to exist; and I sincerely believe that a strong feeling of attachment has grown up for the plan promulgated by Ministers. A petition has been presented in favour of the proposed scheme from the representatives of the Independents, the Presbyterians, and the Baptists in the metropolis. This petition expresses decided approbation of the plan proposed by her Majesty's Ministers. The petitioners, after stating their regret at the institution both of secular and religious destruction which prevails amongst the poorer classes of the community, say that they are satisfied that no voluntary association could successfully grapple with the evil. After alluding and replying in very forcible language to the unjustifiable claim put forth by the clergy to the exclusive control over the education of the poorer classes, the petition proceeds:—

That your petitioners feel the deepest gratitude for the expression of her Majesty's most gracious wish that the youth of this kingdom should be religiously brought up, and the rights of conscience should be respected; whilst they pray the House to sanction the grants of public money, under a proper system of lay inspection and the responsibility of the Committee of Privy Council.

Such is the opinion of the great body of the most influential of the Protestant Dissenters in this country,— namely, the representatives or delegates of the Dissenters in London; and I believe that the Dissenters in the country, generally, concur in the same opinion. I feel convinced that the change which has been made has rendered the plan acceptable to the great body of the people; and I think it a matter of essential importance that the House should not oppose it. The present Government has been the first to introduce any system of national education into this country; and I think they deserve great credit for having overcome the prejudices that prevail on this subject,—and, above all, the religious prejudices, which are often the strongest of all. The Government have now got rid of the reproach of wishing to keep the people in ignorance. I do not know a more important duty on the part of the Government than that of instructing the people. With the sincerest desire for the promotion of education, and with the anxious wish that it should not in any way be sectarian, but that all classes should have free access to useful knowledge, I hope the House will sanction the plan of her Majesty's Ministers. With these feelings, and being impressed with the conviction that this plan is as little open to objection as any that could be devised, I shall give the proposition my support. The outcry that has been raised against it, is nothing more than another attempt to raise the cry of "No Popery!" which I am happy to find has been put an end to both in and out of Parliament. We have been told that toleration has gone far enough, and that the time has come at which we must make a stand. I hope that the stand will not be made against the general diffusion of education. I trust that the House will not oppose the first scheme of national education which has been proposed by a Government in England. I shall, assuredly, give it every support in my power; and I trust that this House will look with indulgence at any trivial faults, or deficiencies in details, which may have crept into the scheme, as now proposed by her Majesty's Ministers.

LORD TEIGNMOUTH.—Sir, I have listened with the utmost astonishment to the tone which has been adopted by some Honourable Gentlemen opposite,—considering the extraordinary concordance of opinion which prevails throughout the country, as to the absolute necessity of making religious instruction form an essential portion of any system of education which is to be founded and fostered by the state. I was almost led to believe that the Noble Lord opposite had gone the length of propounding in this House what he would not have attempted to assert anywhere else,—the doctrine of a general Christianity, abstracted from distinct and peculiar tenets. I must, for one, protest against the very pernicious powers, in this respect, which it is proposed to intrust to the Committee of the Privy Council. I have listened with attention to the deprecatory speech of the Honourable Member who has just sat down; but it has not in the smallest degree altered my conviction that the present Government, from the moment when it first came into power, has evinced a continued and uninterrupted hostility to the Church of England,—which would, no doubt, have broken out into overt acts in other instances besides that of the appropriation clause, but for the constant, vigilant, and combined opposition of this side of the House. Because these Members of the Privy Council are men of character, and, as I trust, men of religion, does it follow that they are to be trusted with the whole education of the country? The Honourable Member for Leeds has spoken of certain bodies of Methodists, as contrasted with the Wesleyans; but I would beg to remind the Honourable Member hat the Wesleyans are as numerous as he entire of the rest of the body of Dissenters, — with whom they may be considered, in parliamentary parlance, to ave "paired off" on this question. I cknowledge I was quite astonished, on a ormer evening, to hear the style in which ne Honourable Gentleman the Member or Liskeard argued in defence of a ystem of exclusively secular education. he Honourable Member certainly could ot have advanced a more potent argument in favour of a system of religious nstruction, during youth, than when he dverted to the fact, that young men reeived no religious instruction when they ntered upon their professional studies. t is utterly monstrous to think of such a octrine being put forward in an enghtened age. The very instance which hat Honourable Gentleman adduced, of ndividuals bred to the law and other proessions, not having religious instruction ixed up with their professional educaion, is exactly a case against him; inasuch as such persons are, of course, supposed to have been grounded in religion efore they devoted themselves to professional pursuits. I must confess that I iffer from some Honourable Gentlemen n this side of the House, who have dmitted that the British and Foreign chool Society should be placed on exctly the same footing as the National chool Society. Now, it appears to me, hat the national schools have a much igher claim on the consideration of the tate than the schools connected with he British and Foreign Society. As conscientious believer in the truth of he doctrines of the Church of England, - believing them to be the only true doctrines, — I must object to any system of ducation in which they are not enforced; nd, on the same ground, I must also old that every religious system which is ot conformable to them must be more or ess false. If we look at the question in statistical point of view, we shall find hat the Church of England is six times nore numerous than all other classes of Dissenters in this country, including the Wesleyan Methodists, and twelve times nore numerous, excluding the Wesleyans. t is well known to every clergyman, that f an approved system of management were introduced into the national schools, he Dissenters generally would be very willing to send their children to those schools; and Mr. Duppa, the secretary to he Central Board of Education, has declared his opinion that a very large proportion of the dissenting population have no religious scruples to prevent them from sending their children to schools where the religious instruction is conformable to the rites of the Church of England. Now, I appeal to Honourable Members, as men of sense and candour, and as men of business, whether, considering these facts, I am not naturally led to this conclusion, — that I cannot conscientiously give my support to any religious instruction but that of the Church of England? God forbid that I, for one, should declare the scriptural education which is communicated by the British and Foreign School Society, under proper inspection, to be hostile to the Church of England. I have been for twenty years engaged in promoting the work of scriptural education; and, in connection with the Hibernian Society in Ireland, have been more or less instrumental in the distribution of copies of the Scriptures amongst no fewer than 38,000 Roman Catholics. But I do not hesitate to state my conviction that the British and Foreign School Society does not do that which it ought to do for the due distribution of its grants. I consider that the very worst feature of the plan, which is said to have been abandoned by the Government, is still retained, — I allude to that portion of it which gives grants to the clergymen of different religious persuasions; and, in truth, I do not perceive that there is anything to prevent the Government from reverting to their old scheme altogether, which, therefore, I treat as a constant quantity. I see no security against the introduction of Socinian and Unitarian versions of the Scriptures into these schools. When her Majesty's Government talk of introducing a system of general religious instruction into these schools, I appeal to Honourable Members, as men of sense and discretion, whether that will not naturally lead to a system of universal sectarianism? This is no metaphysical abstraction. When you shall have stripped this scheme of the flattering colours in which your fancy may have invested it, you will find it a crawling, obsequious, serpent-like, and by no means unenvenomed thing, varying its hues like the chameleon, — now presenting a most pious and evangelical aspect, now assuming the appearance of dissent; — now strictly orthodox — and anon, glittering in all the splendour of a more gorgeous ritual. It is my conviction that the Government must back out of this scheme, just as it has done upon most former occasions. The conclusion of the second minute of Council states that "a portion of the grant should be applied to the purposes of inspection, and of ascertaining completely the state of education in England and Wales." They will find it vain to attempt to struggle with the difficulties which they will meet in attempting to carry this scheme into effect; and what will they then do? Why, — abandon the scheme, and expend all the money advanced by the country for its furtherance, in a new commission of inquiry. That commission will probably agree to their report in the year 1842. I would put it to the Noble Lord—(for whom I have the utmost respect), — considering the state of the country, the intensely earnest feeling of the Church of England, and the growing impression on the subject, in all parts of the country, — that something immediate must be done for national education; and I would ask him why he does not come forward and place himself at the head of the established church, and, with God's blessing, save the country, in one of the most difficult and perilous crises she was ever yet placed in? That is the proper position in which a Minister of the Crown should be; whereas it is a false position in which the Noble Lord is now placed. I have heard of an officer of the Catholic Church, called L'Avocato del Diavolo; I trust the Noble Lord will not choose that post for himself!

Mr. LANGDALE.— I believe there is an officer in the Catholic Church bearing the title mentioned by the Noble Lord; but the Noble Lord has, evidently, quite misunderstood his functions. The Noble Lord belongs to a party who are certainly consistent in their principle: they take up the ground that the established church, and that alone, ought to have the direction of national education. This I can understand; but I cannot so well understand the principle of the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire. I am ready to admit that there has been a vast number of petitions presented against the Government scheme. I admit, as well, the cry that has been raised in the country against it; but when I consider, at the same time, the means which have been taken to raise that cry, my only wonder is, that it has not been greater than it is. The greater number of the meetings which have taken place upon the subject, have been confined to those who oppose the Government scheme; its supporters having been studiously excluded from them. I will ask the Noble Lord (Lord Teignmouth), whether he, himself, adopts the tone of the petitions upon this subject? There is scarcely a term of abuse which has not been employed in those petitions. If those terms be well founded, the Noble Lord should go farther than he does, and propose to repeal Catholic emancipation altogether. If Roman Catholics are anti-Christian and anti-social, the penal laws against them ought to be re-enacted. I must confess that, after the repeal of the Test and Corporation Act, and the passing of the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, I expected there was to have been an end of these distinctions between Protestants and Catholics; and I can only say, that when the Honourable Gentlemen opposite go to the extent of excluding a particular class in the country from the benefits to which they have an equal right with others of their fellow subjects, they are departing from the principle of toleration altogether. If you go to the extent of excluding our Roman Catholic brethren from any share in grants of public money for the purposes of education, you are doing no less than making them pay an unjust penalty, on account of their religion; and I suppose those who advocate such a system will, in a future year, object that any of the public money shall be voted even in favour of the British and Foreign School Society, and insist that it shall be confined to the National Society. The system of general education which is now opposed, is the same which is supported in the East and in our colonies, as well as among our poorer brethren in Ireland; and, under such circumstances, how can you have the conscience to refuse to grant the same measure of instruction to the Roman Catholic masses of the people of this country?

Mr. LITTON. — Sir, I have been ever anxious to raise my voice against a system that has utterly failed in Ireland; and I do maintain that no man who has a regard for the established religion of the country, or who believes the Protestant faith to be the great shield of religious liberty, can, by any possibility, agree to the proposition of the Noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department on this question. Let no man be misled by the assertion that the original plan of the Government, as contained in the minute of the 13th of April, is, in any degree, abandoned. I ask those who agree with me as to the necessity of maintaining the Protestant establishment of this empire intact, to read that minute. They will find there, in the first resolution, that religion must be the basis of every scheme of education: — right; so far I agree with the resolution; — and that religion must be mingled with every branch of education. I believe I repeat nearly the very words; but when I look a little lower down, I find that what is called "general education," is instruction in all religions at the same time; and to make the object more distinct, I find that the Roman Catholic and Socinian versions of the Bible ought to be ntroduced, and the pastors of each creed — no matter how discordant their views — allowed to mingle with the mass of the upils. Such is the avowed principle of n Honourable Member, who recently ad-lressed the House with great force of elo-|uence, and whom I listened to with great espect. Attempts have been made to con-ince this House that the Gentlemen oppo-ite, in their resolution of the 3d of June, ave abandoned the resolution of the 19th f April; but, again, I pray Honourable Members not to be misled by this state-nent. The Government only postpone — they do not abandon — their original scheme. The word "postpone" admits but of one meaning, and they say they post-pone it till a better opportunity — till pub-lic opinion shall be more agreed upon the subject, — that is, till Protestants shall be lulled into a false security, and be found asleep at their posts. Then, and not till then, will the resolution of the 19th of April be again brought forward. Now, what is it that is reserved by the terms of the minutes of the 3d of June? Why, that the Committee of the Privy Council shall have power to make such improve-ments as they may see fit. This is nei-ther more nor less than enabling them to make such changes, and grant such sums of money, as they may think proper. They are, then, to be the judges of their own improvements; and no other parties are to be at liberty to say whether the changes they may propose are good or bad. But I will never consent to invest any four men with such irresponsible power. No one can read the resolutions of the Noble Lord, without perceiving that it is the fixed intention of the Government to carry out their original project on the first favourable opportunity; and I will put it to Honourable Members to say whether religionists in this country can agree to such a plan as that which it is evidently the design of the Government, at some time or other, to carry into execution? Some Honourable Members of this House have advocated a system of national edu-cation without religion; but, happily, their sentiments have found no response. This, however, is equivalent to ad-mitting that there should be some re-ligion in any system of education which we may adopt; and, if I am right, the question then arises, — To whom shall we delegate the power of prescribing the form of the religion to be taught in the national schools? I think it should only be delegated to the established church, — because of its connection with the state. What I complain of is, that the plan now proposed goes to allow all versions, what-soever, of the Scriptures to be read in the schools, and that such a system can have no other effect than that of involving the juvenile mind in those doubts and diffi-culties which tend only to infidelity. This is my first objection; and my next is, that any attempt to bring children of different religious persuasions together for the pur-pose of education, would only lead to discord, strife, and heart-burnings. Is it not likely that the ministers of each sect would endeavour to inculcate in the minds of the youth under their charge their own peculiar views with regard to reli-gion? and if such would be the case, how can any other result be expected from it but strife and vexation? This is not the way in which the youth of this country should be educated; neither is it calculated to give them that respect for the constitu-tion which is necessary to render them good subjects. Educated in this way, must they not be led to think that exclu-sion from even the Throne, on account of religion, is unjust? I am opposed to the distinction which has been taken between general and special education; and I think that a system founded on doctrines of cold abstract morality — and that is what I understood by general education — would only create doubt and difficulty in the young mind. The Noble Lord says he has his own opinions respecting the Roman Catholic religion and the So-cinian faith; but, if he think them wrong, why has he not the candour to say so? If the Noble Lord considers the opinions of these sects to be erroneous, would he send his own infant son to a school in which such beliefs are taught? And if he would not, how can he justify his adoption of a principle, in reference to the children of others, which he would not apply in the case of his own? I do think that the time has arrived when the members of the esta-blished church must make a stand. I do fear the admission of the Roman Catholic priesthood into Protestant schools. Their only view is the ascendancy of their own church, and the principle of proselytising is the leading and guiding spirit of the Roman Catholic religion.

There is another body whom I also fear; and that is her Majesty's present Government. The Noble Lord the Se-cretary of State for the Home Depart-ment has never omitted one opportunity of offering indignity to the established church, by attacking the Protestant clergy. He is continually derogating from the usefulness and credit which belong to the clergy of that church, by charging them with neglect of their duty; and from the tenor of the whole conduct of the Noble Lord, it must be manifest to every one that the Noble Lord is no friend — that he is, in fact, the enemy — of the church of which he professes himself to be a member.

Every word he has said, and everything he has done, has tended to lower the established church in the estimation of the country, and to lessen its power. I implore the people of England not to be mistaken or deceived as to the intentions of the Government. You will find that, if the proposition of June be adopted, that of April will not long be postponed; and therefore it is that I say, let us not accept the grant on any such conditions as those on which it is proposed to be given. I trust the House will not suffer our faith to be tampered with or tainted. And why is it that, in Ireland, Protestant children are not permitted by their parents to go to the national schools, but because they fear their religious principles will be perverted. I hope that the power of injuring the establishment now sought for will not be given to the Government; and I say this in the full belief that it would be used for the subversion of the established religion of the country.

Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL. — The opponents of the vote which has been proposed seem to lay great stress on one argument. They say that, although the plan first proposed by Government is abandoned for the present, yet, whenever a lull in the public feeling shall take place, the plan will be revived. But cannot the plan be revived just as well whether the present grant be agreed to or not? Will not the Privy Council have just the same power? But, in fact, the opposition to the grant is, as has been admitted by several speakers, neither more nor less than an opposition to any scheme of national education which is not placed under the exclusive control of the established church. The objection, however, applies with quite as much force to the grant of last year, which was divided between the National Society and the British and Foreign Society. It is strange, too, that the Noble Lord, who was the author of the combined system of education for Ireland, should be the foremost to oppose the introduction of a similar system into this country. The real cause of the opposition is, that a party cry has been unfortunately raised in this country — a party cry of the worst character; for, of all party animosities, the worst is that in which, to the bitterness of political strife, there is added the threefold bitterness of religious bigotry. You have taken advantage of that cry. But what is the position in which you have placed yourselves? You have previously concurred in the propriety of a grant to be divided between two different and discordant societies. One is purely an established church society: the other admits into its schools every variety of Dissenters; and, I believe, does not even exclude Unitarians. The only class excluded from the British and Foreign Schools are the Roman Catholics,—who are prevented, by the rules of their church, from reading any version of their Scriptures but their own. What, then, is the position in which the opponents of the present grant place themselves? They say, "We will allow the benefits of education to every denomination of Christians except the Roman Catholics." Is this the meaning of conscience? Is this zeal for religion? In giving education to many varieties of Christians, you necessarily give encouragement to many whose opinions you deem erroneous. Does not this impart an additional sting to the degradation inflicted on the only class that is excluded? Does it not tend to excite the odium theologicum in its worst and bitterest form? Honourable Gentlemen opposite ought to recollect that, in the manufacturing towns of this country, and in many of the northern districts, there are large classes of their fellow subjects professing a religion with which they may disagree (and whether, in doing so, they are right or wrong, I will not, at present, argue), but a religion, the regulations of which prevent them from availing themselves of any of the means now provided by the state for the education of the people.

Are you, I ask, prepared to refuse to this large body of the population the means of removing that ignorance which is asserted to be the chief cause of their continuing in their present religious belief? or will you prefer continuing that ignorance, which is the prolific source of crime and of every physical and moral mischief? Can you feel justified in taking advantage of the wretched cry that has been raised, in order to withhold from this destitute population a small sum, not taken out of old endowments, but drawn from the taxes, to which, poor as they are, they, themselves, contribute? Will you refuse to this unfortunate class of the population the smallest share of those taxes for such moral and religious instruction for their children as they can conscientiously accept? If you truly believe your own doctrines, why should you dread the visits of a proselyting riest? Why should you not rather agerly grasp at the offer to communicate nd diffuse knowledge, which you must xpect to further your own principles, if ou believe them to be true? Upon such question, I ask, is the House to be led way by party feelings? If you allow ourself to be so, you may, indeed, flatter ourselves with the idea of being the riends of the church, but you are not he friends to order or to obedience to the aws. You would assume to yourselves he unjust power of dictating to other nen what their belief ought to be, — and, n that assumption, would exclude them from benefits which they ought to enjoy; and you prevent the promotion of that state of feeling which must be conducive to the establishment of true religion in the country. Honourable Gentlemen opposite may gain a triumph if they succeed upon the present occasion; but, if they do, it will be a triumph fatal to the best interests of the people. I trust, then, that her Majesty's Ministers will go on with their plan, however imperfect it may be. The plan is reasonable in itself, — it is doing nothing more on the part of Ministers than what they have been called upon to do by their opponents in Ireland. Let them adhere to their plan, and they will find that the virulence and the excitement — the stimulating topics now so rife, and the bigotry that is now so rife — will be but short-lived, while the gratitude which they will earn for themselves will be perpetual; and their consolation will be in that success — and I say it without profaneness, that holy success — which will secure to the poor and the humble all the blessings of a moral, religious, and truly national education.

Mr. CRESSWELL. — I am desirous of stating, in a few words, the one or two reasons which will induce me to withhold my consent from the vote now called for; and, inasmuch as it has been observed on both sides of the House, that we have been departing from the question really before us, I shall state what the true question is which we have to consider. It appears that her Majesty, by the advice of her Ministers, has constituted a committee to superintend the application of the funds to be voted by Parliament for the purpose of national education; and it has been said that the appointment of that committee, so far from being desirable, can lead to no good; that, instead of being an advantage, it will be an evil; — and here it is that the policy or impolicy of the measure has been brought into direct discussion. By a majority of 5, it has been voted that there is nothing so objectionable in the measure as to call for an Address to the Crown, praying that the Order in Council may be rescinded; but when we see the majority so small, and the opposition so great, I do think that it becomes the House to ascertain what the powers are which are to be given to the committee so constituted and so sanctioned. It is not merely the grant, but the use to which it may be applied, which we are called upon to discuss; and it is for the House to say whether they are prepared, without the sanction of the House of Lords, to adopt such a course? It has been said by an Honourable Member opposite, that this grant is withheld because of its apprehended effects; but it is obvious that without the grant there can be no effects. The committee may be appointed to determine the regulations; but if they have no money either to pay inspectors or to bribe schools to submit to them, what will become of their proceedings? The Noble Lord, opposite, is a member of the Central Board of Education; and what are the sentiments of one party connected with that board? Why, he says, in a pamphlet which has been published, "Let the central board have power to build schools, — let them have power to support good schools already established, — and the way will be gradually paved for a more comprehensive system, and bringing charity schools under the control and direction of the board." Now, this is a power which I will never consent to give to the board; and for the best possible reason, — that it would enable them by degrees to introduce any system of education they might think fit. Entirely concurring with all that has been said as to the magnitude of the interests involved in this question, — as to the importance of national education to all classes of the community, and as to its effects on all their prospects here and their hopes hereafter, — I will not consent that this House shall take upon itself to confer, on any committee, powers so extensive, without the sanction of the other branch of the Legislature. I never will give my consent to a proposition so unconstitutional as that of wresting from the House of Peers their lawful interference, and that the House of Commons shall take upon itself to legislate, by a species of sleight of hand, on a subject of this kind. Is this view, novel? or is it merely my own suggestion? To show that it is not, I have only to quote the words of the pamphlet to which I have already referred, and in which it is said that "all hopes of amendment are to be distrusted, owing to the balance of parties in the country; and perhaps it might be ir before any Bill for establishing a system of national education would pass the House of Lords; but then a Bill for national education is not a sine quâ non, as her Majesty's Ministers have the power in their own hands, if assisted by a vote of the House of Commons, of extending a new scheme, and reforming those that exist." I trust that these are not the views of the Noble Lord.

I have now stated my first objection; and my second is, that I will not consent to delegate powers to a committee of the Privy Council, which will be, in effect, surrendering up my own judgment. If the object of the Government be, the establishment of a permanent system, why have they not stated their scheme candidly to the House, in order that, if we approve of it, we may adopt it; or if we disapprove of it, that we may, at all events, record our votes against it? I cannot be said to use an unfair or an illogical argument, when I take the statement of those who are the supporters of the measure, and show to the House what they think would be the consequences that would arise from its adoption. I do not give this statement as the opinion of the Noble Lord; I merely give it as an evidence of the opinion of my supporters; and, upon the ground that the measure will have the effect stated by its supporters, I shall offer it my strenuous opposition. Upon what grounds does the Noble Lord ask our support of the proposed scheme? Is it that the opinion of the country has been so strongly expressed in its favour, that there can be no doubt of the propriety of supporting it, and that it should be taken for granted that it will have the assent of the House of Lords? Is it because it has been carried by the large majority of 5, that we should take that as an indication of how popular a scheme it is with the country generally, and that it therefore must, of necessity, have the acquiescence of the Lords?

Before I advert to the importance of that large majority, I will ask the House to recollect how it was composed; and it was, I would beg to remind the House, a majority not upon an open question, but upon a strictly Ministerial question,—upon a very close question. But does the Noble Lord claim our votes upon the ground of the numbers of that majority, as affording an evidence of how popular the measure is,—as an evidence of the general confidence of the country? Could they come before the House, and say, "We have the support of the country in this scheme; we have the confidence of the people; there is but a miserable minority, so small that it is scarcely discernible, and therefore we are justified in demanding your support?" Is it under these circumstances they ask for support? If it be, I, for one, beg respectfully to say that my confidence in her Majesty's Ministers is not strong enough to induce me to forego my opposition to this measure. I wish that the House could have more definite information as to the scheme which is to be adopted. Is it the former scheme, or a new one? How can any one be expected to give his support to a scheme so doubtful and indefinite? Are we to believe that the Noble Lord has entirely abandoned his former scheme, and that there is no idea of again adopting it? Or is that scheme merely postponed, to be virtually carried into effect if this grant shall be obtained? I do not deny that the Noble Lord cannot be blamed for bringing it into operation, if he think it the best scheme which can be adopted; and therefore it is, that the House should hesitate before it votes a grant which may be applied by the Noble Lord to the purpose of bringing the original scheme again into operation; and this would be to be expected, if, as I have remarked, the Noble Lord holds it to be the best scheme. If he think that plan the most desirable, is he not bound, as a Minister of the Crown, to bring it into operation, if we give him the power to do so by this grant? With respect to another topic,—namely, the petitions against the Government scheme of education,—it has been said that they are mostly against the former plan, which had been abandoned, and not against this latter. Now, the fact is, that the former plan was abandoned so quickly, that all the persons who petitioned against it had not time to petition also against the latter; but if the latter system proposed was pleasing to them, is it not to be supposed that they would state so to the House? Would they not be bound, as honest men, to do so? Therefore I will say that their silence as to the second plan is an indication of continued opposition upon the part of those who had petitioned against the former scheme. The Noble Lord has abandoned the former plan; and he now comes before the House to say, that, as we had refused to let him proceed with his former plan, he will not now ask us to let him do as he pleases. But if, after the House has given its assent to the grant, the committee will give support to any schools it may please—(besides the two descriptions mentioned)—if a person establish a school upon the former plan, and apply for a share of the grant in support of it,—how can they refuse him? I trust I shall not be reckoned flippant in suggesting a comparison which strikes me. The licensed victuallers complain generally of the beer-shops, — and principally in consequence of the permission accorded to the latter to consume beer on the premises. I suggested to a person who urged that objection, that it might be removed by depriving them of the privilege of permitting beer to be consumed on the premises: but the person to whom I made that suggestion answered me by saying, that in such a case the evil would still continue; for the owner of a beer shop would take the next or some adjacent house, and allow the beer to be consumed there. In the same way would this grant, by affording support to schools upon the former plan, enable the Noble Lord practically to support that which has been professedly abandoned.

It was said, a few nights ago, by the Honourable Member for Lambeth, that the religious liberty of the people is concerned in this question.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

I am not opposed to religious freedom; but I feel bound to say that I do not see how religious liberty is effected by this question. Those who oppose this plan of education do not desire to deny religious freedom; they do not seek to prevent any man from worshipping God according to the dictates of his own conscience, or to interfere with the religious feelings of any person. I do not see how religious liberty can be said to be concerned in the question, unless we have the same opinion of religious freedom which another Honourable Member has of freedom of education, who has said that freedom of education consists in every man having a right to receive his education at the expense of the Government. If we were to go so far as this with religious education, perhaps it might be said that religious freedom was equally concerned in the same principle,—that is—if you maintain that, every man has a right to be taught his own peculiar religious creed in a temple erected at the expense of the Government; but unless you go that length, I cannot see what effect it has upon religious liberty. It has been said by another Honourable Member that every man has a right to his own creed, but that he has at the same time no right to interfere with his neighbour's religious belief, as he has reserved the privilege of judging for himself upon such a subject. If, by that, it be meant that no man has a right to reproach, or annoy, or inflict any penalty upon, his neighbour for his religious opinions, I fully concur with the sentiment; but I deny that a man has no right to form an opinion as to the correctness of the religious doctrines of another. If it be said that no man has a right to decide whether the creed of another is right or wrong, I cannot agree in such a principle. Why, how can a person believe his own creed to be right, if he do not believe those which differ from it to be in error? If a man were to choose between two creeds, how could he select one for his belief, if he did not think the other was in error? But, at the same time that I think such a privilege ought to be allowed, I do not mean to deny to every man the right to select and entertain his own belief. I would say, Let every man enjoy his own creed. Is it to be inferred, however, that because we do not interfere with a man in his religious belief, we are to go further, and assist him to propagate his error? It is because the House is now called upon to do so,—to assist in propagating error, — that I raise my voice against this scheme. If you wish, you may vote for such a plan; you may shock my feelings by doing so; but I shall have satisfied my own conscience in protesting and voting against it. I do not understand the argument which has been used by Honourable Members at the other side, — namely, that it is equally unfair to ask Roman Catholics and Dissenters to support by their contributions a creed from which they differ. If you grant funds for the maintenance of the Roman Catholic priesthood, you will not violate my conscience, whilst I vindicate it by voting against that application; and exactly the same argument applies to Roman Catholics and Dissenters. We all know that that respected body, the Society of Friends, refuse to give their assistance or support to war; and, upon your present principle, should we not violate the conscience of every Quaker in the empire by obliging him to support the taxes that enable us to proceed with the war? It is a most nonsensical mode of arguing to say that the consciences of Roman Catholics and Dissenters are done violence to by our giving a portion of the money of the state to the support of another creed. It has been said that the experiment of teaching children of different religious persuasions in common has been already tried, and found successful. Now, I will put the House in possession of the facts of the case; and you will then be enabled to judge how far the experiments which have been tried have proved successful. It is said there is a neutral ground in religion, upon which children of all creeds, if Christian charity prevail among them, may meet on a footing of equality; and that this we shall ascertain from the result of the proposed experiment. I know but one place where the experiment of the system of mixed instruction has been tried,—and that is Liverpool. About three years ago the corporation of Liverpool devoted part of their funds to the purposes of that experiment; and they accordingly established two schools in which children of all sects were received, and in which ministers of each creed were allowed to attend to instruct the children in their several doctrines, at particular times. At that period there was a strong Protestant feeling in Liverpool, against the plan; and the consequence was, that the greater part of the Protestants, whose children had previously been receiving instruction at the schools, withdrew them when the new arrangement was brought into operation.

[Cries of "Oh!" and, "Hear, hear!"]

Yes; those who were opposed to the system of mixed religious instruction were accused of a disinclination to afford instruction. But how was that proved? By their subscribing a sum of 10,000*l.* for the purpose of affording education to those who were not inclined to avail themselves of the schools which had been established by the corporation of Liverpool. The boon was as gratefully accepted as it was munificently bestowed. But to return: in the corporation schools, in the first instance, extracts from the Bible were given to the children, and not the whole Bible; — of course, I mean during the hours in which they were under the master of the school. The cry, however, against this part of the plan, became so strong, that they were obliged to abandon it; and the whole Bible was placed in the hands of the children, with the exception of those children of Roman Catholics who still had the extracts. But how did the special religious education go on? In the year 1837, there were 320 Roman Catholic children in these schools, and no Roman Catholic had ever attended, nor had any dissenting minister. The only person who ever attended was a minister of the Church of England.

[Cheers from the Opposition benches.]

Here, then, was an end to the system of combined religious education. It is possible to have a combined secular education, but not a united religious system. I find, by a letter which I have this day received from Liverpool, that there are in the charity schools of Liverpool — the great bulk of which are daily schools — 8957 children belonging to the Church of England, and 3098 children of different religious persuasions, with 304 children of the Scottish church, — making, in all, a total of 12,359 children. Of these, however, the Roman Catholic children are educated, principally, at one school (St. Patrick's), and the remainder are dispersed in various different schools. Now, how any body can say that the combined system of education has been introduced in Liverpool with the most perfect success, I cannot imagine. There is no neutral ground in religion. A clergyman, who felt much interest in the success of the system tried by the corporation at Liverpool, offered his services, upon the condition that the children should begin the day with some form of divine worship in which all might join. But this plan failed. Objection was started after objection; and, at last, it was proposed that they should repeat the Lord's Prayer. But that, also, was refused. The Roman Catholic priest refused to allow the Roman Catholic children to join in repeating that prayer, although it was given to us by an authority whom all reverence. Where, then, are we to find neutral ground on which may be built an altar at which all can worship? Combined religious education is, in my opinion, an attempt perfectly hopeless. It has been asked by the Honourable Member who spoke last, if we believed their creed to be true, why are we afraid of the proselytising of the ministry of another creed? My answer to that question is, — Because we believe our creed to be true, we are the more afraid of having it tampered with. Believing, as I do, that the proposed system is calculated to produce much evil, I shall not give my support to any grant in order to carry it into operation. I cannot consent to allow such an important matter to be at the disposal of four Privy Councillors; nor do I believe it right to dispose of so important a measure without asking the consent to, or acquiescence in, its principle of the co-ordinate branch of the Legislature.

Mr. VERNON SMITH. — I shall endeavour, in the few observations I intend to offer, to confine myself entirely to the subject of this evening's discussion, as, indeed, was promised by the Honourable and Learned Gentlemen who preceded me, — a promise from which he has, however, greatly deviated. The first and principal argument advanced by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman was, that upon this occasion the House of Commons is interfering with the privileges of another branch of the Legislature. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman seems to have utterly forgotten that it is one of the peculiar privileges of the House of Commons to vote the public money. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman advanced it as something novel in history, that we should now, for the first time, be proposing a vote of money for the purpose of establishing a principle, independent of the other branch of the Legislature. Let the Honourable and Learned Gentleman look at all Acts of a like nature that have been passed for the last twelve years; — let him look at the Miscellaneous Estimates, and he will find very many sums granted without the assent of the other branch of the Legislature. I should like to know whether the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire (Lord Stanley) would broach the same principle, on which the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has so long dwelt? I should like to know whether the Noble Lord's own system of Irish education was not established by a vote of the House of Commons? Let him, also, look at the Appropriation Acts, and he will find the same principles there established? What does the Honourable and Learned Gentleman say to our colonial education — to the sum that was voted for the education of the negroes, — and that, too, upon a liberal and comprehensive plan, much more extensive than the present? And yet the Honourable and Learned Gentleman talks of the House going away from this principle, or, rather, receding from it, because what is meant, is not to be done with the united voice of the other branch of the Legislature. Another argument used by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, and one more appropriate to the previous discussion, was — the conduct of the Privy Council. I know the determination of Honourable Gentlemen opposite, to fight the question inch by inch. Upon this occasion, they must allow that one inch, at least, has been gained. We have not the sanction, but the assent, of that House, to the order of the Privy Council.

[Cheers.]

If Gentlemen opposite think it is otherwise, let them bring forward the question, and debate it again.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and laughter.]

I can only say that,—perfectly admitting the scantiness of our majority of five ——

[Laughter, and cries of "Hear!"]

It is not by discourteous laughter that an answer ought to be given. I am only asserting what I have asserted before. I do not deny that our majority, hitherto, is scanty; but if we debate the question over again, I, for one, should be very glad of it. I should be right glad to have such debates taken over and over again; because I must say that, on this side, we are unanimous in the assertion of those principles of religious liberty upon which we have always acted. I will ask my Honourable Friends behind me, — some of whom have been pleased to say that they see no very great difference between the present Administration and that which might be composed of Honourable Gentlemen opposite, — whether this debate has not convinced them that there is a most important difference between the principles of the two? The Honourable and Learned Member for Liverpool said he has no confidence in the Administration, and I have no reason to expect that he has; but the Honourable and Learned Gentleman should recollect that, on this occasion, the Government, who propose the grant, are responsible for the manner in which that grant is applied; and when Honourable Gentlemen talk of the abandonment by the Government of their plan, and attempt to put us in a dilemma by using that argument against us, I believe I am justified in saying that we only abandoned that plan because it appeared to be unpopular.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

It is abandoned for the present, because the Government have found it to be unpopular. They have not, however, abandoned the defence of that plan, but the plan itself.

[Much laughter].

And they are prepared to defend it, knowing that it might be carried into effect if the country were in its favour The first plan is abandoned: and, when Honourable Gentlemen talk of its at present being carried on with the money now to be voted, I will say they are mistaken; for this is no more possible than for the Treasury to appropriate any sum of money to any other purpose than that to which it has been devoted by Parliament. The present proposition is for 30,000*l.* to carry on the plan of the 3d of June, now before the House; and if the Government were to devote it to the former plan, they will be held responsible for every sixpence of the money. I will not enter into a discussion of the plan of the 3d of June, now, but will call the attention of the House to the grants of moneys that have been annually devoted to the purposes of education. In the year 1833, Lord Althorp first proposed a vote of money to be divided between the British and Foreign School Society and the National School Society: but I deny that that could be considered as "a scheme;" it was only a temporary expedient to allay the great thirst that then existsd for education, until the Government and Parliament should have had an opportunity of examining the question. There was no "finality" in that proposal. Why, the very year afterwards, at the suggestion of Mr. Roebuck and the Honourable Member for Yorkshire, a committee was appointed to inquire into a system of national education, and I served on that committee. In the year 1835, a similar committee was appointed; and the result of it was a Report, containing a great mass of information which many Honourable Members in this House will do well to read. In 1838, another committee was appointed, but they only reported in favour of the extension of education; and I will ask Honourable Gentlemen whether they mean to call the present plan a scheme for national education? Is 30,000*l.* the utmost sum they are prepared to vote for the purpose of carrying out a scheme of national education? Why, on the most trifling objects of our Estimates, the House would vote a larger sum. Thus, if we look at our convict vote, it will be found to exceed the amount. Where public money is voted, the public has a right to see how it is distributed; and the vote now proposed is of a temporary nature. The grant is to be given to the secretaries of the British and Foreign School Society and the National School Society. But is this to be called "a scheme?" A splendid scheme it is, forsooth! Why, I, myself, should be one of the first to object to it, if it were to be permanent: for, by the principle of the British and Foreign Schools, Unitarians and Roman Catholics are excluded. I also object to the National Schools; and it is for the very reason for which the Noble Lord the Member for Marylebone praises them. The Noble Lord says that it is the boast of this society, — the schools of which more peculiarly belong to the established church, — that Dissenters attend them in many parts of England. I will maintain this is the cause of great mischief. I would entreat the House, — and it is from objections on religious grounds that I do so, — in the education of children, to avoid confusion of religions; but I am entirely persuaded of this, — that greater confusion would arise from educating Dissenters in the national schools than from educating them in any schools of the Government. A Dissenter's child attends the national school. What is the consequence of that? He finds that his master and his pastor are at variance; he will hear doctrines contrary to those he hears at home; he will find the religion of the school and the religion of his home at variance; and he will be worked upon by the opinions of the others who are educated in the school. What is it that is most insisted upon in the national schools? Why, the Church Catechism. If, indeed, I were not tempted to withdraw any grants for such a system, at least care should be taken to have a vigilant inspection of the schools, to see how they are conducted. The Honourable and Learned Member for Liverpool has said that the clergy of the established church have been the sole educators of the people; but if the Honourable and Learned Member asks me the meaning of the term religious liberty, I should say that it does not consist in any such system. The Honourable and Learned Member also said he would not consent to the propagation of erroneous principles; why, then, does he consent to vote for church extension in the colonies and in Scotland? Why vote money to any other than the Church of England? Each of these cases is an instance to prove that he consents to the promotion of erroneous principles. Where, I would ask, should the public money go, but into these barren regions, — as the Noble Lord the Member for Marylebone called them, — where religious education is most wanted, and where there is no other way of providing it? Where do we build our churches with the public money, but in places where there is a want of them? The Honourable and Learned Member for Liverpool has taunted this side with the smallness of our majority, and has asked whether this is to be considered "an open question?' I will say nothing more to this, than that it is more likely to be an open question on the other side of the House than on that of the Government.

If Honourable Gentlemen opposite wish to possess power, they must, from all I have heard in the course of this debate, make religion itself an open question. For how could they possibly bring into one Ministry all those speakers who, on the Opposition side, have attended the debate on this subject? It would be curious to learn in what school all those Honourable Gentlemen have been educated. In my opinion, the remark of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman was most ill-timed. But the House, having already sanctioned by a majority,—however small it may have been, — the Order of the Privy Council, the question is, whether you will now deny the Government all the power of carrying it out, by refusing the grant of money now proposed? I cannot undertake to say, — but of this I am satisfied, — that, whether you are prepared to refuse the money or not, my Noble Friend (Lord John Russell), who is so conspicuously the advocate of religious liberty, has shown that, in addition to political wisdom, he is gifted with political courage, and I hope to add, political success. As regards the vote of money itself, — the object of this night's debate, — the sooner we come to a division the better. The Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire referred back to the reign of Henry IV., in order to show that the church, in former times, was the sole educator of the people. I, also, remember an anecdote of the time of Henry IV. Parliament being, in the time of that monarch, called upon to vote a supply, voted an Address, informing his Majesty that he might just as well take the temporal revenues of the church, which would afford an excellent supply. When the House went up with this Address to the King, the archbishop, who was present, said that, although they did not contribute money to the wars, yet they furnished their vassals, and gave their anxious prayers. The Speaker of the House of Commons smiled, and answered, that "what the Archbishop said might be very true; but he rather thought that the prayers of the clergy would form but a very scanty supply for an army." So much for those who are so anxious to act upon the precepts of antiquity.

[Loud cries of "Question!"]

I thank the House for the indulgence shown to me. I confidently hope that the vote will be agreed to.

SIR G. CLERK. — After the full discussion of the question which has already taken place, and after the various arguments which have been put forward with so much force and effect by Honourable Members at this side of the House, and which are still unanswered; I should not feel it necessary, even if I had the ability, to occupy the time of the House for a long period. But I could not hear the speech of the Honourable Member who has just sat down, without offering one or two observations upon it. The amount of this grant is the subject least deserving the consideration of the committee; — the question is as to the principle. When the Noble Lord first brought forward his proposition, he gave the House to understand, at the time, what his intentions were as to the mode of proceeding he would adopt. In the course of the speech which the Noble Lord delivered upon that occasion, he stated that it was his intention to proceed by Bill; and that he intended to bring in a Bill to carry into effect a system of national education.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — No!

SIR G. CLERK. — It is most unfortunate that the Noble Lord should have been so generally misunderstood and misrepresented, for I find that, in all those channels of information which report the proceedings of the House, and by means of which we are in the habit of refreshing our memory, occasionally, as to what takes place here, the Noble Lord is represented as having expressed himself to this effect; and it appears, further, that when the Noble Lord was asked for some explanation as to the plan he meant to propose, he stated that he would enter into the details of the plan when he brought his Bill before the House. It seems, however that the Noble Lord has found reason to change his course, — I suppose, by the arguments contained in his Right Honourable Friend's pamphlet, — and by proceeding by a vote of this House, instead of by Bill, he endeavours to deprive the House of Lords of all opportunity of giving any opinion upon this most constitutional and most important question. This I think, in every sense, a course most objectionable. The settlement of so important a question as the establishment of a system of national education ought to have the concurrence of every branch of the Legislature. But, then, as has been already asked by my Right Honourable Friend, what security have we that the original plan of the Government will not be revived? What security have we that the original plan may not be carried into effect by means of this money, should the committee consent to acquiesce in this vote? The Noble Lord, and those who have spoken from the other side of the House, have told us that all the most objectionable parts of the first plan, such as the erection of normal schools, will be given up. But, then, we know that the Committee of the Privy Council still hold the opinion that it would be better to apply this money according to the original plan which has been, for the present, abandoned; and, Sir, there is no restriction whatever as to the application of the vote now in your hands. The Government, or the Committee of the Privy Council, acting with the concurrence of the Government, will be perfectly at liberty to dispose of this money, and to distribute it in whatever manner they may think fit. The Honourable Member for Northampton, who last addressed the House, has spoken of the plan introduced by Lord Althorp in 1833, and I certainly think that he adverted to it in a manner that was not to be expected from a member of her Majesty's Government, in speaking of a plan which had been introduced by that Noble Lord. It is not for me to enter into a defence of that plan; but on every occasion, in each successive year, when a vote of money has been asked for by the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the purposes of that plan, it has been invariably eulogised by the Right Honourable Gentleman, as having been unusually successful, and as having given great satisfaction to the public at large. There are many different points on which the present plan differs from that which was introduced by Lord Althorp in 1833; and what principally induces me to address the committee, is in consequence of my learning, for the first time, from the terms of the resolution, that it is intended to extend this plan to Scotland! It is with the deepest alarm and the most anxious apprehension that I view the attempt to extend this plan to Scotland. I will confidently venture to say that no person connected with Scotland was aware of this intention, or anticipated, until the resolution was read, that it was intended to extend this plan to that country. If I understand the vote correctly, it is to the effect that a sum of 30,000*l.* be granted for the purposes of education throughout Great Britain. If this sum be voted, it will be placed entirely at the disposal of the Committee of the Privy Council, to be distributed as they may think fit. The Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer smiles; but I say that the changes which this plan proposes to make do call forth the serious apprehensions of all connected with Scotland. There are two most important alterations in the present plan, which will most materially affect that country. When the Honourable Member who spoke from the other side of the House said that the suggestion of a system of national education is now, for the first time, made by her Majesty's Government, that Honourable Member was certainly mistaken in his statement. I will tell that Honourable Member, that for more than a century past, a system of national education has existed in Scotland—a system, too, which, whilst it has given satisfaction to the people of that country, has raised their moral character to the high degree of excellence for which the people of Scotland are so universally remarkable. The peculiar merit of the scheme of public education, that has so long existed in Scotland, is, that it is intimately connected and interwoven with the established church of that country. That system is a religious and scriptural system. It is under the immediate superintendence and direction of the church, and forms part of the ecclesiastical polity of the country. Well, let us now come to consider how the plan proposed to be carried into effect by this vote will interfere with the system established in Scotland. I presume that the people of Scotland will be excluded altogether from any participation in this grant, unless they submit to the supervision of the inspectors to be appointed by the Committee of the Privy Council, and which, I suppose, will go to supplant that supervision which is now vested in the Presbytery. I do not mean to say that the system of education which prevails in Scotland is altogether perfect, or as good a system as it might be made. But whatever defects belong to that system, they do not arise, in any respect, from the principles on which it is founded,—but from the circumstance that the money which the state has provided for the purposes of education in Scotland, is insufficient for the objects to which it is applied. The defects arise from these two causes;—first, on account of the scantiness of the provision, which enables the Scotch Society to give only very small salaries to the schoolmasters and teachers employed; and, secondly, on account of the increased population of the country, and there being no means of providing for the erection of additional schools. We, therefore, were prepared to receive thankfully the grants made in 1833 and 1834 for the erection of additional schools in Scotland, because these schools were to be conducted on the system that had hitherto prevailed, and under the superintendence and direction of our own clergy. There is no inconvenience felt with respect to the attendance in these schools. Many persons are separated from the church, not because they dissent from its doctrines, but because they dislike its discipline. But this makes no difference whatever with respect to the attendance of the children at these schools. As I have said, I presume, that if we get any part of this money, it will be only on the terms of our consenting to place the schools under the superintendence appointed by the Privy Council, and which will supersede the inspection of the Presbytery. We know that so unrestricted is the vote, that the Privy Council will have the power to withhold a grant to any school which shall refuse to adopt all the new lights which the Committee of the Privy Council may, from time to time, receive from the Central Society of Education.

Another objection arises from a consideration of the effect that will be produced by the determination of the Privy Council, as expressed in the minute of the 3d of June. It is expressly understood that there is to be a departure from the former system, and that this grant is not, as heretofore, to be confined to the National and the British and Foreign School Societies. The Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer smiles, as if to say, "What has Scotland to do with these schools?" But the Right Honourable Gentleman ought to take care how he distributes money to any schools which are not based upon the principle of the National and British and Foreign Society; namely, the principle of making a knowledge of the Scriptures an essential part of the system of education. The Right Honourable Gentleman, in supporting this plan, has departed from the principle on which he, himself, acted not very long ago. Little more than a year ago, an application was made to the Right Honourable Gentleman by a Roman Catholic clergyman in Edinburgh for a grant of money for the erection of a Roman Catholic school. What was the answer of the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer? Did he accede to this request? No such thing. He refused—and very properly refused—to grant any money for any school unless he had a security that that school would be conducted on the principle of the British and Foreign School Society. In effect, this was saying that he would grant no money for any school from which the Scriptures were to be excluded. I think that the Government ought at once to declare to the people of Scotland that their real object is, to pave the way for the establishment of Roman Catholic schools in Scotland. I have no doubt that that is the view of the Government in proposing this plan. Such, I am sure, is the consistent and conscientious wish of many Honourable Members of the other side of the House, who will be found amongst the supporters of this resolution. I well recollect that, in the discussion which took place on the measure for providing for the Highland schools, many of the general supporters of the Government objected to the Bill, because it did not provide for the means of educating Roman Catholic children. I think no Cabinet Minister will get up and declare that such are his intentions. I may safely say that there is not an individual in Scotland who has the least suspicion that this new scheme is intended to extend to that country; and I am confident that, when this fact shall be known, there will be a general burst of indignation from all classes of the Scottish people. I am sure that I speak the sentiments of ninety-nine out of every hundred inhabitants of Scotland, when I say, that they would much rather not receive a single shilling of this money, than receive it on the terms and under the conditions with which alone it is to be granted. This is a part of the subject which has not yet been touched on. I say, this plan will be met in Scotland with the strongest feelings of disgust and indignation: and if the country had been warned that such an intention existed on the part of the Government, meetings would have been held in every town, and the table of the House would be covered with petitions from every part of Scotland against the extension of this plan to that country. And I say, now, that, if the Noble Lord will only give sufficient time for ascertaining the opinion of Scotland, I pledge myself that there will be a unanimous expression of the public feeling of that country against his plan. As we have no intimation on the part of the Government that they have finally abandoned their plan of the minute of the 11th of April,—and believing, therefore, that they are determined to apply this money, when they can do so without danger to principle, according to that plan,—I feel no hesitation in giving my decided negative to this vote. In doing so, I am perfectly aware of the importance of the subject, and of the necessity of extending the advancement of education. Admitting, too, the propriety of a still larger vote, if the principle on which former votes were granted is still to be adhered to, but feeling a strong conviction of the evils which this plan will produce, I think myself fully justified in declaring my intention to vote against the Government.

Mr. SHEIL.—The Right Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down has adverted to the application of the 10,000*l.* to the purposes of education in Scotland, and has stated facts of importance, as showing that the intentions of the Government are not what they profess. But the Right Honourable Gentleman has stated one fact which completely destroys his own argument. He has stated that a Roman Catholic priest applied to the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer for a grant for a Roman Catholic school over which he presided; but the Right Honourable Gentleman has told us, also, that that application was refused. Why? Because no part of the public money was to be given for the support of Roman Catholic schools. Such was the reply of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Then, what right has the Right Honourable Gentleman to attribute the intention to the Government, of applying the vote in an improper manner? The Right Honourable Gentleman has spoken of the views of the Government. I cannot dive into those of the Right Honourable Gentleman, but I trust that he did not intend to raise a "No Popery" cry. I have listened to the speech of the Honourable and Learned Member for Liverpool with great attention; and for three reasons: — first, because that Honourable Gentleman is distinguished in his profession; secondly, because he is Member for Liverpool, where a mixed system of education has been tried; and, lastly, because I have taken the trouble to inquire into the facts regarding the establishment and operation of the mixed system in that town, and because the documents which are in my possession completely contradict every position which the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has laid down. There are corporate schools in Liverpool now that corporate reform has been granted; and there were corporation schools there before corporate reform was obtained. And what has taken place? Before the establishment of corporate reform, there were only three Roman Catholics out of 90,000 who received the benefit of instruction at those schools. If you want proof, here it is; — and for all the facts I state I have proof. Well, when corporate reform was passed, what took place? A council was formed; at the head of which Mr. Blackburne was placed. Here is his statement, as given in the pamphlet which I hold in my hand; here is the plan that was adopted: —

> The property committed to the management of the council does not belong to one party or sect, but to the whole community. The obvious duty of the council, therefore, is so to employ their funds as to render them subservient to the benefit of all. In considering the plan upon which the schools should be conducted, the first question that presented itself was — Is there any system we can adopt which will render them accessible to the children of all denominations, and make them the means of imparting a valuable elementary education, in which, without compromise of principle, all may participate? Unless a satisfactory answer could be given to this inquiry, the continuation of schools, under the management of the council, and supported by the public property, of which they are the trustees, was obviously impossible. To have continued them on the exclusive and sectarian basis on which they have hitherto rested, would have been an act of gross and palpable injustice, and a flagrant violation of their duty, as representatives of all classes of the people, and guardians of their rights. In looking at our state of society in Liverpool, it is impossible to forget that a very large, and not the least destitute, part of the population consists of Irish Roman Catholics, settled permanently amongst us; and, on the ground of justice, humanity, and sound policy, entitled to our sympathy and kindness. They are by birth our fellow subjects, and have now become our fellow citizens. Driven from their native land by a long course of tyranny and misrule, in the review of which every Englishman may well blush for his country, they present a claim to our most strenuous exertions for their moral and social improvement, and ought to be welcomed to the enjoyment of every advantage we can afford them. Can any benefit be offered to them more truly valuable than a sound and useful education for their children? and is it not in the highest degree desirable that it should be imparted to them in such a way as may tend to remove the asperities arising from national distinctions and religious differences, and amalgamate them, as far as possible, in habit and friendly feeling, with the native population? Regarding the Irish national system of education as peculiarly fitted for the attainment of both these objects, and convinced that it is founded on enlightened and truly scriptural principles, the Education Committee determined to recommend its adoption, and the council, by a large majority, confirmed their recommendation.

Such was the system of instruction adopted in one of the greatest towns in the British empire. How, then, has the system worked? The Honourable Member for Liverpool says, badly. Is that the fact? I wrote a letter to Mr. Rathbone, who has replied to the following effect. Mr. Rathbone was formerly mayor of the city, and is a most respectable gentleman, on whose testimony this House may rely.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON.—Hear, hear!

Mr. SHEIL. — I expected that cheer from the Noble Lord. Mr. Rathbone is politically opposed to the Noble Lord — I believe he voted against him; but I am sure the Noble Lord will not allow that circumstance to weigh with him in bearing his testimony to the high character of an honourable man. This is the answer I received from Mr. Rathbone: — ighest gratification in giving you any information in my power respecting our corporation chools. I have been on our Education Committee from the time the schools came under the anagement of the reformed town council; I peak, therefore, from my own knowledge, and ledge myself to the accuracy of my statements. We have the gratification of believing that ie system works admirably; and that, too, though pposed with reckless misrepresentation, and ith unscrupulous hostility. The Catholic lergy have acted with great liberality, and with most gratifying confidence in us, allowing and ncouraging the children to come to schools nder the direction of a committee at one time holly Protestant, and the teachers, also, have been eady to concede and conciliate wherever it could e done without the violation of a principle. We are bold enough to think that we have demonstrated the fact, that a system of national ducation is practicable; to give to all, the best ossible secular education, a morality which may uard against the dram-shop, and keep out of gaol, ithout interfering with each, each sect being well nstructed in their own peculiar religious dogas, and all proving that they are Christians by heir love to one another. The examinations are proved how well the religious instruction as in the mean time been completed. I believe here is not a school in Liverpool where there is he same quantity of sound religious instruction nd knowledge. Although you do not mention t in your letter, I may as well, even at the risk f being tedious, refer to the cry especially aised against us, — namely, that the Bible was xcluded from the schools. It is true that the Catholics are not compelled to read or hear read he authorised version of the Scriptures, but are urnished with the Douay version: but to the Protestants the authorised version is read; they re taught to read it, and have been from the irst day the schools came into our hands. I may repeat that they are not merely taught to read, but to understand what they read, and to pply its glorious precepts and principles to the laily duties of life. If at any time you should e going through Liverpool, and had an hour to ive to the object, on knowing that you were here, I should have great pleasure in waiting pon and showing you our schools; every one is dmitted to see them, even without introduction, n writing their names in a visitors' book, and t all hours. We have nothing to conceal, and ave, therefore, no mysteries. As I find my riend Mr. Thornely is returning to town, I send his by him. I send you a formidable list of documents; the first, the correspondence between Mr. Symonds and myself, will in fact nswer your letter, and is confirmed by his obervations. The letters in testimony of the criptual education are by very orthodox dissentng ministers, who are quite as far removed from Catholicism as the clergy of the Church of England, and I apprehend much more so, on (to hem) religious grounds. The defence of the chools is also by a very orthodox dissenter, Mr. Blackburne, the chairman at present of our Education Committee, and very much in earnest on the subject of his Protestant faith.

To R. L. Sheil, Esq.

Such are the results, according to a very high authority, of the system of instruction adopted at Liverpool. If a different system had been followed, how large a portion of the population would have been deprived of the elements of literary, moral, and religious knowledge! In Liverpool there is a very large Roman Catholic population, — I believe 90,000. In Manchester and Salford it is nearly as great, — 70,000. It is, indeed, notorious that the county represented by two Noble Lords on the other side of the House, who are opposed to any system by which Catholics can, consistently with their conscientious feelings, receive instruction, contains a vast Catholic population. I do not know the amount of the Catholic population of Great Britain. It has been estimated at 2,000,000.

[Cries of "Oh!"]

I, myself, do not believe that the number is so great; but I have a paper in my hand in which the number of Roman Catholics in England is estimated at 2,000,000. A writer in Fraser's Magazine has, in an article entitled "Statistics of Popery," said the number of Roman Catholics in England is difficult to be ascertained; but the amount cannot be less than 2,000,000. That is the statement of a supporter of Honourable Gentlemen opposite — of a Protestant writer, who is opposed to the spread of Roman Catholic doctrines — an uncompromising antagonist of the Roman Catholic church. But, although the number may not be so great, is that a reason why you should not provide for the education of Roman Catholic children? When you are establishing a system of national education, will you institute it upon such principles as to deprive so large a portion of the nation of its blessings; and that portion of the nation who, of those blessings, stand in peculiar need? The children of the Irish emigrants in this country are in a state of the utmost moral destitution; their parents can scarcely procure them food — much less, by their parents, is there a chance that with intellectual aliment they should be supplied. Surely this House, surely every man of common humanity, should pause before he pronounces against them an interdict so severe. You have admitted the Catholic gentleman to the highest places at the bar; you have raised him to the highest offices on the bench; you have received him in the senate house and in the Privy Council; you have placed him in stations of the highest dignity and honour in the palace; and will you, with an almost cruel anomaly, visit the offspring of the unfortunate Catholic emigrant with the last manifestations of legislative intolerance, and shut the door of the village school in the face of the poor Catholic child? Sir, this measure is resisted upon grounds in which I do not think that all the Honourable Gentlemen opposite concur. In the first sentence pronounced, a few nights ago, by the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, he took care to intimate that he was not responsible for all that was uttered on his side. To whom and what did he allude? He left us to conjecture how far he adopted or repudiated the views of his auxiliaries. The Right Honourable Gentleman did not very distinctly announce the principle on which his plan of education should be founded; he principally objected to the structure of the board. If the Right Honourable Baronet had said to us, "Put me a bishop or two on the board, and then I will agree to a plan in which all Dissenters shall be included,"—his suggestion would have been reasonable enough; but when he contents himself with saying that the Government ought to intrust the education of the people to an ecclesiastical board, he, by necessary implication, excludes from all share in the advantages of education, a large portion of his fellow creatures. Suppose, for example, the Bishop of London were to be a member of the board,—how could he agree to instruction in tenets which he professionally condemns? He may think, as he is a scholar, that the Douay version is fully as accurate as the authorised one; but, as a theologian, he must pronounce the Church of England to be incapable of a mistake in Hebrew, and to be infallible in her interpretation of the Hellenistic dialect, in which the New Testament is composed. You would, therefore, by putting him on the board, place him in a most embarrassing condition.

But the church, it is said, has a right to superintend the education of the people. The church has, until very recently, exhibited a profound apathy on the subject. Would there be so much ignorance in this country, as upon all hands is admitted to prevail, if the church had performed its duty? The church has been aroused from its torpor, not by its sense of the necessity of education, but by its jealousy of dissent; and when it reserves its interposition until the eleventh hour, we should be slow indeed in giving heed to claims to which the interests of so large a portion of the people must be sacrificed. But, independently of these considerations, the position laid down by the Right Honourable Baronet is at variance with the course which he acknowledges himself to be willing to pursue. He is ready to accede to a grant to the Foreign and British Society. But that society is not under the superintendence of the church. That position cannot be reconciled with the abstract doctrine of the Right Honourable Baronet, so far as any doctrine has been laid down by him. But this inconsistency is not confined to the Right Honourable Baronet. His auxiliaries, if such they may be called, do not only differ from each other, but from themselves. Look at the two Noble Lords the Members for North and South Lancashire, Lord Stanley and Lord F. L. Egerton. The latter, in 1825, moved that the Catholic church should be paid and maintained by the state; he proposed a grant of 250,000*l.* a year for this purpose; and now he denounces a small grant to be applied to the common education of all classes—Catholics included. But he is not so inconsistent as the Noble Lord who has been selected by the Tory party to lead them on, upon this conspicuous question. It was to the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire that the assault on education was confided; yet he was that member of the Whig Government, who, in 1831, established the Irish Education Board—established it on the ground that a mixed education was superior to every other; and by doing so, incurred denunciations from his new friends, the Wesleyan Methodists, as vehement as those of which he makes his old friends, the Whigs, the objects. He may tell us, indeed, that England and Ireland are differently circumstanced. Does he say so when the sinecure Irish church is concerned? No; he tells us this, whilst the children of poor Irish manufacturers in Manchester, or in Preston, are to be deprived of the benefit of every education grant to be made by the state. But when we are told that Ireland and England are differently situated, is it not obvious that it is upon grounds of expediency, and not of principle, that the assumed distinction is founded? I am very far from saying that the Irish system of education should be adopted generally throughout this country. But in particular localities, circumstanced exactly as districts in Ireland are confessed to be, such a plan ought to be adopted as should admit those children to the benefit of a parliamentary grant, who might otherwise be excluded from its advantages.

I pass from the Member for North Lancashire to the Member for Pembroke. That Right Honourable Gentleman was a Cabinet Minister when the Irish Education Board was established; and he acknowledged that that was a departure from the principle on which he, himself, insisted. But what is the value of a principle, if it be iolated in a hundred instances, and that y the very men who so dogmatically and o peremptorily and infallibly lay it down? hat Right Honourable Baronet spoke fter the Chancellor of the Exchequer, nd rose to institute such defence as cir-umstances would admit of, of the Member r Newark. The Chancellor of the Ex-hequer had ridiculed the stale conscience f the Member for Newark, and accumu-ited example upon example of grants ade to Catholic priests, and for the aintenance of the Catholic religion in ritish possessions, to which the Member r Newark was, himself, a party;—he as Under Secretary to the Colonies nder the Peel Administration, and re-resented that department in the House f Commons. And what did the Right lonourable Member for Pembroke say reply? Why, that all these instances ere a departure from principle, forsooth. ell, if you have treated principle, as you all it, with such utter recklessness in in-tances too tedious for enumeration, can ou not now, where the education of so arge a body of your fellow citizens is at take, put a little of your excessive sen-itiveness aside? For does the incon-istency stop there? The Irish education ommission was adopted by the Tories; ay, the grant was increased by them: very man in office was, in point of con-cience, responsible for a participation in hat proceeding; and the Member for New-rk was then in one of the most important nd responsible offices, which the Member or Tamworth could have confided to him. protest, Sir, I think that the Member or Newark, with all his fine subtlety, will ind it more difficult to reconcile his prin-iples as a Churchman with his conduct as statesmen, than he has found it to re-oncile, in his celebrated work, the right f private judgment with passive obedience o the church. Sir, I entertain for the Honourable Gentleman that respect which s due to his indisputable talent and to his unquestioned worth: but I own, that after having perused a work, of which I in great part approve, as redolent of Catholicism, as tried and proved for a thousand years; —(what an inference from that vast cycle of time must be derived?)—a work dedi-cated to the University of Oxford;—after having read a work in which the Church of England is represented as a continuity, through the medium of apostolical suc-cession, of the great primitive establish-ment; after having perused a book, in which even to the Scotch synod very few, if any, of the incidents to a church are conceded;—after, I say, having read all this, I was not a little surprised to hear the Honourable Gentleman pronounce a panegyric on the proselytes of John Wes-ley, who have separated themselves by boundaries the most marked from the church, who have disclaimed the autho-rity of your bishops, instituted an ordina-tion of their own, and established not only an alien, but a hostile, organisation of their priesthood. You have more reason to dread them than us. Why are you for ever, in reference to Popery, crying out that your church is in danger, and giving way to the most fantastic fears? What in the world makes you so much afraid? Why do you not, as you resemble us in so many other regards, in our fearlessness and security, follow our example? It was in reference to our church that your fa-mous Dryden exclaimed—

> Without — unspotted, innocent within,
> She feared no danger, for she knew no sin.

Surely your consciousness is not the source of your dismay. You have nothing to fear, armed as you are, I presume, in innocence, from any cause, much less from the education of the unhappy Popish poor. Your church, your Anglican church (for I can scarce call it Pro-testant), is incorporated with the state; it is supported by the interests of the higher orders, and the faith of the humble classes; in "the worst of Courts and Parliaments it lifts its untired head;" it possesses vast revenues; it rules over the two most famous universities in the world; it presides over the great patri-cian seminaries of the land; it has re-tained all the pomp, pride, and glorious circumstance of the establishment of which it is a perpetuation,—archbishops, bishops, deans, cathedrals, chapters, golden stalls; it is distinguished by a prelacy eminent for learning, and, what is more important, by the activity, the energy, and spirit of organised con-federacy amongst the parochial clergy. Such is your establishment; and can you bring yourselves to believe that such a fabric, based on the national belief, and towering amidst aristocratic sustainment, can be subverted,—not by foreign in-vasion, not by intestine commotion, not by a great moral concussion, but can be prostrated on the rock of truth, on which you believe it to be raised, by a discharge of Douay Testaments and Popish Missals,—by a set of shoeless, shirtless Popish paupers, gathered, under the command of the Privy Council, from the lanes of Liverpool, the alleys of Man-chester and of Salford, or the receptacles of St. Giles's? These fears, this ague of apprehension for your church, is idle, and would be ridiculous, but for the fatal results which it produces, and the constant injustice which it works. It stops the progress of national improvement; and, even amongst men of kind and humane feelings, wherever the interests of the establishment are involved, produces to all considerations, except those interests, an utter insensibility. Take, as an example, the Noble Member for Dorset, who is so remarkable for the benevolent concern he feels for the poor factory children. It does great credit to his heart, that he should feel so deep a sympathy for those unfortunate beings, who, in the spring of life — in the season when, if ever, joy should bud out of the heart — are immured in those dismal factories dedicated to the genius of insatiable gain. How often, and how eloquently, has the Noble Lord expatiated upon the moral destitution to which those poor children are reduced! It is in vain that his appeals are met by remonstrances from those who have embarked their whole property in these speculations, and who tell him that their ruin may be the result of his rash and precipitate humanity. Of everything but its suggestions he is regardless; and in his honourable enterprise, undeterred by every obstacle, with the chivalry of benevolence, pertinaciously perseveres. But, alas! what a contrast he presents the instant the prerogatives of the church are touched! His sensibility at once evaporates; to the imaginary hazards of the establishment, he immolates the interests of thousands and of tens of thousands of helpless beings, and refuses to stretch forth his hand to raise them from the depth of ignorance and of depravity in which they are immersed. Has the Noble Lord ever been in that part of this vast metropolis in which Irish emigration is chiefly deposited? Has he ever traversed that melancholy district, in which, at every step, the eye, the ear, the heart — every physical and moral sense — is shocked? Has he ever looked down into those recesses, in which hordes of miserable children are accumulated in heaps of wretchedness? or has he ever looked up to the dwellings which swarm with diseased vitality, and through sashless windows seen the face of squalid, emaciated, vacant childhood staring with the glare of ignorance and misery upon him? If he were to observe, and become familiar with, such spectacles, his overrighteous habits would give way, — his natural emotions would get the better of true religion, which is identified with his prejudices, — and he would feel that charity and with mercy, requires that, for the instruction of those unfortunate creatures, something on the part of the Legislature is imperatively required. I have heard much in the course of this discussion of the dogmas of theology. I do not profess to be conversant with them; but I sometimes read the Bible, in every page of which the lessons of mercy are so admirably inculcated; and it strikes me that, if there be a passage in which the character of our Saviour is described in a peculiarly amiable light, it is that in which he is represented as desiring his disciples "not to forbid little children to come unto him." I think — I cannot help help thinking — that if, among the little group, on whose heads he was invoked to lay his hands, there had been the child of a Sadducee or of a Samaritan, the God of mercy and of love would not have put the little schismatic aside! Do not imitate the example of those by whom the children were rebuked; — suffer them to approach him; let them have access to the mines of pure morality, and of that truth which is common to all Christians; do not close the avenues to that knowledge which leads to happiness "when time shall be no more;" and, instead of engaging in acrimonious contentions about ecclesiastical prerogatives and pretensions, let us act on the precept contained in the Divine injunction, — "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Mr. GOULBURN. — It is because I feel deeply that the sentiment which is conveyed in that passage of holy writ just quoted by the Honourable Gentleman is distinctly opposed to that system of education which the Government has proposed, and because I am convinced that such a system, instead of bringing children within the circle of religious knowledge, is calculated to exclude them from it, — that I feel bound to dissent from this vote. I have listened to the whole debate upon this question, from the beginning to the close; and I confess that, at this late hour, I feel it impossible clearly to understand what are the views of the Government on the plan which was originally proposed to the House. I have heard statements from one Honourable Member and another respecting it; but I cannot, even now, make out whether the plan is to be abandoned or enforced. I cannot understand, from what has fallen from the Noble Lord, that he disclaims the minute of the 3d of June. But, from the Honourable Secretary for the India Board it appears that the original plan is not altogether abandoned. The question, then, is, — is it abandoned, or is it not? Let it be known, distinctly, whether the Government mean to apply the grant strictly according to the practice of preceding years, or to adopt, with respect to its application, that course which was so clearly laid down in the first minute of the Privy Council, and which has been subsequently alluded to in terms so distinct, as to leave no doubt on the mind of any man, that such is the plan which, if left to themselves, they are determined to follow. The committee is now called upon to vote for a grant of 30,000*l*. What was the former course of the Government? They laid down the principles on which the vote was asked, and described the manner in which it was to be applied. Let the committee read the vote of last year: — "That a sum be granted to his Majesty to enable his Majesty to issue money for the erection of school-houses in aid of private subscriptions for that purpose, for the education of the poorer classes of England," and, I may add, of Scotland also. Now, what is the vote this night? There is no reference to the principles on which the vote is to be granted; there is no limitation whatever to the Government; but it is simply this, — "For public education, 30,000*l*." We, on this side, have been taxed with having suspicions of the Government. Are there not grounds for suspicion in these two discordant votes? With all the respect which I am bound to show to the members of her Majesty's Government, I must say that I am justified in taking every means which are in my power of protecting my own views. When I consider the history of this question, — although I hear, now, that the money is to be applied on principles analogous to those on which the grants have been formerly applied, — I cannot yield my assent to this vote, either constitutionally, or with reference to my own convictions. I believe there is a studied reserve, in this matter, on the part of the Government. I have observed it in each successive speaker; and I firmly believe, as stated by an Honourable Gentleman behind me, as well as from different quarters of the House, that the intention of the vote this night is, — to pave the way for the plan originally proposed; and I believe that the committee, so far from abandoning that plan, are prepared to carry it into operation as soon as a favourable opportunity shall offer. We have been taxed with wishing to reject all votes for education. It has been imputed to us, that, in opposing this vote, we are prepared to abandon that to which we have virtually assented formerly. This I most positively deny. Let the Government come down to the House with a vote stating its object, as hitherto they have done, — and so far from finding me its opponent, I shall be as ready as the Ho- Honourable and Learned Member for Tipperary to give it my support. But, by the mode her Majesty's Government has, in this instance, thought fit to pursue, there is no other course open to me but a resistance to the vote now proposed. The Honourable and Learned Member must know that, in a Committee of Supply, it is not for Honourable Members to alter the appropriation of the conditions upon which a grant to the Crown is made by the House. It is for the Crown, by its Ministers, to propose a grant, and it is for the House to exercise a discretion only as to whether the amount of that grant can be approved, or not. In this instance, the amount of the grant is nothing; but the principle is everything. To that principle there is no mode of objecting but by a resistance to the vote, — a resistance which, I beg to say, does not prejudice the question of a grant for public education; for the Government might bring forward a vote, as formerly, on the next Supply day. Under these circumstances, I hope Honourable Members opposite will not, now, say that we, on this side of the House, are acting inconsistently with the course formerly pursued, or that we have any unwillingness to concur in that assistance to education which, for many years, has been granted, with the unanimous concurrence of both sides.

My Honourable and Learned Friend, the Member for Liverpool, has alluded to another objection to this vote, which I think well worthy the serious consideration of the House, although it has been adverted to by the Honourable Member for Northampton, as being wholly untenable. My Honourable and Learned Friend has properly said that the committee is not in such a situation to express an opinion upon the details of the scheme as it would have been if the Government had introduced a Bill for national education. If that had been the case, it would have been open to every individual Member to state his sentiments upon the plan; and still more, it would have afforded the other House of Parliament an opportunity, also, of expressing an opinion upon it. The Government, however, have thought that a different mode of proceeding suited them best, and, following the advice of the society from whose Report my Honourable and Learned Friend (Mr. Cresswell) has read an extract, they have brought the question to a simple "ay" or "no" on the vote of the House of Commons, alone. Now I must say, that this method of proceeding is likely to be productive of serious consequences in reference to the conducting of the business of this House. I know, as well as the Honourable Member for Northampton, that the right of granting supplies belongs exclusively to this House, and that this House will not permit the other House of Parliament to meddle with its privilege in that respect; but I also know that the constitution gives to the other House the right to negative or affirm any vote of this House when submitted to them by a Bill; and formerly it would have had the power to negative or affirm this vote. But the House of Peers has excluded itself from that power, inasmuch as, not many years ago, they concurred in inserting a clause in the Ways and Means Bill—a general permission to the Government to issue the money voted by this House, without waiting for the Appropriation Bill. That proceeding has been productive of great utility to the public service, for it enables the Government to apply the money voted without the necessity of a separate Appropriation Bill. But if this House, by means of a pecuniary Bill, should deprive the other House of the opportunity of the expression of its opinion upon the question mainly at issue, I can tell the Honourable Member for Northampton that he must not be surprised if, in vindication of their own privileges, they refuse hereafter to concur in that clause which is inserted, at the commencement of every Session, in the Ways and Means Bill, and revert to the former practice under which money voted could only be used in the mode and for the purposes which are defined in the Act of Parliament. Here, in this instance, no man can doubt that the money is not the main object, but that, in fact, that is only an accessory to the question — a question to which my proposition most strongly applies; for, as the clergy of the country are not represented in this House, it is, of all questions, that which ought to come under the careful consideration of the other House of Parliament, in which the clergy may express an opinion on a matter so deeply affecting not only the political, but the moral and religious, feelings of those who are placed under their charge.

The speech of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman opposite leaves me in doubt as to the course the Honourable and Learned Gentleman would recommend; for, in adverting to the case of Scotland, the Honourable and Learned Member denounced, as monstrous, the proposition that the Roman Catholic rule should be applied there; but when he turned to England, he called upon the House to take pity on the wretched Roman Catholic children in Manchester and other places. Does the Honourable and Learned Member mean, that that which is good for the one country is not good for the other, and that the Government should act in England differently from the mode in which it would act in Scotland? or does he mean that there should be such a united system of education in both countries, that the children of the Roman Catholic population might associate with children of other persuasions; and that, avoiding in their instructions all peculiarities of doctrine, each child should be left to find its own way to the truths of religion? If that be the view of the Honourable Gentleman, then he adheres to the minute of the month of April, which contains the basis of that description of education which it is the object of the Government to promote; and if that be the Honourable Gentleman's feeling, I do not believe he would find, on the part of the members of the Church of England, any readiness — nay, he would find every possible unwillingness — to enter into those schools where such a system of education was practised. I say that, if the schools were accessible to the teachers of every description of faith, — if every version of the Scriptures were admitted into them, — the Honourable Member would as effectually exclude from those schools the children of the members of the established church, as he would, in Scotland, exclude the children of Roman Catholics. Is, then, the House prepared to adopt a system which must exclude the children of the Church of England? Is that the Honourable Member's view of toleration? I tell the Honourable Member, that such would be the result; for I, for one, — and I know the great majority of the people entertain the same feeling, — will never submit that the children of the Church of England should be sent to schools merely to receive secular and general religious instruction — to schools from which instruction in the peculiar doctrines of the Church of England is excluded. I firmly believe, from experience, that unless the foundation of education be laid upon the doctrines of the Gospel, the character of the poor and ignorant cannot be improved. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman has asked why it is desired that in the Board of Education there should be some bishop of the church? and has inquired whether the bishop, in that case, would not be bound to enforce his own religious doctrines, and to take care that those doctrines should not be interfered with? I ask the Honourable and Learned Gentleman what distinction can he draw between the doctrines professed by a bishop and those professed by a member of the Church of England? If the Honourable and Learned Gentleman's argument on that point be good for anything, it is this, — that the Government has selected four individuals to form a Board of Education, who are so careless of the doctrines of the church — so regardless of their own faith — so lax in their views of religion — that they would permit the Honourable and Learned Gentleman to introduce into the schools some general system of education that omitted instruction in the peculiar doctrines of the church to which they belonged. If I wanted an argument to induce me to complain of a proposal for confiding to a board of laymen the superintendence of education, it would be the belief that the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, the patron of the plan, expresses as to its results. Is there no fear from the admission of opposing sects into a common school of instruction? In Austria, is there so little apprehension exhibited, as to cause them to take no care as to the admission of opposing sects? Will the Honourable and Learned Member turn to Sardinia and the Papal states, where the securities are the greatest, and the danger, consequently, less? — will he turn to those countries, and say that they do not exhibit a fear which even their confidence in the justice of their faith cannot dispel? No; and therefore I desire to protect, in the same way, the children of the established church in instruction in the doctrines of that church. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman has also thought proper to advert to the observations which fell, on a former evening, from my Noble Friend the Member for Dorsetshire; and the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has told the House that the natural tendency of differences in religion is to convert a man, otherwise humane and beneficent, into one devoid of feeling and kindness; and the Honourable and Learned Gentleman selected my Noble Friend (Lord Ashley) as an exemplification. I entirely concur in, and wish I could as eloquently express, the praises lavished on my Noble Friend by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman for his exertions on behalf of the children engaged in factory labour. I admire the consistency and earnestness with which my Noble Friend has endeavoured to protect them from oppression, and I equally admire the anxious regard my Noble Friend has shown for the morality of those very children.

[Loud cries of "Divide, divide!" and, "Hear, hear!"]

I have no disposition to interfere with the desired termination of the debate; but I am anxious, on my own part, to state, in a very few words, the grounds on which I object to this vote. I object to it, because I think the scheme proposed will make it impossible for the members of the church to avail themselves of it — that, in short, it amounts to an exclusion of them from the national schools; and therefore, so far from being consistent with the principles of toleration, it directly forms a restriction upon the established church. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman has intimated that the opponents of this plan are raising the cry of "No Popery!" I must tell the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, that if the Government establish a system, the effect of which will be to exclude the children of religious members of the established church from the advantages of national education, they will raise a cry of "No Popery" on the part of that, the only class excluded, — they will create a feeling in the country that the system is a departure from every principle which ought to direct education, and that, therefore, there is danger to the church establishment.

[Loud cries of "Divide!"]

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I have no wish, now, to enter into the general part of the discussion; but one or two questions have been put by the Honourable and Learned Member for Liverpool (Mr. Cresswell), and the Right Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down, which, though I am astonished that they should have been so propounded, I think I am bound to give some explanation upon. The Honourable and Learned Member for Liverpool, in stating his wonder at the course which has been taken by the Government, doubted, extremely, whether the Government had given up the plan contained in the minute of April, or still adhered to it; and whether, if this vote were to be passed, they would not act on that minute. Now, if the Honourable and Learned Gentleman wishes to know the intention of the Government, he would have done better had he consulted the Report of the Committee of Privy Council of the 3d of June, rather than the extract he has read from the Report of the Central Society of Education, which he seems to think a great authority on this subject. The fact is, that, in the minute of the 3d of June, the purposes to which this vote is to be applied are expressly stated; and I will take the liberty of reading that part of it, which sets forth exactly what the application of the money shall be. The Report says,—

The Lords of the committee recommend that the sum of 10,000*l.* granted by Parliament in 1835 towards the erection of normal or model schools, be given in equal proportions to the National Society and the British and Foreign School Society. That the remainder of the subsequent grants of the years 1837 and 1838, yet unappropriated, and any grant which may be voted in the present year, be chiefly applied in aid of subscriptions for building, and, in particular cases, for the support of, schools connected with those societies; but that the rule hitherto adopted of making a grant to those places where the largest proportion is subscribed, be not invariably adhered to, should application be made from very poor and populous districts, where subscriptions to a sufficient amount cannot be obtained.

[Cries of "Read on!"]

Well, I will read on.

The committee do not feel themselves precluded from making grants in particular cases, which shall appear to them to call for the aid of Government, although the applications may not come from either of the two mentioned societies.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

I think this statement is sufficiently clear; the general object of the application of this money will be, in aid of the erection of schools, supported by the National and the British and Foreign School Societies; but the committee conceived there might be cases of certain schools not in connection with either of those societies, to which, however, some of the money might be granted in aid. The great bulk of the sums here granted will be given in aid of these societies: but some small portion, it was thought, might be otherwise applied; and the committee felt that they would not be doing justice to the whole community, if they had said, "We will exclude any school which shall not prove itself to be in connection with one or other of those societies." For instance, it might be, that a manufacturer might desire to have a school connected with his factory, which might be on an extensive scale, and in which some hundreds of children might be employed; and such a party might properly ask some aid from the Committee of Privy Council, though the school would not be connected with either of the two societies which have been named. But then I may be asked, whether the committee would not think themselves justified in proceeding with the plan of the month of April, if they conceived, at any time, that there was a general concurrence in favour of it? I should say it was quite obvious, that this sum of money being granted in the terms of the Report, such a course might be in their power; but it would not come within the scope of the vote, to make any such appropriation. The Right Honourable Gentleman has said that the money so granted is strictly limited by the minute.

Mr. GOULBURN. — By vote of the House.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I will come to that. It was granted by vote of the House; and so stringent were the conditions, that it could not be misapplied. Now this is the vote of last year,—"That a sum not exceeding 20,000*l.* be granted to her Majesty, to provide for the erection of school-houses, in aid of private subscriptions, and for the inspection of those already erected." These were the two objects of the grant; — "to provide for the erection of school-houses, in aid of private subscriptions, and for the inspection of schools;" and if to these terms I were to add two words, — "to provide for the inspection of schools already established, and which may be established," —our present object would be gained. With regard to the former vote, though it does not contain the whole of what is to be in this Report of the Privy Council; still, if our taking the vote in the words in which it was taken last year will remove the objection of the Right Honourable Gentleman, he shall have these words, instead of those now proposed; — so little do I take this matter to be fettered by the terms of this vote. Then, with respect to the minute of April the 10th, as to the normal schools, I have been often asked, whether I did think that the committee agreed to all the provisions under which that grant was proposed to be applied? Now the Report is this: —

The committee are of opinion that the most useful application of any sums voted by Parliament would consist in the employment of those moneys in the establishment of normal schools, under the direction of the state, and not placed under the management of a voluntary society.

They do not pledge themselves to any rules; therefore it would be competent to the Privy Council, in future years, to provide rules other than those now laid before the House. There is only one other question which has been asked me, and which I thought I had answered the other night. It is, with regard to the nature of the inspection to be adopted in the schools; it being supposed that it would interfere with the religious instruction. I do not conceive that it would at all interfere with, or at all oppose, the religious instruction in the schools, whether under the National or the British and Foreign Society's system; for their plans, rules, and regulations would remain precisely as they now are. I certainly conceived that, with respect to the National Society, if this vote should pass, I should be bound to conform to the rules laid down with respect to any sum granted to that Society. I have been obliged to refer again to the Report, because, although there have been many representations and arguments as to what should be done, I have observed that all Honourable Gentlemen have been cautious to avoid entering upon any minute discussion of the plan before the House.

The committee then divided: — Ayes 275; Noes 278; — Majority for the resolution 2.

AYES.

SUPPLY.

Resolution reported: —

That a sum, not exceeding 70,000*l.*, be granted to her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge of civil contingencies, to the 31st day of March, 1840.

Resolution agreed to.

METROPOLIS POLICE BILL (ADVANCES OUT OF THE CONSOLIDATED FUND).

Resolutions reported: —

1. That, in aid of the charge of maintaining the metropolitan police, there shall be paid out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, an additional yearly sum, not exceeding the rate of two-pence in the pound upon the additional rental which may be assessed in any place which may hereafter become part of the metropolitan police district:

2. That an annual salary, not exceeding 1200*l.*, be paid out of the said Consolidated Fund to each of the Commissioners of Police appointed to execute the Act for improving the Police of the Metropolis:

3. That an annual sum, not exceeding 20,000*l.*, be paid out of the said Consolidated Fund towards defraying the charge of the metropolitan police force, on account of the horse patrol and the Thames police; and also such further sum as may be necessary for the payment of superannuation allowances to certain officers of the police.

Resolutions agreed to; instruction to the Committee on the Metropolis Police Bill, That they have power to make provision therein pursuant to the said resolutions.

Bill subsequently presented, and read a first time; to be read a second time on Monday next, and to be printed.

PUBLIC OFFICES (DOWNING STREET).

On the question, "That a select committee be appointed to consider plans for certain public offices proposed to be erected in Downing Street," —

COLONEL SIBTHORP said: — It appears to me to be very late in the Session to appoint a select committee on any subject, — more especially for such a purpose as this. For my own part, I would rather see Downing Street contracted both in space and quality; for whenever I go there, I always think I am in a neighbourhood worse than St. Giles's. I suppose this committee will propose additional accommodation and luxuries for the members of her Majesty's Government. I think they have luxuries enough, and are far too well paid at the present moment. Very excellent men have been able to perform their duties in Downing Street, contracted and inconvenient as that locality is, and I do not see why the present Government should require better accommodation.

The motion was then agreed to; committee to be nominated to-morrow.

ECCLESIASTICAL DUTIES AND REVENUES BILL.

Mr. LAW. — I rise to ask the Noble Lord whether it is intended to proceed with the Ecclesiastical Revenues Bill during the present Session? I had understood that the intention was merely to propose the Bill, for the purpose of enabling Honourable Gentlemen to bring forward any suggestions they might wish to make. I have, myself, an important amendment to propose; but I should not think of drawing the attention of the House to my objections to the Bill, as it now stands, unless it were seriously intended to proceed with it. The Bill at present stands for Wednesday; and I think it would be very desirable if the Noble Lord would state whether or not he means to bring it forward on that day. I think it would be much better for the Bill to stand over for the present Session; and, in the mean time, I have no doubt that the deans and chapters will be enabled to devise a plan which will fully answer the purpose in view, and be free from the many objections to which the Government measure is open to. I am not authorised to make any such proposition; but I believe I speak correctly, when I say that the feeling of that body accords with my own on this subject.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I cannot, now, state positively that the stage of the Bill which is fixed for Wednesday will be proceeded with on that day. I had, however, hoped that the Honourable and Learned Gentleman would have been prepared to announce his views on the subject, notwithstanding. As it is, I must reserve to myself the right of considering what course it may be best to pursue. If the Government determine to proceed with the Bill, I will take care that the Honourable and Learned Gentleman shall have timely notice.

PAPERS, &c.

Public Works (Ireland). — Act (1 and 2 Vic. c. 88.) read; committee thereupon on Wednesday.

CATHOLIC PRESENTATIONS.

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. — I beg to remind the Noble Viscount at the head of her Majesty's Government, that he promised to make inquiry respecting a certain living in Ireland, to which I alluded more particularly in a former case.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — It appears to me that the circumstances of that case are such as can only be determined by a court of justice.

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. — I beg to assure the Noble Viscount that it is by no means such a common-place case as he imagines. It is distinguished from all others of the kind that ever occurred.

LORD PORTMAN. — I rise to order. I really would submit to the Noble Marquess, that it is not expedient to enter upon a case, now, which may afterwards come before your Lordships on appeal from a court below.

LORD COLBORNE. — I beg to move the Order of the Day.

The EARL of WICKLOW. — I think the Noble Lord is out of order. It is usual to take petitions before Orders of the Day.

LORD COLBORNE. — I understand that the High Sheriffs' Expenses Bill stands for second reading this evening.

The EARL of RADNOR. — Certainly; but there ought to be some regularity as regards your Lordships' proceedings. It is a uniform practice that petitions precede Orders of the Day. I have several petitions to present.

LORD BROUGHAM. — As to contending that Orders of the Day stand first, why, nobody ever heard of such a thing. To take Orders of the Day first, when your Lordships are summoned on a petition, would be an irregular proceeding indeed.

The MARQUESS of SALISBURY. — For my part, I think it is at the option of your Lordships to take either course.

POSTAGE.

On presenting petitions for reduction of the rate of, — of persons employed in the establishment of the harp manufactory of Mr. Erard, 10. Great Marlborough Street; William Bone, 3. Broadway, Ludgate Hill; carpet warehouse, Great Marlborough Street; Messrs. Baylis, Culley, and Co., printing ink makers, Old Montague Street, Whitechapel: bookbinders at 13. Leicester Street, Regent Street: Messrs. Day and Morris, coal merchants, at Pimlico: of druggists, proprietors, and others of 135. Lower Thames Street: of the principal and clerks at the class and chandelier establishment, New Bond Street: of persons frequenting the coffee shop of Anthony Batty, Richmond Street, Saint James's: of inhabitants of Fetter Lane, London; Golden Square, Saint James's; and Jersey (eighteen petitions): of residents in the metropolis (six petitions); and of persons signing, —

The EARL of RADNOR said: — I wish to take this opportunity of putting a question to my Noble Friend the Noble Viscount at the head of her Majesty's Ministers. Great anxiety prevails in the city of London, and the manufacturing districts, to know what are the plans of the Government with regard to postage. The resolutions to be proposed in the House of Commons not having been yet declared, and there having been no application for a Bill, the petitioners are afraid that the Government will not have the necessary powers to carry the plan into effect for some time, and that it may be deferred or another year and a half. Is this so?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — Undoubtedly, it is the intention of the Government to carry into effect the plan referred to by my Noble Friend — considering how it has been recommended, the strong interest it has excited, and the benefits and advantages which unquestionably belong to it — with all practicable speed. My Noble Friend is perfectly aware that the introduction of this plan will make so great a change, that much preparation is absolutely necessary. I understand that my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has, in another place, given notice that he will bring forward this question at no very distant day. The House, and also the public, will then be put in possession of the intentions of the Government on the subject — of the measures they purpose taking; — and I think it would be more convenient not to enter into any discussion at present. At the same time, I can state that the Government do mean to adopt measures in the present Session of Parliament, that will give them all power necessary for making the preparations required for carrying out this plan.

The EARL of RIPON. — I beg to ask whether it is understood that this alteration is to be contingent upon any loss of revenue that may be sustained, being made up from some other source? I understood that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had pledged himself in that contingency.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — Most certainly.

THE BALLOT.

EARL STANHOPE. — In conformity with the notice I have given to your Lordships, I rise to present certain petitions. The earliest in date was delivered to me last year, — however, in the exercise of the discretionary power confided to me, I have thought it better not to present it before. It is from the inhabitants of Stoke-upon-Trent and Bonsall, praying for universal suffrage, vote by ballot, and short Parliaments; besides the following prayer, in which I most cordially concur — for a repeal of the Poor Law Amendment Act; that the rights of the petitioners may be restored to expend their own money amongst their own poor; and that there may be an alteration in the law respecting illegitimate children. These petitioners conclude with a prayer which will, no doubt, be agreeable to some Noble Lords opposite, — namely, for the immediate emancipation of the negroes; and the relief of our Canadian fellow subjects. The next petition is from the ratepayers of the township of Almondbury, in the parish of Almondbury, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, praying for universal suffrage, vote by ballot, short Parliaments, and the abolition of all property qualifications for Members. The next is from the London Working Men's Association, with a similar prayer; but also praying, in addition, that the country may be divided into electoral districts, each containing a certain number of inhabitants. The next petition is one which I received only two or three days ago; it is from a person not altogether unknown, I believe, to your Lordships, — namely, John Joseph Stockdale, — praying for vote by ballot, under certain restrictions. The next petition which I have to present, though signed only by the chairman, was unanimously resolved on at a public meeting, consisting of 800,000 persons, in the parish of Manchester; and from the number of the persons who adopted it, and the prayer it contains, it ought to receive the attentive consideration of your Lordships. The chairman who presided at that meeting is a person for whom I entertain the greatest private friendship and regard, and who, from his patriotism and public spirit, is entitled to the admiration of his country, — I mean one of the Honourable Members for Oldham, Mr. John Fielden. The prayer of the petition is, that every male person unconvicted of crime shall have a right of voting for the election of Members to serve in Parliament; that such votes shall be taken by secret ballot; that no Parliament shall continue longer than for one year; that all property qualifications of Members shall be abolished; and that due remuneration shall be made to Members for their labour. I formerly told your Lordships that it was my firm conviction, that unless Parliament redressed the grievances of the country, the arguments for reform in Parliament would become unanswerable; and I need not observe to your Lordships that my anticipations have been since fully confirmed. I know that it has been said, on my side of the House, that the French revolution of July was the cause of English reform; but that appears to me to be only one more example of that common error of considering as cause and effect two matters that are wholly unconnected. We have not experienced in this country that infraction of constitutional rights which occasioned and justified the French revolution; but, on the other hand, the French have not suffered under the like grievous distress with which this country was afflicted in the course of the same year, and which was so forcibly and feelingly represented to Parliament in the numerous petitions laid on your Lordships' table in the course of that Session, many of which I had the honour to present. The real cause of that extensive English distress was most correctly stated by a person who had the sagacity to detect it, and the candour to avow it, — by one who was, and is still, a zealous Reformer, who had been, formerly, a Member of the Cabinet, and who declared that without Peel's Bill we never should have had reform. Undoubtedly, without the great and general discontent, which was engendered by the severe distress that naturally and necessarily resulted from that edict of confiscation (for it can be designated by no other name), this country would not have been prepared to receive, or disposed to allow, an experiment to be tried on the constitution, so extensive in its nature, and so perilous in its effects, as the Reform Act. Before the Reform Bill was proposed, and when a Reform Cabinet must have been considered as a most improbable, and almost impossible contingency, a petition was adopted at a great public meeting in Kent at which I presided, and afterwards presented to your Lordships, expressing a strong desire for reform in Parliament, provided it should be founded on proper principles, and prudently conducted. Such a reform would have been good; but the Reform Act which passed was not founded on true principles, and was carried by clamour and agitation. Had I not been impressed with the dangers of the country at the time, — had I not found that Parliament had refused to inquire into the cause of the grievances of the country, or into the remedies which they required, — had I not felt that the salus populi was the suprema lex, — I would not have voted for the Reform Act.

I was struck with a remark which recently fell from the Honourable Member for Birmingham (Mr. T. Attwood), at a public meeting. He said, "I am considered a man of extreme opinions. I admit that I am so; but I have become so in consequence of the events of the last twenty years. I should not have held these extreme opinions if Pitt had lived, — for he preserved the country, and would have continued to preserve it; but when he died, there was no man left to fight its battles." Although, for the reasons I have stated, I voted for the second reading of the Reform Bill, yet by admitting its principle I did not consider myself pledged to its details. It was my intention to have proposed certain resolutions in the committee; but when the Bill was read a second time, and when a Noble and Learned Lord, not now in his place, suggested some not very important alterations in the committee, what was the result? Why, it was intimated, that if any change were to be made in the Bill, such a number of Peers would be created as would be sufficient to carry it in its original form; and thus the independence of the House of Lords would have been swamped. That was a threat which, in days of constitutional purity, would have been followed by the impeachment of the Minister who should have given such advice to his Sovereign. Yet, even if such a threat had been acted upon, and the new Peers had been created, I believe that the Peers would still have been able to assert their independence; for, though the prerogative of the Crown to create Peers would have been admitted, yet, if a number had been thus created for political purposes, I am of opinion that the Peers already existing would have been justified in refusing to sit with them. I say this, lest the suggested example should be followed by any future Minister. I was in the House when it was proposed to postpone the consideration of schedule A, and I saw no ground for postponing it; but when I heard of the threat to which I allude, I did not vote at all, because I could not support those from whom that threat came.

Let me now call the attention of your Lordships to the resolutions of Mr. Pitt in 1782. They had for their object the prevention of bribery and corruption, and the lessening the expenses of elections; but, since then, bribery has increased tenfold. Can your Lordships, then, be surprised that the call for the Ballot has become general throughout the country? Can your Lordships doubt that there are many in the country who possess abilities, and integrity, and patriotism, which would render their services of the utmost importance to the state? Yet these men are kept away by the enormous expenses of the elections; and have no chance of coming into Parliament unless they attach themselves to some party, or come in in the train of some political leader. It is not my wish to speak to the disparagement of any one class; but I will not give to any one class a power, exclusively, which should be shared by all. The line drawn in the Reform Bill of a 10*l.* franchise is partial and arbitrary: it swamps the influence of all above that amount, and excludes that of all below it; and it creates discontent and dissatisfaction to all but the favoured class. It is perfectly clear that such a system of representation cannot possess that "finality" which its advocates thought it would have. When your Lordships consider what is the composition, what the character, and what the conduct of the House of Commons, can you be surprised that they have lost, or, rather, that they never have possessed, the confidence of the people, and that they should have now fallen into—I will not say merited—contempt? If any one has any doubts of all this, let him call a meeting in any district thickly peopled by Whigs; and let him, with the aid of his satellites, try whether he can raise again the senseless cry of "The Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill!"—and he will be disappointed. I am aware that many attempts have been made to extend the principle of the Reform Act; but any measure which would enable one class to swamp all above it would be bad, and would be only a stepping stone to universal suffrage. My opinion upon that question I will state in a very few words. I object to it on this ground,—that it would give to that class, which has the majority of numbers, a preponderating power, such as could not be possessed by any one class without great injury to the rest of the country; but if this power were possessed by that class, which comprises in its own ranks the physical force of the country, property would remain without that protection to which it is entitled. When some of the members of the National Convention for the labouring classes called upon me, I explained to them my views. I stated, frankly and freely, my objection to universal suffrage. I said, "These are my opinions, and I would not alter them if I were now standing beneath the gallows." I am opposed to universal suffrage, in the sense in which it is usually understood; yet no man would support more strongly than I would the right of the labouring class—and, indeed, of every other interest—to be represented in Parliament; but, in this, I do not mean more than that each interest should be fully represented, not collectively, but in classes, so that there would be no danger of one class being swallowed up or swamped by another. I would support any kind of reform which did not embrace this sort of principle. As to the Ballot, I fully agree in a remark which was made by the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department, in an address to his constituents, that it "has no sense nor meaning whatever, except when attended with a great extension"—the Noble Lord might have added, the greatest possible extension—"of the franchise." Without this, it is liable to all the objections taken to it, by the Reverend Sidney Smith, which I will not now repeat. Another prayer of some of the petitioners is, that a property qualification of Members may be dispensed with. It is well known that of many these qualifications are fictitious. The payment of Members is in strict accordance with the ancient usage of the constitution; but I think it might be left optional with Members to refuse or accept it. As to annual Parliaments, I think the proposition is absurd. One effect of its establishment would be, that it would prevent legislative measures from being duly matured. But, though I disapprove of annual Parliaments, yet I am favourable to triennial ones, accompanied with some measure to render elections less expensive. No man, I repeat, is more anxious than I am for a full representation of all the labouring classes: they are a most meritorious body. It cannot be denied that labour, which is a species of property, has as full a right to be represented in Parliament as any capital, whether vested in land or in the funds. If a man has no rights derived from property, he has, yet, personal rights, which ought to be respected and represented. If I had had any doubts on this subject, they would have been removed by the Poor Law Amendment Act,—which is one of the most infamous laws that ever disgraced the statute book of any country, and which could not have been passed in any Parliament in which the labouring classes had been fairly represented. They have also been much injured by free trade. The sorrows of the labouring classes would have secured the sympathy of any House, in which they had been fully represented, and their welfare would have been the object of its unceasing solicitude.

Your Lordships, before I conclude, will allow me to entreat you to consider for a moment the present condition of the people,—to abstract your thoughts for a few moments, if you can, from the strife of parties, and from those considerations which, alone, insure attendance in this House,—and to contemplate the present condition and prospects of the country. I ask and entreat your Lordships calmly and dispassionately to consider what is the cause of that cry which has been raised in so many parts of the country for universal suffrage?—what are the causes of that existing agitation, which is unexampled in its extent and in the character which it has assumed, as well as in the consequences to which it may lead? Whence does it arise that, in various districts, and even in some of those which are purely agricultural, arms have been provided as if the country were actually preparing for civil war? And here I need scarcely, I think, assert, that I have always disapproved of such conduct,—considering it as most injurious to the cause which it is intended to advance. I consider the employment of arms, that ultima ratio which can lead only to one or other of most melancholy alternatives—either to universal anarchy, or most deplorable despotism. Nor do I believe that obtaining arms can add anything to the strength of those who are unaccustomed to their use. But we know that, when rage, resentment, and revenge inflame the minds of the people, furor arma ministrat. But "great is truth, and it will prevail;" and I cannot entertain any shadow of doubt that the persevering powerful exertion of moral force will, in a righteous cause, prove ultimately triumphant. No man can contemplate, without anxiety, and even without alarm, that state of things in which, according to the confession made by the Noble Viscount I see opposite (Viscount Melbourne), in many parts of the country the inhabitants believe that they have, even at present, no security for their property, nor for their lives. I have, with a sincere and anxious desire to acquire information on the subject, asked those who were best able to instruct me, and were cognizant of those proceedings, what were the causes that the people, in so many districts, had provided themselves with arms?—and the answer that I received was this: "That the first cause of the arming is the new poor law; the second cause is the desperate condition of the handloom weavers; the third cause is the disgraceful situation in which the factories continue; and the fourth cause (hardly to be considered as a subsequent cause, but as a corollary rather) is from the principles of the Government." May I remind your Lordships—(if any expression which falls from an humble individual—one entirely unconnected with any party—can deserve your attention)—of what I had the honour of stating to you two years ago, when I was induced, at the earnest desire, and by the express command, of great bodies of my fellow citizens, to resume my seat in this House, from which I had so long seceded, under a full conviction that any further exertions I might make, here, must be unsuccessful? I stated to your Lordships, that, "unless you repealed the new poor law, the infallible consequence must be, universal suffrage and a partition of government." I will not quote any Radical authority, which might have less weight here, probably, than it might deserve; I will quote the sentiments which are to be found in a work conducted with eminent ability, and in a high Church of England spirit—the Church of England Quarterly Review. In an article in that Review for January, last year, called "The Working of the New Poor Law," the author says,—

> Let our Whig rulers have a care. If existence is indeed to be made a burden to the poor, Bradford may have its barricades as well as Paris. There will be but one cry all over the country, which Heaven itself will echo back, for universal suffrage. This awful consequence, with all the ruin which it involves, we charge upon the New Poor Law Act.

And again, in the same page, the author says,—

> The heart that is withered by persecution obtains an awful emancipation from the ordinary restraints of human action; and when one half of the population is rendered liable to that extremity, what is to be expected but that the physical energies, inadequate to lay by a subsistence for old age, will in the prime of life take a destructive direction? Every drop of blood that will be shed we charge upon the New Poor Law.

I see, alas! too much reason to expect that at a future and no distant period a Radical Reformer—perhaps some Chartist—will exclaim, with joy and exultation, quoting the expressions of some former Cabinet Minister to whom I have referred—"Without the New Poor Law we never should have had universal suffrage." And here I would entreat your Lordships, by way of judging fairly and justly, to consider and imagine for an instant, that, instead of being placed in the elevated and independent situation in which you now are, every one of you might, without any fault of his own, be subjected to the operation of this most odious Act. Let your Lordships suppose yourselves assembled and listening to a person who had addressed you on universal suffrage. Would you not say to yourselves—"We are not represented in Parliament; and Parliament, therefore, had no lawful authority whatever to pass a law so deeply affecting our interests and our rights. We have been reviled and calumniated; we have been stigmatised as indolent, as worthless, as living on the support of others, instead of by our own industry; and we have not had opportunity and advantage, of which no man should be deprived, of being heard in our own defence. Our natural rights — those rights of man which ought always to be held sacred — have been violated and trampled under foot. We have been sacrificed by what is called an Act of Parliament, and dispossessed of those rights which we claim under a positive statute, that has existed for more than two centuries. And now we are insultingly told that 'we may rely upon our own resources.' We have been consigned to the absolute, uncontrolled, irresponsible power of three dictators, whose arbitrary mandates, whose orders, have all the force and authority of law. Although our poverty has resulted from causes over which we have no control, our adversity is punished as crime. If we apply for relief, we are confined and separated from our wives and children, and removed to a distance from our families and our friends. The precepts of that religion which we all of us value, and of that book which we regard as the word of God, and which enforces more frequently and more forcibly the virtue of charity than any other, have been utterly disregarded. We are told, and truly told, that universal suffrage would be the cure of these evils (and such would certainly be the case); and shall we object to a cure so beneficial to ourselves, because the consequences may be that the Peers may lose their titles, and certain landed proprietors be injured?" If such an appeal as that were made by any advocate of universal suffrage to any handloom weavers, must not that appeal be attended with serious consequences? If an honest and industrious man, by the greatest exertion and toil, by all the skill and talents he possesses, is obliged to labour for a greater length of time than that to which human labour ought ever to be extended, and to which it can never be extended without injury to the labourer, — and if the remuneration for that toil is to be, as it is in many cases, quite insufficient, — is it natural to expect that he should be satisfied? Let your Lordships look at the factory system, — under which unnatural system, children, instead of being maintained by their parents, support their parents, and, ignorant and uninformed, know nothing of the charms of childhood, and become in youth disabled and prematurely diseased; and when we hear about the merits of the British constitution, and of the enlightened and patriotic Assembly which calls itself the House of Commons, let us recollect ——

The EARL of DEVON. — The Noble Earl will allow me to say that he is ——

EARL STANHOPE. — In order to make what I said with regard to the House of Commons, parliamentary and correct, I called it "enlightened and patriotic," perhaps ironically. I will call it unenlightened and unpatriotic; and let that be the correction of the Noble Earl. I will even suppose that no such Assembly exists, for I think it hardly deserves the taking notice of it. An Act which has been passed by an arbitrary Government of Spain for the protection of négro slavery is not so severe on the slaves as the Factory Act is on factory labourers. The labourers claim a fair day's wages for a fair day's work — a claim perfectly reasonable, and to which you must listen, except you are determined to produce scenes in this country to which I will not venture more particularly to allude. And here I will quote again, not a Radical authority, but the authority of a Right Honourable Friend whom I greatly revere, but who, so far from being a Radical, is, in common with myself, an old-fashioned Tory; — I mean my Right Honourable Friend, who, to the eternal disgrace — I do not say of the House of Commons — (the Noble Earl need not be under any apprehension) — but — of the electors of Leeds, was not elected to represent that place; — I mean Sir John Beckett. He said, in a speech delivered at Leeds, as I find it reported, —

I say that peace at home means contentment at home; and unless we can establish such a system of things as will afford men a fairer remuneration for their labour, and enable them to maintain themselves and their families in comfort, there can be no peace at home — there never will be peace at home — there never ought to be peace at home.

Such a fair and profitable employment as that of which Sir John Beckett spoks is impossible, so long as your Lordships persevere in a ruinous system of free trade, — so long as you persevere in the Currency Bill of 1819; and, let your Lordships do what you will, a very short time will probably elapse before you will be compelled to retrace your steps on that subject, except you are determined to doom this country to bankruptcy and to ruin. I conjure your Lordships to consider, as you ought to do, the state and condition of this country, and the spirit and feeling of the people. Let not your Lordships be deceived: a revolution of the most tremendous and terrific nature, most destructive and desolating in its consequences, is now at the threshold of your doors:—even now, at the twelfth hour, you may be able to avert it. But I know that neither in nor out of Parliament, if that revolution were to break out, would any one be found able either to direct or to control the storm. Whatever may be the result, it will afford me sincere consolation, to the last hour of my life, to reflect that I have zealously, though imperfectly, endeavoured to discharge my duty; and that I have earnestly—though, I fear, most ineffectually—attempted to warn your Lordships of the perils by which this country is encompassed on all sides, and of those grievances which, if they be allowed to continue, menace your Lordships, all the institutions of the country, and even the monarchy itself, with destruction. I have now stated, at more length, probably, than your Lordships like,—as concisely, however, as was in my power to do,—some of the observations which appeared to me to be requisite on this occasion. I have passed most cursorily over many parts of my subject, because they deserve, and ought to receive, full and frequent investigation. Having stated thus much, I will now conclude,—reserving to myself, with the permission of your Lordships, the right and privilege of hereafter replying, if I shall find it requisite to do so, to any observations which may be made.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I am quite certain of one thing,—that, even if the Noble Earl, who has so elaborately supported the prayer of these petitions, had not entreated your Lordships' attention to them, your Lordships would have received them with that respect and consideration with which you are ever ready to greet the respectful prayers of your countrymen. The importance of the subject; the vast meeting at which one of these petitions was agreed to with a singular unanimity,—I mean the Manchester meeting, at which there were 300,000 persons present;—the marked assent given in other parts of the country to the proceedings at that meeting; the anxiety which prevails over all the manufacturing districts without any exception, but particularly in the North and in Scotland, on this subject; and the countless numbers who have signed other petitions elsewhere, presented precisely to the same effect, and proceeding on the same grounds; the yet greater number than have even signed these petitions, who there is reason to believe agree in their prayers;—these considerations, I am perfectly certain, would, even if my Noble Friend had not recommended the petition by his statements and arguments, have secured for the petitioners your Lordships' respectful attention. I may differ on some points from my Noble Friend, and I may have my doubts on others; but, upon the whole, I am disposed to agree with him. On one part of this subject I have no doubt whatever,—namely, the unrepresented state of the petitioners. But is that a consideration which disentitles them from being heard by your Lordships? No; it sets the seal to the charter which entitles them to be heard and to have their statements considered. These persons are unrepresented; and why? It was the mournful duty of the men who framed the Reform Bill in 1832,—a duty which was felt to be painful to those who helped to carry through the measure,—to provide that a line should necessarily be drawn somewhere; that line, though it might be liable to be called partial and arbitrary, as my Noble Friend has called it, it was yet felt must be drawn; and though it was both convenient and fitting to draw it where they did, still they felt it most distressing so to describe it, because they knew it must cut out, and leave unrepresented, the great bulk of the good people of these realms. They made, therefore, a property qualification, though they well knew that men who might have no title to the given amount of property, would still be intrinsically as well qualified to exercise a vote for the benefit of the state as the 10*l.* householder. I say for the benefit of the state, for that is what I look to: the franchise is given for the public good, not for private gain; it is not like a right of property; and it might very likely be exercised even better, by persons possessed of no property at all, but having certain mental and moral qualifications, than by many of those who, possessing a 10*l.* house, possess no other qualification. On the other hand, we felt, in framing the Reform Bill, the great evils of boundless meetings of electors, and of the expense thereby entailed upon the candidate.

There were, also, other views then propounded, from some of which I dissented, while I assented to others. It is not true that those who carried the Reform Bill stated that measure to be a final measure; it is not true that all the advocates of the Bill admitted its finality; it is the reverse of true that all the advocates of the Bill in 1831 and 1832 contended that such a measure was not to admit of any alteration. It has been asserted, however, that in the view of the Government of that day the measure was to be permanent and unalterable; and speeches made in your Lordships' House and elsewhere have been brought forward in support of the assertion. But this cannot, hereafter, be done; for this I say, — and thus solemnly, — that this is not true, that it is not consistent with truth so to state or affirm. I speak with a full recollection of what passed at the time; I speak with a full and accurate knowledge and recollection of the terms which one of the members of that Government then used. The individual was then humbled enough in mind, so that it mattered little to him whether or not the opinions he, at that time, put forth, passed, like other men's, into oblivion; the individual was humble enough in talent, humble enough in powers of usefulness, and might not possibly have had any title to claim attention, but for the high and dignified station in the councils of the Sovereign which he held — but for having had a hand in the Bill — but for having been one of those who succeeded in carrying it through — but for having held the most distinguished station in the Government at that time, however little may have been the talents he possessed; — from all these circumstances combined, I have a right to refer to what fell from that individual, in order to rebut — triumphantly to rebut — the new-fangled doctrine of finality. Finality! a barbarous word, which was unknown to the framers of the Reform Bill. I maintain that it is not true, but the contrary of truth, to say that the Government which propounded that measure, propounded it as one which was not afterwards to admit of extension. The Lord Chancellor, a member of the Cabinet, one of the framers of the Bill, — one of the debaters of it in this House, — one who is a little better acquainted with some parts of its history than my Noble Friend opposite, — distinctly stated, in the month of April, 1832, that he had no doubt some advance must be made at some future period beyond the principles laid down in this Bill; and he particularly stated, that before long, and so soon as the people became more enlightened as to their political rights, and better versed in the practice of them, he had no doubt it would become expedient, and he should not hesitate, — to extend the suffrage much lower — "much lower" was his phrase — than it was fixed at, by that measure. Therefore, they who say that the Government which carried the Reform Bill attributed finality to it, must, at least, admit that finality was not the doctrine of all the members of that Government. But, though to have put forth the doctrine of finality then, when reform was granted for the first time, and the people were so much less used to exercise the franchise, would have given much less offence than its promulgation at present does; yet, now, the doctrine appears to be, that the more the people become able to exercise, with propriety, the right of suffrage, the more sternly you must refuse to admit them to an extended suffrage. It has become the doctrine — or rather it did become the doctrine, a few weeks ago — of the Government, that the stone on which their existence rested was the determination to oppose all further constitutional reform. From that I dissented, in this House, a year and a half ago. I dissented from it, out of doors, at the great education meeting at Manchester, many of the attendants at which have signed the petition which has been presented by the Noble Earl: and I dissented from it once more; for, on finding that a Noble Friend of mine still continued to assert this doctrine in a pamphlet which he published, I thought fit to address to him my reply on the part of Reformers, and, as I considered, on the part of my colleagues, of 1832. I did this because I thought it possible that in this way I should be able to frame a bridge by which my Noble Friend might have crossed and passed back again, as it were, into the same ranks as I understood my colleagues of 1832 to belong to; and I was the more anxious and earnest to effect this, because, of all parliamentary Reformers, I know none more stout, naturally and by acquirement, than the Noble person — to whom I allude — had proved himself to be in all matters and on all questions relating to the subject. What I hardly ventured to hope — the dream — the vision, which in my waking hours I scarcely expected to see realised — came to be, if not actually verified, at least upon the very verge of verification. Whether, from the force of the arguments contained in my letter, or from the timidity of those who maintained opposite opinions, or from whatever other cause, — the result was, or seemed to be, that my blissful vision was realised, and the doctrine of finality abandoned; because I found that the Ballot, which heretofore had been described and treated as one of the most ticklish, offensive, and repulsive questions that could be urged upon the Government, was to be made an open question. Great was the joy of the friends of the Ballot upon hearing that this was to be the case. Great was my exultation, — thinking that I, as an individual, had contributed to this happy revolution; mighty, indeed, was the rejoicing of the friends of further reform out of doors, — thinking that, after all, the Ministers were more real Reformers than they had been supposed to be; confident were the expectations that the Ballot, whose supporters in the House of Commons year after year continued to increase, would now speedily be adopted, seeing that the resistance of the Government to it was to be discontinued.

Such were the visions that passed before men's eyes, though but for a short time; for they were as fleeting as they were pleasing, — or, rather, they were still more fleeting than pleasing; for, then, there came out, almost immediately, that which certainly did astonish, did astound, did petrify, did turn into tears of sadness the tears of joy which Reformers were shedding, when it was found that the Ballot was made an open question, for the express purpose of defeating it. We, poor innocent men — we, good, ignorant, plain folk — had all along imagined, in our dream of statesmanship — in our vision of cabinetship — in our hazy view of ministerial management (knowing nothing of the new arts and sciences of statesmen), — we had all along the folly — the ridiculous absurd folly — to believe that if thirty or forty men were told that they might vote for the Ballot, if they chose, — the probability of the ultimate carrying of the question would be increased. What could beguile us into such an utter oblivion of all the dictates of common sense, — all the rules of common arithmetic, — as to dream that, for the purpose of evincing the growing popularity of a measure, and the probability of its being ultimately carried, the minority who supported it should be very great instead of very small! What must have been the infatuated ignorance which rendered us blind to the obvious truth, that after the advantage of being in a minority of 5 on one day, the next best thing was to be in a minority of 2! We were even so besotted, in our ignorance of statesmanship and state craft, as to believe that, if the minority could be changed into a majority, it would be so much the better for the measure. But the Government immediately set us straight upon the point. "Oh!" said they, "do not talk of a majority; it is the worst thing in the world; — it is a minority that is the thing; — we have the confidence of the country with us; we are as permanent as ever — if not in our places, at least in our policy and in our doctrines; and as for the Ballot, why, above all things, we abhor the Ballot; and, because we abhor the Ballot, and cannot bear the idea of its exercising its baneful influence over the minds of the people, we have issued notice to all the people in office that they have leave to vote for the Ballot, — and we do this because we know that if we continue to resist the Ballot, it will inevitably be carried." That was the doctrine which the Government broached. If they agreed to come into this doctrine, in order that finality should be declared to be given up, while, in reality, it was to be clung to more than ever, — then, I say, this is a line of conduct which seems to me too subtle, and one which does not savour of plain, straightforward dealing; — and I cannot but think that those who leave the question open, ostensibly for the purpose of advancing it, but really with other intentions, will find themselves, in the event, strangled by the fondling of the sincere advocates of it; they will find that the very mode they take, of professing their affection — their very Iscariot embrace itself — will prove the reason why, in a short time, perhaps even within a few days, they may be put out of the position to give such an Iscariot embrace a second time. In fact, I have been a little uneasy lest this may not be the last act of "finality" for which I and those who think with me may have to thank the Government; for I hold it not impossible, that before many weeks, or even many days, are over, I may have to thank them not only for something which may leave a man in doubt whether it be meant ill or well, but also for something, or some step, of a more beneficial character.

But, leaving this part of the subject, I will come to the question of the extension of suffrage. I think, then, that all should have the right to vote who possess such qualities as would enable them to exercise the right creditably to themselves, beneficially to the state, and usefully to the proper constitution of the Commons House of Parliament. I care not if the franchise be taken away from others who now enjoy it, provided you extend the right in the directions I have indicated; for instance, I would not object to taking it away from some of the freemen, and from some of the 10*l.* householders who have shown themselves not qualified to exercise it. I am persuaded that those who lead a creditable, industrious life, and are intelligent and well-informed, are qualified to exercise the right, and that such persons would exercise it as a public trust in a manner creditable to themselves, beneficially to the state, and usefully as regards the constitution of the House of Commons. This is my opinion as to the extension of the franchise; but, as for giving the Ballot, if not accompanied by an extended suffrage of this kind, — what is it but to vest those who cannot be entitled to vote at all, except they vote in the eye of their fellow citizens, with an unlimited power in the direction of Government? At present, therefore, the represented man — the man who votes — discharges a public duty in the exercise of a public trust. He cannot privately sell his vote for his own individual gain, — he cannot privately yield to the influence of those who domineer over him, — he cannot, behind the backs of the public (for whose benefit, rather than his own, he is intrusted with the franchise), abuse the suffrage which has been bestowed upon him; for public opinion is powerful over him — the unrepresented influence the represented; and, although not represented himself, the honest, respectable, and industrious journeyman exercises, indirectly, a most wholesome and beneficial influence over the constituency of the borough in which he lives, but in the representation of which he has no interest. Give the secret mode of voting, and this advantage would be lost. This is the ground on which I agree with my Noble Friend opposite in wishing for an extension of the suffrage. But the Ballot, without universal suffrage, I am convinced, would be injurious. With respect to the questions of the payment of Members of Parliament, and of the property qualification of Members, I shall offer, at present, no remarks, — holding that, in comparison with other classes of the wants of the petitioners, they are so insignificant as hardly to deserve notice.

As to the question of the continuance of Parliaments, I will not consent to take annual Parliaments; because, till some measure be found greatly diminishing the expenses of elections, I well know that, constituted as men are, annual Parliaments would wholly defeat the very object of instituting them; for that system would operate exclusively in favour of a long purse, — carrying, as a long purse always will, a long line of agents with it. The wealthy merchant, — the successful stock-jobber, — men who count their fortunes by the hundreds of thousands, and sometimes by the millions, even, — would be almost the only men who would get into Parliament as Members. In connection with this matter, I cannot but mention that I consider the present system of annual registration to be accompanied by certain drawbacks; for under it you have some of the evils of annual election, without its advantages. This I hold to be unquestionable. On the whole, a triennial election of Members appears to me to be that system which meets the greatest number of wishes, and reconciles the most difficulties. It is quite unquestionable that the conduct of the first and of the last Session of a Parliament is very different. The best proof that can be given is, that we never have seen the Civil List passed in a new reign until after the old Parliament had been dissolved and the new Session begun. Why is this? It is not necessary, nor is it the more respectful course towards the Sovereign, that the Civil List should be delayed till the opening Session of the new Parliament. A grant of 70,000*l.*, I understand, has been voted, in another place, for a set of new stables at Windsor Castle. It is very unlikely that a sum so enormous would have been given by a House of Commons about to render an account to its constituents, as it were, on its death-bed. I mention this fact to show the difference between a death-bed vote and a vote passed in the full vigour of life and health; and, as a good proof that the shorter the duration of Parliaments is made, so that they be not made short enough to lead to universal and endless expense, the better will it be for the people, and the more wholesome for Parliament itself. On the rest of my Noble Friend's speech I will not comment, further than to say, that some facts have been misrepresented by him, — I am sure, unintentionally. I am astonished that my Noble Friend, speaking of something which he supposes to have taken place in 1832, has used language which seems to countenance the notion that this House has a right to resist any accession to its numbers. Surely my Noble Friend does not mean to say that your Lordships could prevent a Peer from taking his seat after his creation? We all know that the form of procedure, on such occasions, is merely this, — that the individual appointed comes to the table of the House with a charter from the Crown, and the clerk, if he refuse to read it, is liable, as I believe, to a considerable penalty. My Noble Friend also declared that threats were held out to this House, during the discussions on the Reform Bill, of swamping the independence of the Peerage by a very extensive creation. Now, I have the most distinct recollection that not one member of the Administration at that time either used unbecoming language to this House, or touched upon the indecorous topic broached by my Noble Friend, or even opened his mouth, in any way, upon the subject. The matter took a totally different turn. A certain number of individuals thought fit, for particular reasons, — no doubt, satisfactory to themselves, — to absent themselves from the service of this House; and made it unnecessary to make any such proposal as that pointed at by my Noble Friend.

even if Ministers had been disposed to make it, — which they were not. I am sure that if it had been requisite eventually to take such a decided step, the first intelligence your Lordships would have had of the matter would have been the arrival of the new Peers in the House to take their seats. It is a great mistake to suppose that a threat was held out.

EARL STANHOPE. — Oh! I was present in this House when the threat I mentioned was used, in the most distinct and unequivocal language.

LORD BROUGHAM. — By whom?

EARL STANHOPE. — By the Noble Earl, then at the head of the Treasury.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I am sure my Noble Friend is the last man in the world to state anything he does not believe to be true: but I have the most distinct recollection of everything that passed; and not only did my Noble Friend then at the head of the Government not say so, but, from the course which the thing took, it is impossible he could have said so. To pass from that subject, however, I cannot help thinking that my Noble Friend has been a little too harsh upon the other House of Parliament. I do not think it is right to say that they have fallen into universal and merited contempt; this is language which ought not to be used towards the other House, even if it were true.

EARL STANHOPE. — Those were not my words. I said they had never enjoyed the confidence of the country; and I added, "I will not say they have fallen into 'universal and merited' contempt."

LORD BROUGHAM. — Oh! that is just one of the several ways of saying that they have fallen into contempt. If such a thing could be said out of doors, and if an indictment were, in consequence, brought against the party saying it, the indictment would run thus: — "that he did then and there use the words, 'I will not say that they have fallen into universal and merited contempt,' — meaning, that they had fallen into universal and merited contempt." I do not think that House merits this contempt, or that so much should be said against them. Every sort of opinion is represented in that House, but is seldom expressed with much force, one way or the other. Instead of a good working majority, Government have no more than the respectable majority of 2; instead of a good, earnest, downright Opposition, their views on all subjects are so mild as hardly to be well distinguishable from those which they oppose. Certainly their opinions are anything but dogmatical: the representatives of the people seem to be so much overwhelmed by the difficulty and importance of the subjects that come before them, that they rarely venture to give an opinion upon any, but decide every disputed question upon the narrowest possible grounds. If 180 be a better majority than 216 upon the Ballot, however, — then, by a parity of reasoning, a majority of 2 is better for a Government than a majority of 2 to 1. But that very respectable body, which, though it appears to have no mind of its own, has so irritated and inflamed the mind of my Noble Friend, should be more mildly dealt with. I entirely concur in the great importance of the petitions which my Noble Friend has presented. I am glad that he has entered at large into the subject of them; for, certainly, the statements contained in them deserve the full, ample, and deliberate consideration of your Lordships. The petitioners speak the sense of the vast, the overwhelming majority of the working classes, — the universal opinion, without any one exception, of the unrepresented classes, — those classes which are for secret voting, provided the suffrage be extended; but who, before all things, are bent to work out such an improvement in their political style as an extension of the suffrage would produce. I will not use the language of intimidation to your Lordships; I will not say that I have the least dread of revolution; for I differ from my Noble Friend opposite as to thinking that revolution is advancing amain, and is at our gates already. I think the reverse of this is true; I hold that never were the people of this country more perfectly tranquil; and the proof of the fact is to be found in the little outbreaks that have taken place, where the spark has been flung and the fuel collected, and yet the fire has never spread an inch. All that has been done in town, all that has been done in the North, all that has been done more recently in the western districts of Scotland, only the more demonstrates to my mind that the really disaffected — the lovers of mischief — those who would break the peace for mischief's sake, or pursue objects of their own by unlawful means — form a most scanty and insignificant body in point of numbers, — a body miserable in point of respectability and honesty. This is my deliberate opinion; and I think the circumstance I have stated should incite your Lordships to take the earliest opportunity of attending to the wishes of the petitioners.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE.—I do not much approve of these useless discussions — these mere exercitations — the conflict of argument and oratory; and certainly do think them a departure from the more ancient, the earlier, and sounder practice of Parliament,—which, in general, confined those who presented petitions to a statement of the objects of the petition, and of any remarkable circumstances connected with it, as — the peculiar respectability of the meeting at which the petition was adopted, or the signatures annexed to it.— Considering, however, the nature of these petitions, as described by the Noble Earl who presented them, and also by my Noble and Learned Friend who spoke last, — considering the great bodies of men who concur in the sentiments of the petitioners, — the Noble Earl is, perhaps, not much to blame for having dwelt at some length upon them. I certainly do not think that the opinions, set forth in the petitions, prevail to such an extent as my Noble and Learned Friend represents; I do not conceive that these are the opinions of the whole body of the labouring classes; but I am well aware that they are entertained by many in that rank of life, and are so sedulously inculcated by others who possess weight and influence with the working classes, that it is only a miracle they do not prevail to a greater extent. Nothing, indeed, surprises me more than the firm and steady good sense of the great majority of the people of this country, exposed as they are to the most violent representations, to the most severe temptations, suffering under great grievances, and told — meanwhile — that the cause of all their distresses is to be found in the mal-administration of the country, which might be very easily removed. Nothing surprises me more than the little impression made by these representations; and I only feel astonished that consequences a little more like those predicted by the Noble Earl who presented the petition, are not actually produced by the continual excitement in which the nation is kept. But I acknowledge that, considering the importance of the petitions, the respect which is due to those classes whence they emanate, the momentous subjects to which they refer, I do not know that the Noble Earl has acted wrongly, on the present occasion, in going more at length into the matter of the petitions than he might otherwise have done, —and in calling the attention of your Lordships to these topics so pressed upon your consideration by the petitioners. I do not know, however, that if I were one of those who attended the meeting at which one of the petitions was adopted, and had constituted the Noble Earl their representative, I should be very well satisfied with the manner in which the Noble Earl has discharged his duty, seeing that the Noble Earl has expressed his disapprobation of every one of the measures which the petitioners ask at your Lordships' hands. Annual Parliaments are asked for, and the Noble Earl expresses his disapprobation of them; universal suffrage is asked for, and the Noble Earl says he disapproves of it; extension of suffrage is asked for, and the Noble Earl also disapproves of that measure, except upon particular principles, which, I apprehend, when they come to be explained, will not be very agreeable to those who have made the Noble Earl their mouthpiece, or be much in accordance with their views. The Noble Earl, if I understand him rightly, wishes that when the suffrage is extended, the right should be given collectively or to classes.

EARL STANHOPE.—To classes, and not collectively.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE.—To give it to classes would, I apprehend, exactly establish those distinctions between the various ranks of society which are the most contrary to the views of the present petitioners, as well as to those now most generally in vogue. It is not my intention to go into the questions raised by my Noble and Learned Friend. With respect to those questions, I will only say that I agree, for the most part, with the opinions expressed upon them by the Noble Earl; and on the arguments which he has urged, I am content to take my stand. Neither is it my intention to give a history of the Reform Bill, into which my Noble and Learned Friend has entered, nor again to notice the doctrine of finality, further than to say that it is a term not to be found in any dictionary; and that I believe it was never employed by my Noble Friend to whom the Noble and Learned Lord (Lord Brougham) alluded, in that sense in which it has been understood and animadverted upon. It could never have been intended by my Noble Friend, with respect to any human measure, that it was to be fixed, settled, final, and decisive, or incapable of alteration. Unquestionably all that my Noble Friend meant was, that the settlement of the Reform Act was of so solemn a nature, that, at least, a long trial of its provisions ought to take place, and that they should not be hastily and wantonly changed. Neither my Noble Friend, nor any other man, could ever have meant to say that the Reform Act was incapable of change — that its defects were not to be amended — that the suggestions of experience were not to be attended to. For myself, I stand more particularly clear of this doctrine of finality. Your Lordships may probably not recollect anything that fell from me on a former occasion; but I would beg leave, for my own satisfaction and vindication, to recal to your recollection that, upon the second reading of the Reform Bill, I delivered a speech which was then censured as not being very plain or decisive in favour of the measure. On that occasion, I made two statements for my own vindication, and in order to guard myself thereafter. The one was, that that measure would infallibly fail to answer the extravagant expectations which many persons entertained of it. I stated that I did not think it would produce those advantages, those changes in the state of society, which some anticipated; that it would not do away with bribery or corruption, or with influence; and therefore that it must unquestionably produce some degree of disappointment. The other statement I then made was, that I was perfectly aware that change would not stop with that Bill; that it could not prove a final measure. I declared — for I wished to place the matter fairly and distinctly before your Lordships — that I was certain the Bill must lead to large ulterior consequences. Therefore, in saying that I agree with the Noble Earl who has presented these petitions, in most of the statements he has made, and the opinions he has delivered upon the measures recommended in them, I beg it may be understood that I am opposed to those measures, — not because they are advances upon the Reform Act, — not because they go further than that Act, — not because they are of a progressive kind, — but because they are bad and pernicious in themselves, — because they are not proper to be adopted; and unquestionably it is not upon any other more general ground that I oppose them. Into the consideration of those measures, I repeat, it would be fruitless now to enter. Many of them relate to the other House of Parliament; and though, unquestionably, the privileges and proceedings of that House are matters of so much importance, that it is not only perfectly within your Lordships' competence, but it is your Lordships' right and duty, to pronounce an opinion upon them, — yet, at the same time, I do not think it expedient wantonly to discuss those matters in this House, till they are brought regularly and deliberately before it.

Upon the question of the Ballot, I shall not say anything. I understand that a motion has lately been brought forward in the other House of Parliament for the adoption of that mode of voting. The motion was negatived by a very large majority, and, therefore, it is not likely your Lordships will soon have to consider it. I shall only say, that my opinion is adverse to secret voting, — adverse to the substitution of secrecy for publicity in the mode of taking votes. My Noble and Learned Friend has adverted to other matters which are sufficiently well understood, but which it is not very regular in this place to state, or to allude to, distinctly. I cannot see, however, that there is anything Jesuitical in the course which has been taken by the Government, or in the conduct of a Noble Friend of mine in another place. The probability is, when a question is freely and fairly discussed, — discussed on its own merits, and discussed without external constraint on the votes of those who are to decide, — that of two men, holding different opinions upon the question, one will say that the grounds on which it rests are weak, and the object sought pernicious, and that therefore the question will retrograde; while the other will say, that he thinks it rests on solid grounds, and that it must advance. I think that this is the natural course of opinions among men who differ in their views. I do not, however, at all agree in the opinion expressed by my Noble Friend in another place, for I think that what the Government have done with respect to the Ballot gives the question a considerable advantage. I feel that what my Noble and Learned Friend says is true, — that a large number of votes, added to the supporters of a question, tends to advance it in public opinion, and to give it a greater chance of success; but even viewing the matter in the other light, there is no ground for the severe animadversions of my Noble and Learned Friend. I do not quite agree with my Noble and Learned Friend as to the character which he has thought proper to give of the petitions now before the House, and of the proceedings of the petitioners; at the same time, I was extremely glad to hear the opinion which was expressed by the Noble Earl opposite on the subject of arming the people. Though the advice to the people to arm may bear the appearance of legality, yet it is merely in form and in appearance that it can be considered legal; in fact, and in reality, it is nothing less than a recommendation to them to rebel. It can be viewed in no other light, and it can have no other meaning. I rejoice, therefore, to find that the Noble Earl has no participation in the advice given to the people to arm; — I rejoice to hear him disclaim all participation in that counsel, though it is advice that has been given by persons professing to have a respect for public liberty and good order, — persons filling creditable stations in life, and from whom better things might have been expected. My Noble and Learned Friend near me has remarked, with much humour and liveliness, upon recent proceedings in the other House of Parliament, and upon the narrow majorities by which some measures have lately been decided there. I can recollect the time when my Noble and Learned Friend did not think great majorities a matter of such absolute necessity, that the public affairs of the country could not be carried on without them. I remember the time when my Noble and Learned Friend thought a majority of 1 sufficient to go on with. It implies no disrespect of any assembly, no reflection upon its character, to assume that it may be equally divided upon any occasion; such matters as equal divisions are always upon the cards. Whether that should be considered an advantage, or a disadvantage, I will not take upon myself to determine; but it is evident that, in the present state of things, the Houses of Parliament, in this country, must decide all matters that come before them by majorities. It certainly is an unsatisfactory way of deciding debatable questions; but, in the present condition of human nature, I do not exactly see how it can be avoided. I am by no means sure that the majority are always in the right. There is much in my habits and associations which leads me to think that the minority are not always in the wrong; on the contrary, I am rather inclined to think that the minority are generally in the right. But I know not where a remedy for the difficulty is to be found. The evil, as I conceive, arises from the nature of public assemblies, which have not yet arrived at any other mode of deciding their differences than by majorities.

To return, however, to the prayer of the petitioners. I confess I feel less alarm from the actual state of the country than I do from the warm and earnest manner in which individuals take up particular questions. Every man appears to think himself justified in pushing his own opinions to their extreme limits. If he think that the Legislature or the Executive are in the least wrong — for example, about the currency, — if he think that there ought to be a few more or a few less 1*l.* notes in circulation, he does not scruple at once to call on the people to rise in all their strength, and push to the utmost the extreme opinions which he advocates. It is the same with the poor law. I believe that the law in its existing condition contributes as much more than it formerly did to the order, to the comfort, and happiness of the poor, as it does to the general welfare of the country at large. But, whether it is the poor law or the currency, or whatever else, which may occupy the thoughts or attention of those warm and energetic declaimers against grievances, each seems to its individual patron to be all-important, and to justify rebellion, — armed resistance — nay, a dissolution of the bonds of society. All who see the most trifling matter amiss, are prompt and instant in calling to their aid that doctrine of resistance which belongs to great and extreme cases; and, instead of reserving it for these, are for applying it, without sufficient grounds, to every occasion which arises. As Burke beautifully expresses it, they desire to make "the extreme medicine of the constitution its daily bread." I do not feel that it is necessary for me to trouble your Lordships with any further observations. I will only say, in conclusion, that I greatly lament that, with the right feeling which generally influences the Noble Earl opposite, he should so often make remarks upon the poor laws in so strong and bitter a spirit.

LORD BROUGHAM. — One word in explanation. I distinctly understood — for I had not read the debate, and I am not in the habit of reading debates — that the Government in the other House had assigned as the reason for making the Ballot an open question, that their doing so would have the effect of rendering its success not only more remote, but more doubtful; nay, of defeating it altogether.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — My Noble Friend, in the other House, who made those observations, spoke merely for himself, and not in the name, or on behalf, of the Government at large.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I inquired of my informant whether the other members of the Government disclaimed the sentiment? and the answer was, "Not a bit of it."

EARL STANHOPE. — I trust that your Lordships will allow me to say a very few words, as I have been charged by my Noble and Learned Friend (Lord Brougham) with having made an erroneous statement. I certainly spoke to the best of my knowledge and belief, from, I thought, a correct remembrance of the words that were used by the Noble Lord then at the head of the Administration, when I said that a threat was employed. If I am wrong, I am not the only person in error; for I find in the Journals of your Lordships' House, a protest signed by many Peers, some of whom have been present, in the course of this very discussion, stating, with regard to the Reform Bill, "that the Noble Lord who opposed the second reading declared, that though he said he objected to the Bill, he would withhold all future opposition to it, — the House having been given to understand that his Majesty would create such a number of Peers as would insure the passing of the Bill."

LORD BROUGHAM. — My Noble Friend entirely mistakes what I stated. All I denied was, that Earl Grey ever made use of the threat adverted to. The protest only alludes to the fact, and not to the threat.

EARL STANHOPE. — Well, then, my Noble and Learned Friend said that the Reform Bill was carried, not by virtue of the power to create Peers, but by the non-attendance of Peers. Yes; but that non-attendance was in obedience to a most unconstitutional circular, which was forwarded to those who were opposed to the Act. With regard to what has fallen from the Noble Viscount opposite, I cannot admit that the ancient and constitutional custom in presenting petitions was — not to enter upon the subject of them at length. I say that, if your Lordships were, on all occasions, to adopt the Noble Viscount's suggestion as regards this point, petitioning would become a mere farce. My Noble Friend (Viscount Melbourne) has eulogised what he terms the good sense of the people in remaining tranquil under continual excitement. Now, I would ask any Noble Lord in this House, or any individual in this country, whether it would be possible for any person — whatever his talents, his eloquence, and his perseverance might be — to excite a people, if they had not just cause to be discontented? What is the occasion of the excitement existing in Ireland? Poverty and want of employment. What is the cause of more than a million of the people of these realms having signed what is termed "the National Petition?" It is, that those people know they suffer grievances which have arisen from certain legislative measures, — measures which Parliament has neglected to alter. The Noble Viscount next observes that I am not the individual who should have presented one of the petitions which have this evening been submitted to your Lordships' consideration, inasmuch as I have stated my disapproval of its prayer. When that petition was brought to me, I stated, fully, frankly, and fairly, as was my duty, all the opinions which I entertained on the subject, and I said, — "I will, if you think proper, present your petition; but it is against my conscience to support its prayer." The parties in question then said, — "We wish it to remain in your hands." I accordingly undertook to comply with the request; but I should have considered myself the basest of mankind if I had deceived the petitioners. I was bound, as an honest man, to speak that which I conscientiously believed to be the truth, without regarding in what quarter my views might be unpalatable. It remains for me, now, to apologise for having obtruded myself, a second time, on the attention of your Lordships; but I thought it requisite to answer, as briefly as possible, some of the observations that have been made.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON. — I agree with the Noble Viscount opposite in much that has fallen from him with respect to the inexpediency of delivering lengthened harangues in this House on the presentation of petitions, and I cannot help lamenting that the Noble Earl, my Noble Friend, should have taken this opportunity of delivering one of those long harangues. The petitioners state, fairly enough, the grievances of which they complain, and pray for the adoption of measures calculated to put an end to them. But I cannot help regretting that my Noble Friend should, on this occasion, have been tempted to dilate, at so much length, upon the supposed causes of those grievances, and their present and anticipated effects, without suggesting some measure, — such as the repeal of the poor law, — or bringing forward some distinct proposition for the enactment of a new law, or the repeal of an old one. If he had made some such proposition, and the House did not attend to him, then, indeed, might the Noble Earl find some excuse for haranguing on the presentation of petitions; but it really is unworthy of the great mind of my Noble Friend to endeavour to excite such a spirit as his speeches are but too well calculated to call forth. I am happy, however, to find that my Noble Friend and I agree in some things, — that he disapproves of the arming of the people; and I hope that, if the disaffected spirit which is abroad goes further, I and the Noble Earl shall be found on the same side, — that we shall stand in the same ranks. I should wish to stand near the Noble Earl. Of one thing there can be no doubt, — that I shall be found on the side of order and the laws; and I hope that the Noble Earl will be found near me. Let the Noble Earl bring forward measures upon those several subjects, and let the House decide upon them at once. That would be the more fair and manly course, and one more likely to give satisfaction to the country, than the course which the Noble Earl thinks fit to pursue night after night. With regard to the subject of these petitions, which have been presented by the Noble Earl, I must confess that I have heard, with great satisfaction, the sentiments which the Noble Viscount opposite has expressed. I fully concur with the Noble Viscount in the propriety of opposing the further extension of the suffrage; and upon the very same ground, — namely, that such extension would be inconsistent with the best interests of the country. I likewise concur in the sentiments which the Noble Viscount has expressed upon the subject of the Ballot, — that obnoxious, and, I must say, un-English measure; at the same time, I deeply regret that the Noble Viscount did think proper to make it what is called an open question. I had the misfortune to be in office when there were such questions; and I must say that I never could consider them as anything but a symptom of weakness on the part of those who were carrying on the service of their Sovereign, — a symptom that they were not acting together, that they did not agree amongst themselves, and that there was a division also amongst their supporters. Instead of its being a matter of satisfaction that an important question like the Ballot should be left an open question, I regard it as a circumstance most likely to prove disastrous to the Government, and eventually so to the country. Under these circumstances, although perfectly content with the opinions delivered upon the subject by the Noble Viscount, I confess I did lament, and do still lament, most sincerely, that the question of the Ballot should be considered an open question by the Government, — and more particularly still do I regret that it should ever have been declared so.

EARL STANHOPE. — My Lords, I think that the best answer I can give to the challenge of the Noble Duke to bring forward those questions to which he has alluded in the shape of a motion, Bill, or something else, is to be found in a military anecdote. It is said that a French general, upon returning from an inglorious campaign, was asked by his Sovereign, Louis XIV., with an air of astonishment, why he had not taken the general to whom he had been opposed in battle; to which inquiry he replied by saying, — "Sire, if I had attempted to do so, he would have taken me." Such is my position. I do not bring forward any measure, because I have no chance of success with them; and because, if I did so, the Noble Duke would, no doubt, triumph in my defeat. I prefer waiting for better times; and, by acting according to my own tactics, not to expose myself to such a defeat. This much I will say, for the satisfaction of my Noble Friend, — that if the Bill for continuing or extending — I do not care which — the powers of those dictators, the Poor Law Commissioners, shall come up to this House, I shall consider it my duty to take the sense of the House upon it, though I should stand alone. I have already voted in this House in a minority of 3, and I should not be ashamed or afraid to do so in a still smaller minority.

The petitions were then read, and ordered to lie on the table.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Pemberton's Divorce Bill. — Read a second time, and committed to Mr. FRESHFIELD and the West Cornwall list. Instruction for counsel and witnesses.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Lords, to request a copy of the evidence in the case of the said Bill.

Hall's Estate Bill. — Read a second time, and committed to Mr. ADDAMS WILLIAMS and the Monmouth list.

Davie's Estate Bill. — Read a second time, and committed to SIR THOMAS ACLAND and the North Devon list.

Deptford Pier Junction Railway Bill. — Report further considered (prints having been delivered on Friday, the 21st of June); amendments agreed to; Bill to be ingrossed.

SMALL DEBTS BILLS.

Mr. WILSON PATTEN.—Sir, I have been directed by the Committee on the Warrington Small Debts Bill to make a special report to the House. On the meeting of that committee, it was observed that the Bill had been very much altered since the second reading; and the first difficulty which presented itself to the committee was the question, whether they ought not to deal with the Bill as they would do, in like cases, with Railway Bills, and reject it? They knew, however, that the parties to the Bill had taken great pains in making such alterations as they were informed, on high authority, would insure its success; and therefore do I think that, as far as they are concerned, they have done all that could be expected. There was, also, another difficulty, which was fully considered by the committee, — namely, that the Bill would operate against other existing courts. Upon that point, I am certainly of opinion that it should be ascertained, in the first place, whether these existing courts cannot be made available for the recovery of small debts, before the introduction of new courts into those districts be permitted. I regret that the amended Bill, by some mistake, has not yet been printed; but it will be in a day or so. Under these circumstances, I shall move, "That it be an instruction to the Committee on the Warrington Small Debts Bill, and to the committees on all other Small Debts Bills now before the House, that they have leave to alter the said Bills in accordance with the Warrington Small Debts Bill, as ordered by the House to be printed; and that they be directed to report specially to the House, in the case of any local courts in operation within the district affected by the Bill."

SIR JAMES GRAHAM. — So far as I am able to understand the matter, clauses were introduced into the Warrington Small Debts Bill after it had been sent to a committee, which clauses are almost identical with the provisions of the County Courts Bill now before a select committee of the House. That committee have made considerable progress in preparing a general measure. The County Courts Bill, as originally referred to them by her Majesty's Government, has been, in the mean time, withdrawn, in order to be recast according to the wishes of a majority of the members of the committee; and I am expecting that the committee will soon be summoned to meet for the purpose of having the amended Bill laid before them. Under these circumstances, I think the best course would be to postpone the discussion of this measure till the Warrington Bill be printed and in the hands of Honourable Members. It would be also desirable not to proceed without first ascertaining the views of her Majesty's Government with regard to the course they intend to adopt on the subject.

Mr. PATTEN. — I would not hesitate to adopt the suggestion of the Right Honourable Baronet, but that the committee have fixed to meet to-morrow, in the hope of being, by that time, in the possession of the opinion of the House.

SIR GEORGE STRICKLAND. — After the great delay, inconvenience, and expense to which the parties interested in these Bills have been subjected, I am sure the House will agree with me in saying that we ought to come to a decision upon the subject as soon as possible. I should be willing to agree in the course suggested by the Right Honourable Baronet, if I thought such a course would relieve the doubts of those parties. But I do not. Neither do I see the necessity of waiting till this Bill is printed; as it will give no more information than has been already laid before the House in the Breviate of the Aberford Small Debts Bill, which is in accordance with the alterations made in the Warrington Small Debts Bill, and therefore a sort of model Bill in itself. The parties to the several Bills of this kind before the House have already delayed them, under the impression that a Government measure would have been brought forward; and if they were even now assured that a general measure would be brought forward, I am confident they would withdraw those Bills. But I understand that there is no prospect of such a measure being passed this Session.

[Cries of "No, no!"]

I hope that opinion is incorrect. All that I can say is, that such is the belief of all the parties concerned in these Bills; and in that belief they have all acted. Besides, they have been told, from high authority, that if they would alter the framework of their Bills so as to bring them in conformity with the Breviate of the Aberford Small Debts Bill, they should experience no further obstruction in their progress through the House. I therefore think it will be doing great injustice to the promoters of these Bills, to subject them to further delay; the additional delays to which they have been already put, having been attended with an expense of 300*l.* or 400*l.*

LORD STANLEY.—I think it would be most desirable that a general measure should be framed, to regulate the forms of proceeding and the jurisdiction of all these courts. I am aware that the parties soliciting these Bills have been exposed to great delay, inconvenience, and expense, which I should be sorry to aggravate. But when rules are laid down by this House, they should be enforced by this House, and not transferred to the hands and control of parties out of doors. It seems that the promoters of those Bills have been told, by an authority, not of this House, that they would experience no difficulty in getting their Bills through, provided that these should be drawn out in conformity with a certain model. Now, I am clearly of opinion, that if the House of Commons once allows and sanctions the interference of such extraneous authority, we may just as well close our doors, and abrogate our right altogether. The Warrington Small Debts Bill, the principle of which was assented to by the House upon the second reading, contained forty-three printed pages; and how much does the House think is now left of the original Bill? The preamble alone, and not one single syllable of the enactments. Instead of them, fifty or sixty clauses were laid before the committee in manuscript, which they were told they must pass bodily; and this has been done in the case of four other Small Debts Bills, which have all been altered according to the instructions of this high, but self-constituted, authority out of doors. I was a member of that committee. There were other committees sitting on Private Bills at the same time; and the chairmen of those different committees having met at our request, we found that this species of underhand legislation was going on to a very great extent; and that what the parties could not accomplish before a general committee of the House of Commons, they were endeavouring to effect by a committee up-stairs. It is said that these Bills are merely temporary Bills, brought forward while the subject is under the consideration of a committee up-stairs. That is the very reason why I am of opinion that no model Bill should be passed during the deliberations of that committee; because, if that committee were to decide that the provisions of that Bill were bad and mischievous, then would the House of Commons have stultified itself in having sanctioned the passing of forty or fifty individual Bills of the same kind. That would be exercising, if not abrogating, our functions contrary to the principles of our parliamentary constitution. The House of Commons must, therefore, interfere to maintain its own authority, and not allow it to be taken from it, piecemeal. I do not say whether these Bills are the best possible machines for the recovery of small debts,—possibly they may be the worst. On that I offer no opinion. But by the present constitution of these courts, the traders of the different towns sit as commissioners, and give their gratuitous services. The select committee up-stairs are deliberating whether that system should not be done away with, and power given to the Lord Chancellor to appoint a paid barrister to sit as judge in those courts in the different towns throughout the country. If he is to have that power, then I say he should not have it conferred upon him, piecemeal. I certainly object to the abrogation of those courts, where they now exist. I think it would be better that their constitution and jurisdiction should be amended and enlarged, than to destroy them by a side wind, which would establish courts of a cheaper kind, and to which, of course, the suitors would therefore naturally resort.

Mr. HAWES. — I certainly think it would be wiser, as suggested by the Right Honourable Baronet, to postpone the general discussion of the question, until the Warrington Small Debts Bill shall be printed, and in the hands of Members. I do not believe that Government have yet abandoned the idea of introducing a general measure; at the same time, I cannot understand why the Committee on the County Courts Bill have not been called upon to resume their sittings.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — I have already stated that, considerable alterations having been made in the framework of that Bill by the committee, it was, by an amicable arrangement with the Government, withdrawn, for the purpose of being remodelled.

Mr. P. THOMSON. — It appears to me that the House has only one of two courses to pursue, — namely, to delay the further consideration of this subject until the Bill shall be printed, or else to decide that all Small Debts Bills be postponed till the select committee shall have reported. If this House is to permit Bills, sent upstairs to a private committee, to be there so changed as to alter the principles of measures,—if it is to allow every clause of them to be expunged, and other and totally different clauses to be substituted,—then there is an end of the legislative powers of the House, so far as Private Bills are concerned. I do not mean to say that the Bill is a bad one; but I hope the House will agree to the postponement of the further consideration of it till Thursday, so as to allow it to be printed. A discussion can then take place, and the House will be enabled to come to some decision on the subject.

SIR G. GREY. — I have to state distinctly to the House, that the Government measure has not been withdrawn,— that it is delayed merely for the purpose of alteration, — and I expect that, in a few days, it will be laid before the House.

Mr. PATTEN. — I fear that little benefit will be derived from the adoption of the course recommended by the Right Honourable Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, and that the House will not be able to come to a more satisfactory conclusion on the subject on Thursday, than at present. If it be the feeling of the House that I should do so, I shall withdraw the motion, now, and take an opportunity of bringing on the discussion in the course of the next week. If the House intend to throw this Bill out, it should have come to that decision long ago, and not have put the parties to the expense of proceeding with it.

LORD G. SOMERSET. — I think it would be well if we were to have the benefit of your opinion, Sir, upon this question, — whether a private committee has the power of so altering a Bill, sent upstairs to it, as to leave nothing but the preamble of the original measure remaining? — because, if such be the case, it appears to me that all second readings, and all our discussions on the second readings, of Private Bills, are totally unnecessary.

The SPEAKER. — I can have no hesitation in stating, that, having had my attention called to the Bill now under discussion, I searched for a precedent, but could find none, where a Bill had been so altered by a committee as to be totally changed in principle. I am quite sure that this House would be placed in very great difficulty if it were to sanction the practice — which is now, for the first time, attempted to be introduced, — of entirely changing the provisions of a Bill before a private committee. Certain rules have been laid down, under a Standing Order, with regard to the time which shall elapse between the first and second reading of a Bill; the object of which Order is, that the parties interested may have ample opportunity of seeing its provisions, and that time may be had for circulating the Bill throughout the country; but, if private committees are allowed to alter Bills which are referred up-stairs in such a manner as to change the principle of them, the Reports of those committees may be brought up, the Bills may be read a third time next day, and thus the rules which the House has laid down for the protection of all classes, will be rendered perfectly useless. I trust the House will pause before it sanctions the exercise of such a power by committees up-stairs.

Mr. P. THOMSON. — After what has fallen from the Chair, I shall move that all committees on Small Debts Bills be ordered to suspend their proceedings till Monday next, in order to afford time to the parties to ascertain the opinion of the select committee.

Original motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Ordered — That the committees on Small Debts Bills do not proceed before Monday next.

PRISONS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Third reading deferred from Monday next, till Wednesday, 3d of July.

SUPREME COURTS (SCOTLAND) BILL. — COPYHOLDS ENFRANCHISEMENT BILL.

Third readings deferred from Thursday, till Wednesday, 3d of July.

THE CANADIAN PRISONERS.

Mr. LEADER. — Having been informed by the Right Honourable Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies that the case of the Canadian prisoners is still under the consideration of the Government, I beg leave, with a view to prevent all prejudice to those individuals, to withdraw for the present the motion of which I have given notice, and which stands for consideration this evening. I will take this opportunity of asking the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department, when it is his intention to proceed with the Canada Bill?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I cannot mention the precise day. I shall not be able to proceed with it on Monday; but I hope to be able to do so some day next week.

DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — I wish to ask the Noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland whether he has received any information relative to the distress which prevails in Bantry and other districts in the south-western part of Ireland? and whether any steps have been taken, or are intended to be taken, to afford relief by the Government? Out of a population of 7000 persons, 3000 are, I understand, in a state of very great distress, and 1000 are absolutely famishing.

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — I have received several communications relative to the distress which prevails in some of the districts of Ireland, from which it appears, I am sorry to say, that that distress is very great. I have ordered local inquiries to be made, with a view to the adoption of some remedial steps.

ECCLESIASTICAL DUTIES AND REVENUES BILL.

Mr. LIDDELL. — I beg to inquire of the Noble Lord, whether he really intends to bring on the Ecclesiastical Duties and Revenues Bill to-morrow? I would suggest to the Noble Lord, that the measure might with propriety be allowed to stand over until the next Session.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I have only to state, that I shall certainly move the Order of the Day, to-morrow, for the House going into committee on the Bill; and on doing so I shall announce the course which I intend to take. I may further say, in answer to the Honourable Gentleman's suggestion, that if the Honourable and Learned Recorder of London, and other Honourable and Learned Gentlemen on that side of the House, will give me an assurance that the deans and chapters are considering any plan which they intend to propose to Parliament, I shall think that a sufficient reason for postponing the further consideration of the Bill.

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON. — Can the Noble Lord say whether, in case he shall adopt the suggestion of the Honourable Gentleman, and postpone the Bill till another Session, the Government will propose another Suspension Bill?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I shall give the Noble Lord an answer to-morrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I shall now state to the House the course of business for Thursday and Friday evenings. I have already given an assurance to the Honourable Gentleman opposite that the Beer Bill shall have precedence of other business on Thursday; and I propose, when that is disposed of, to move that the Report of the vote of the Committee of Supply upon the subject of education shall be brought up. On Friday, the first question for consideration is the Bill of the Right Honourable Baronet opposite with respect to the trial of election petitions; and if that do not occupy much time, I shall move the Order of the Day for going into committee upon the Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Bill, with a view to the consideration of the franchise clauses. I think it would be very much to the convenience of the House, if the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire would state whether or not it be his intention to take the sense of the House against the bringing up the Report of the Committee of Supply on the educational grant?

LORD STANLEY. — I perceive that the Government, supported by the triumphant majority of last night, intend to persist in carrying on the educational grant. I am sorry that I am not able to give the Noble Lord the information which he asks for; but I believe I may say that he shall receive a positive answer to-morrow.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT (IRELAND).

Mr. W. BARRON. — I beg to be informed whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any measure, in the course of the present Session, to assimilate the law relating to imprisonment for debt in Ireland to that which exists in England?

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — My Honourable and Learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland gave notice, last night, of his intention to move, on Friday next, for leave to bring in a Bill upon the subject.

RAILWAYS (IRELAND).

Mr. ELLIS. — May I inquire of the Noble Viscount the Secretary for Ireland, if he can inform me when I may expect a Return to the motion I made on the 13th of March, with regard to public loans in Ireland, and also with regard to public works? I also wish to know whether or not it is proposed to proceed with the question of railways in Ireland?

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — Sir, I believe that the Returns alluded to have come over from Ireland, and will be shortly presented. With respect to the question of railways, I will take this opportunity to state the course which I intend to pursue, — merely premising my observations by saying, that I never introduced any proposition to the House in which it would have given me greater pleasure to have been able to persevere. Although I entirely concur in the propriety of adopting such a scheme as has been presented to the House, yet I should have wished so far to have altered the original suggestion submitted, as to make it extend equally to all the provinces of Ireland; but I am bound to say that, from the communications which have been addressed to me from all parts of the House, I do not see that I could entertain any reasonable hope of success in pressing that proposition forward; and I think it better candidly at once to state, in order to relieve all parties from suspense, that I shall not feel justified in asking Parliament to take any further step in the matter; and that I shall leave the field open to that private competition for which many (I think, erroneously) claim the superiority in undertakings of this kind. I still hope to be able to introduce a measure, in the course of the present Session, for the purpose of affording facilities in the draining of land, by way of an amendment of the Bill introduced some years ago by the Honourable Gentleman the Member for Kildare. It is also the intention of my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to proceed with his Bill for the improvement of the Shannon.

Mr. SHAW. — May I inquire whether the Noble Lord has entirely abandoned the railroad plan in Ireland? or whether he has given it up only for the present Session?

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I think it would not be right for the Government to state whether they intend to take the subject up again; such a declaration would check private speculation.

LORD MORPETH. — I cannot bind myself to say whether or not, at a future period, I shall be prepared to take up the scheme again; but the Government, feeling they cannot successfully carry on the project, now leave it to private individuals to see if they can do so.

NEW ZEALAND.

SIR R. INGLIS. — I wish to put two questions to my Right Honourable Friend the Under Secretary for the Colonies relative to New Zealand. I wish to know what are the intentions of her Majesty's Government relative to the colony of New Zealand generally, and also with respect to the New Zealand Company?

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — Sir, in answer to the question of the Honourable Member, I beg to state that, in consequence of various circumstances, Government has come to the determination of taking steps which will probably lead to the establishment of a British colony in that country, as the number of British subjects there renders the establishment of some authority absolutely necessary; but as those measures are still incomplete, I trust the Honourable Baronet will excuse me from entering further into them. A number of persons have gone out to New Zealand; and in order to protect the Aborigines, and for the maintenance of good order, it has been thought fit that measures should be taken to establish legal authority in the island. With regard to the New Zealand Land Companies, I need hardly assure the Honourable Gentleman that these companies could not have been hitherto recognised by the Government. They have sent expeditions from this country upon their own responsibility, and without any sanction from the Government; at the same time an explicit declaration was made to them, that, in any future step which the Government might take with reference to New Zealand, it would not consider itself bound to recognise any title to land that might be set up, which should appear to be fraudulent or excessive. I feel it better to give this explanation, because I perceive by the newspapers that various schemes have been projected relative to the island. Although, in the event of a British colony being established in New Zealand, the Government would by no means discourage emigration to it, which should be conducted in a manner not to interfere with the rights of the aboriginal inhabitants, or with any titles to land which shall have been fairly acquired; yet at the same time it is necessary that parties should understand that, in the case of land acquired from the Aborigines, — a class quite unable to protect, properly, their own interests, — it is the duty of Government to protect them, and to see that no title to land be set up which is either — as I before said — fraudulent or excessive.

WIGAN ELECTION.

Mr. EWART. — Sir, it is now my duty to move for a select committee to inquire into the allegations made in the Wigan petition, presented on the 10th of June, complaining that abduction and violence had been used at the last election for that borough. I trust that the House will not fail to come forward upon this occasion to protect the privileges which it has conferred upon voters; and I am sure the House will not sanction such proceedings as have here taken place, but that it will visit the offenders with the punishment they deserve. Sir, I beg most respectfully to assert that, if a candidate go down to a place, invited by the majority of the voters, and the party opposed to his principles not only abuse those voters, but carry some of them off to a distant part of the country; that is one of the most aggravated cases that can ever come under the consideration of Parliament. A circumstance which particularly aggravates this case is, that the individuals on whom the aggressions were committed were principally poor men. The same fact affords a reason for the interference of the House in their defence, stronger even than would apply to the cases of those, who, from their station in society, would be better able to take care of themselves.

Digitized by Google

The petition is already before the House; and I will not go into the details of the case, — replete as it is with circumstances of a most aggravated nature, — as I entered very fully into the subject on a former occasion. I need not remind Honourable Members that, in cases like those of Liverpool, Stafford, and York, where bribery and corruption were complained of, select committees have been appointed; and, in accordance with the decisions of such committees, the parties implicated have received their just punishment. If this course be necessary in cases of corruption, then, à fortiori, is it necessary in this instance, where there are alleged, not only corruption, but intimidation, violence, and abduction. The cases of abduction complained of are divided into three classes; — first, the class of voters confined in their own houses by the partisans of the opposite party, terrified to such a degree as to be prevented from coming out, and obliged to escape through the houses of their neighbours, in order to have any chance whatever of going to the poll. The second class is — of voters seized in the streets of Wigan, locked in houses, drugged with powerful opiates, and detained until the last moment,—so that, had they not been rescued by their friends, they would have been unable to vote at all. The third class is composed of voters violently seized in the streets, carried into back premises of houses in the town, laid down by force, and compelled to take powerful opiates, and then carried in chaises to Liverpool, where they were kept till the poll was finally closed. All these persons had signed the requisition. In thus bringing this case before the House, and calling its attention to the petition, I have acted as well in accordance with the wishes of my constituents as with my own feelings; and I feel satisfied that I shall have done so with the accordance of the House, likewise, if a single spark of constitutional feeling yet remains among us. Sir, I do not think it necessary to dwell further on this subject; but I respectfully, and, I trust, not in vain, now call on this House to listen to the prayer of these petitioners, — to vindicate the privileges of the electors and of this House; and I shall conclude by moving for "a select committee to inquire into the allegations contained in the Wigan petition, presented on the 10th of June, complaining of abduction and violence practised towards the voters at the last Wigan election."

Mr. W. G. HOPE. — Sir, I trust to be able, in a very few words, to show the House that this motion ought never to have been brought forward, and that it ought not to be acceded to. The Honourable Member for Wigan has divided his cases of alleged outrage into three classes. I will endeavour to take each class separately, and dispose of it. First, however, I must advert to that case which stood third on the list in the petition, and which seems, by the parties concerned, to have been looked upon as of peculiar importance, from the singular circumstance that the individuals charged with the offences there stated have been already prosecuted for them, brought to trial, and — acquitted. The case I refer to is that of William Blomerley, which is described in the petition in these words: —

That William Blomerley, of Wigan, manufacturer and shopkeeper, a requisitionist and voter in favour of Mr. Ewart, was, about six o'clock of the morning of the day of polling, violently seized in the open street by a number of people, forced into a public house in Wigan Lane, called the Bowling Green (where a large party of Mr. Kearsley's partisans were then assembled), confined in a room there until a post-chaise arrived, into which the said William Blomerley was forced and taken to the Ridgway Arms public house in Adlington, distant seven or eight miles from Wigan, and there confined until he was rescued. That there were three men in the chaise, who guarded the said William Blomerley to Adlington, and afterwards acted as guards over him when confined in the Ridgway Arms public house, and frequently treated the said William Blomerley with great harshness and violence. That the said William Blomerley remonstrated strongly, and resisted violently, throughout the whole proceeding, and broke the chaise windows in the attempt to make himself known and heard; and, during his confinement at Adlington, broke the windows of the room he was confined in, and remonstrated frequently with the landlord, James Fowler, and demanded his liberty, but without effect; and the said James Fowler had in attendance a number of delfmen in his employ, with weapons, for the purpose of resisting, as he said, any attempt that might be made to rescue Blomerley. That the first person who went and demanded the liberation of Blomerley was Alex. Thompson, who was threatened with violence unless he went away. Thompson then left the house, and soon afterwards returned with three others; but the doors were closed; they were refused admittance; and the people about the house began to close the window shutters. That the party again left the house; and having met Blomerley's wife and several others, they returned with them, — when Mrs. Blomerley demanded to see her husband, but was refused by James Fowler the landlord. That some of the party then came to Wigan for assistance, and returned with two police officers and about fourteen assistants, in an omnibus, when Mrs. Blomerley and the police officers again demanded of Fowler that he would open the door and liberate Blomerley; but he still refused, until the parties promised to pay for a barrel of ale, to be given away by him. That Blomerley was brought to Wigan in the omnibus about two o'clock in the afternoon, and voted in favour of Mr. Ewart.

A clearer case, if the statements were true, could certainly not be shown; yet, on the 13th of April last, the parties so accused were tried and acquitted. I cannot conceive why the Honourable Member omitted, just now, to state this most important fact; but it seems most singular that he should come down to the House and ask for a select committee to try — or rather, in fact, to re-try — a question that had already been adjudicated on by the ordinary tribunals, and at the same time not inform the House that such trial and acquittal had taken place. The next case I would refer to is that of a person named Riley, thus described in the petition: —

That, among the rest, John Riley, of Wigan, beer-seller, a voter who had signed the requisition to the said William Ewart, and had promised him his vote, was, on the evening of Thursday, the seventh day of March, invited to the Eagle and Child inn, where the said John Hodson Kearsley's committee and friends assembled. That when the said John Riley arrived opposite to the Eagle and Child inn, he was forcibly dragged into the house, and there held down upon a chair by one man, while another held his arms, a third held up his head, and a fourth poured some liquid down his throat, which produced almost instantaneous stupor. That in that state the said John Riley was forced into a chaise, taken down to Liverpool to a public house in St. Vincent Street, kept by a man named Peter Stubbs, and there deprived of his hat and shoes, and confined up-stairs, and not allowed to go out, even for the purpose of relieving nature, until after the close of the poll on Saturday afternoon, when the parties by whom he had been taken to Liverpool brought him back to Wigan in a chaise, and set him down in one of the streets of Wigan, about midnight. That whilst at Liverpool, in a state of unconsciousness, the said John Riley had spirits and narcotics administered, and was from time to time struck on the top of his head, and thrown upon the ground, and fallen upon by some of the men who took him down. That, owing to the liquids administered to him, the said John Riley remained in a state of unconsciousness from the Thursday night until the Saturday morning, and has since suffered much pain, both internally and externally, from the treatment he then received. That, when restored to consciousness, the said John Riley repeatedly demanded, both of the landlord and the parties who had taken him to Liverpool, to be set at liberty, in order that he might return to Wigan; but, under various pretences, they refused to liberate him. That James Riley, of Wigan, retailer of beer, after being treated at the Shovel and Broom public house, by voters in the interest of the said John Hodson Kearsley, was invited to go to the Eagle and Child, under the pretence that a person of the name of Nightingale, a Chartist, from Manchester, who was proposed as a candidate, wanted to see him. That the said James Riley went to the Eagle and Child, and on his arrival was forced into the same chaise with the said John Riley, and taken with him to Liverpool, and with him deprived of shoes and hat, confined until Saturday afternoon, and then brought back to Wigan at midnight. That the said James Riley resisted violently, broke the chaise windows, and threatened to stab the men unless they let him go; on which a voter and active partisan of Mr. Kearsley's, and actively engaged in forcing both John and James Riley into the chaise, with a knife inflicted a wound on the said James Riley.

Thus it is clear the parties were persons well known, and the alleged assaults amounted to a case of cutting and maiming. Why were they not prosecuted as for that offence? In the absence of any such prosecution, and where the offence was one clearly cognisable by the ordinary criminal law, it is really monstrous to call for a select committee of this House. But another opportunity of investigating the facts was afforded by the inquiry into the validity of the return at the last Wigan election. The facts charged were, indeed, in some measure put in issue, — the agent for the sitting Member having claimed to place on the poll the very votes in respect of which all the alleged outrages had occurred. Thus the Honourable Member had not only had an opportunity of trying these persons before a court of justice, but also of bringing the facts in question before the Election Committee, a sworn jury, and where the witnesses were examined on oath. Yet he now comes down to ask this House to grant him a select committee to inquire into the same facts, — a tribunal before which the witnesses would not be examined on oath. I would refer the Honourable Member to what occurred in the case of Cromarty, where certain persons carried off a voter, made him drunk, and it was even alleged that they drugged him. Those persons were convicted by a jury, yet they were afterwards made justices of the peace. Surely such a case as that ought to make the Honourable Gentleman less eager to call on the House to express their indignation against persons in the lower ranks of life, for doing precisely the same thing. The only difference I can see between the case of Cromarty and that of Wigan is, that whereas, in the former case, the parties were convicted, and afterwards made justices of the peace; in the latter, they have been acquitted, and the Government are not called on to make them justices of the peace. Other cases are mentioned in the petition; as to one of which I will only observe, that one of those persons, who is, in the petition, stated to have been overcome by stupor, and in a state of unconsciousness, walked out of the town without assistance. Another of the persons referred to was found in a chaise in the streets, at one o'clock in the morning, on the look-out for voters of the other party; and, in order to prevent him from doing mischief, he was pulled out of the chaise, and shut p for a certain time. Another case stated i the petition is one, where the voter was revented by terror from coming out of is house to go and vote. The whole harge in the petition is merely that bout a hundred persons assembled before his voter's house, and that he was terri- ed. Look, again, at the circumstances hich occurred in the Cromarty case. hey must be fresh in the recollection of he House. The parties were, in that ase, actually tried and convicted; yet, hen the subject was afterwards brought orward in the House of Commons, it was rgued that the whole affair was a mere lection frolic. In the present case, all hat is alleged is, that a number of per- ons assembled before the house door of he voter the night before the election, nd that he and others were frightened. The last case in the petition is that of the persons who "entered the house of James Dobb, and while he was in bed, and not- withstanding the resistance of his wife, and some whom she called upon to aid her, some forced their way up stairs, and some sat down in the house and began to smoke." It further appears, that Mr. Kearsley's partisans resisted the con- stables; and it was not until James Dobb's brother threatened to stab the first who touched his brother, that they were in- duced to leave the house. Why, this is one of the commonest kind of election squabbles, and surely not a case on which to found a call for the interference of a committee of this House. The Honour- able Member has referred to what he conceives to be precedents for the course which he has recommended. He has re- ferred to the cases of Liverpool, Stafford, and York. Those cases, however, were very different from the present. In all those cases, no election petition had been pre- sented; and no opposition, therefore, given substantiating the alleged cases. But in the present case, not only have the parties been acquitted by a court of jus- tice, but there has been a committee of this House, before which the costs have been put on issue, and where they might have been contested. Another point of difference between this case and those referred to by the Honourable Member is, that the complaint, in the present in- stance, is of individual outrages, and not of any great and general corruption, or malpractices. Matters of that sort, alone, such as nearly concern the public wel- fare, are properly made the subject of application to this House for select com- mittees. The offences here complained of come under the description of simple breaches of the peace, and ought, all of them, to have been treated as such. In the cases referred to by the Honourable Member as precedents, the object of the inquiry was always to found a proposition for disfranchisement, or some step of that sort, as regarded the place in which the alleged offences had occurred. But no such result is proposed in regard to the bo- rough of Wigan. What result does the Honourable Member propose to himself from the present motion? Is it that abduction, and cutting and maiming, should be declared crimes? They are crimes already. Is it that the power of prosecuting these parties should be given? That power exists already. Suppose it were the case of Mr. Blomerley, would the House direct the Attorney General to prosecute a party already tried by the proper tribunal, and acquitted? Would they submit to the absurdity of having the former acquittal brought in, and pleaded as a bar to the prosecution? What, then, is the object of the motion? If, after the question has been tried before the regular tribunal, in the case most relied upon, among all these, — if, after having had the opportunity of in- vestigating the case before a sworn com- mittee, where the evidence would have been on oath, — the object of the Honour- able Member is, by his present motion, to have the case investigated by a com- mittee, before whom the evidence will not be on oath, — I cannot but say that such an attempt is not very creditable; and that, of itself, it forms a sufficient ground for the House to reject the motion.

Mr. WARBURTON.—Sir, I deny that, because there has been a criminal pro- secution, the House is to be precluded from entering further into this question. There may not be enough evidence to criminate a person in a court of justice, and yet quite enough to induce the House to interfere and put a stop to the prac- tices of which the parties are accused. It should not be forgotten that the object of this motion is, not to criminate in- dividuals, but to draw the attention of the House to practices that are prevalent, in order that we may so interfere and put a stop to them. The Honourable Gentle- man who has just sat down has also urged that full opportunity for an in- vestigation of the alleged outrages was afforded before the select committee, where the parties were examined on oath. He surely forgot what is the legitimate object of such a committee. It is for one or the other of contending candi- dates to seat himself as a Member; — that done, they have nothing more to contend for. Was it their business, in this instance, at their own private expense, to investigate facts of a general nature, bearing more upon the public welfare than upon their own title to their seats? If either Members or their agents were to attempt such a course, they would be guilty of the extreme of folly. In the present instance, I conceive that there is primâ facie evidence sufficient to induce the House to go into the inquiry necessary to establish the existence and the nature of the practices complained of; and I shall, therefore, support the motion of my Honourable Friend.

Mr. C. W. WYNN. — Sir, I really heard the present motion with some surprise, — having expected that the Honourable Member would have pointed out some distinct object as likely to be attained by, or to result from, the inquiry. The Honourable Member alleges that the privileges of this House have been violated, and the freedom of election violated. Unquestionably that would afford good ground for inquiry, if such inquiry were instituted with a view to the punishment of those who had been guilty of such offences; but it appears that, in the present instance, the individuals have been, already, brought to trial and acquitted. The Honourable Member for Bridport has suggested another object to be attained by the inquiry, — prevention of the recurrence of such offences. If they were offences that could not be punished by the law before the ordinary tribunals, the subject would be well worthy the attention of the House; but the fact is, that there is not one of the offences charged which is not cognizable by the common law. Some of these offences were made assaults; and others were, in effect, conspiracies to prevent the voters from going to the poll; but all were such cases as, were the question upon them moved before a court of justice, would be visited with adequate punishment. If the charges in this petition had been proved before the Election Committee, it would have been the duty of that committee to have reported them to the House, and the House would have ordered a prosecution. But, that course not having been pursued, what is there to prevent the Honourable Member, or any other person, from bringing those parties to trial at the very next assizes? I entertain very strong objections to such inquiries being carried on before committees, before whom the witnesses are not examined on oath. If prosecutions were ordered on such evidence, there would be the possibility, at the least, of the witnesses having perjured themselves. Such a case did occur three years ago; and the accused, although prosecuted by an order of the House, was acquitted by the jury, who found that the witnesses had so perjured themselves. I never would object, however, to such investigations as the present being carried on by the House, where an adequate mode of trial was not already provided by the constitution; but I certainly do object, and shall always object, to any attempt to pass by the regularly constituted court, with its sworn jury and sworn witnesses, for the purpose of erecting within this House a tribunal before whom the witnesses would not be on oath.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — Sir, it strikes me that all the arguments of Honourable Gentlemen opposite were addressed to the statement of the Honourable Member for Wigan, and that the arguments of the Honourable Member for Bridport have not been met by those who oppose the motion. Those arguments remain unanswered, and unanswerable. I regret, much, that these parties were indicted at all; and that the whole case was not, in the first instance, brought before this House. In a court of justice the accused themselves could not be examined; but before a committee of this House they would have been asked who set them on to commit the outrages? and who had paid them? Such an inquiry could not fairly be expected to be gone into before an Election Committee, where the expense falls upon Members themselves, or on candidates. That Member would be a madman who would enter on such an inquiry before an Election Committee. The inquiry is one intimately connected with the public welfare, and ought, therefore, to be carried on at the public expense. The practices which this petition brings to light will, I hope, contribute to convince the House, as they have helped to convince me, of the necessity for the Ballot as a protection to the voter. I am for having every case of corruption and intimidation brought before the House and exposed, in order that the necessity for the Ballot, as a protection, may be demonstrated. I hope that the motion will be carried, as an evidence of the necessity which exists for some safeguard of the interests of the public.

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON. — Sir, I was truly astonished to hear the Honourable and Learned Member argue in favour of the Ballot from this motion. I am satisfied that, if the Ballot were to become the law of the land, the evils complained of would be increased tenfold, as there would then exist a greater inducement to the rich and powerful to peruate corruption, from the secrecy ich would accompany the exercise of franchise. I must be allowed to say, ave never heard argument more grossly applied than in this case.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK.—Sir, I pe that, on this occasion, the discussion ich was had on the Ballot, only a few enings ago, will not be renewed. I nk we should do much better to confine rselves to the question before us; and I g most earnestly to impress upon the onourable Member for Wigan the expe-ency of not pressing the present motion. though it has been most ably sup-rted by the Honourable Member for idport, and the Honourable Member r Cockermouth, yet I must say that ey have failed to remove from my mind e plain and obvious objection to the pointment of this committee, — that it ould be renewing an inquiry already ttled in a court of justice. It has been ged, to be sure, that only one case out the whole was tried. But, in all pro-ibility, that case was selected because it as supposed to afford the greatest pros-ect of a conviction, — a prospect which ould exist in a degree still less, perhaps, any of the remaining cases. The Ho-ourable Member for Bridport says this quiry is not asked for with a view to ie punishment of the parties, but to able the House to legislate, generally, gainst the evil complained of; but, in y opinion, the first and most important ep for this purpose would be a con-iction in a court of law. I hope, under ll the circumstances, that the Honourable lember will withdraw his motion, as, if he ress it, I shall certainly vote against him.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — Sir, I think here is one important consideration con-ected with this case, which has not yet een alluded to, — I mean the immense xtent of inquiry we should be engaged in, f we were to consent to the motion of the Honourable Member. In this case there vas an inquiry before an Election Com-mittee, and also before a court of law; nd if the House grant this motion under uch circumstances, we can never refuse o grant similar motions and applications or inquiry when there has been no pre-ious inquiry. I presume this inquiry is o be conducted at the public expense; nd, if it turn out to be frivolous, what emedy or redress will there lie against he party making the complaint? Much f the complaint in the present case loes appear to be frivolous. Perhaps the airest way to test this would be to take he last case, which, I suppose, was considered the most aggravated, and, consequently, reserved for the climax. It is the case of James Dobb, in which it is stated that a number of persons forced their way into his house and smoked tobacco! The petition states that James Dobb, of Wigan, mordant manufacturer, was a voter who polled for Mr. Ewart, —

That between five and six o'clock on the morning of the day of polling, about twenty of Mr. Kearsley's partisans went to the house of the said James Dobb, whilst he was in bed; and notwithstanding the resistance of his wife and persons she requested to aid her, some of them forced their way into the house and up-stairs, and some sat down in the house and began to smoke. That on resistance being offered by the constables and others called to protect Mr. Dobb, they were told by some of the partisans of Mr. Kearsley that it was of no use, as they were determined to have him away with them; and it was not until Mr. John Dobb, his brother, had been sent for, and had insisted upon the parties leaving the house, and threatened to stab the first person that offered to touch his brother, that the mob were induced to leave Mr. James Dobb's house. That there were other cases where voters' houses were beset, and the voters induced, by the fear of being forcibly removed, to leave their houses; and in other instances, parties were removed to a distance, and kept there for several days; and one, in which a voter was put to bed at the Eagle and Child inn, deprived of his clothes, and compelled to remain in bed from Wednesday night until Saturday morning.

Why, something like this occurs at every election. I dare say it has happened at my own; but, surely, it is no case for a select committee. The person who seems to have misconducted himself, is the person who threatened to stab the others. It appears, however, that these parties left the house of James Dobb; and I cannot conceive what legislative enactment we could pass to prevent the recurrence of such a proceeding for the future. A contested election never occurs, in which, within a few days after the contest, complaints are not made by one party of the other. If we consent to such a motion as the present, the House would be constantly engaged in tedious and expensive investigations, and in hardly any case a practical result would be arrived at. I cannot conceive what legislative enactment could be passed on this subject, which would not be found to be most oppressive and vexatious; and I must, therefore, express my decided dissent to this motion.

Mr. BROTHERTON. — Sir, in my opinion this is a case well worthy the consideration of the House. I know facts, myself, which, better than any arguments, prove the necessity for inquiry. In the borough which I represent there was, at the last election, a voter who had intended to vote for me forced away in a carriage, and kept at a distance until the poll had closed. I shall support the motion of my Honourable Friend, in the hope that the result will be the carrying of some legislative enactment on the subject.

The House then divided: — Ayes 86; Noes 81; —Majority against the motion 45.

COLONIAL LANDS SALES.

Mr. H. G. WARD. — Sir, I am aware of the difficulty, at a time when party spirit runs high, and party struggles occupy too many of those hours which ought to be given to the practical purposes of legislation, of inducing the House to give a patient hearing to a question, which not only has no party interest to recommend it, but which it is necessary to illustrate by a particular class of facts and details, that very few Members of this House are in the habit of attaching that importance to which, in my judgment, they deserve. Feeling this, and knowing how little it is in my power to impart any attraction to the subject beyond that which its intrinsic merits may command, I should have shrunk from bringing forward the motion of which I have given notice, if I had not felt that the question was one which not only ought to be brought under the consideration of the House, but which could not, in justice to the country, be any longer deferred. I admit that there are no hopes of legislating upon it during the present Session; but I call upon the House to fix the grounds upon which future legislation must rest, — to affirm the principles upon which the Government must act, — and to permit me to show what there is, in the establishment of those principles, interesting to the community at large, and more peculiarly so to that portion of the community, whose industry is their daily bread. No man who thinks at all, can look at the present condition of the working classes, the state of excitement that prevails amongst them, and the wild theories that have been broached by their leaders at the public meetings which have recently taken place, without feelings both of commiseration and of alarm. I have watched, narrowly, the course of the present movement; and when I look to the fact, that the peace of England has been endangered, during the last twelve months, by an agitation against property, against law, against society itself, — I think myself entitled to ask, even those who have least faith in the possibility of a remedy, whether any experiment which holds out the hope of a remedy ought not to be tried? Sir, I am convinced that no great popular movement has ever taken place without having economical causes at the bottom of it. It is physical suffering that engenders olitical discontent. In the present instance, this is pre-eminently the case. Chartism is a knife and fork question, — a bread and cheese question, as Mr. Stephens has called it, — an attempt to effect great social, through the medium of great political, changes — to acquire property by acquiring the franchise — to get rid at once of political disabilities and distress. We in this House know perfectly well that these hopes are illusory, and that the welfare of the working classes in this country depends, in a great degree, upon the preservation of that very artificial system which they denounce, and would destroy, if they had the power, to-morrow; since, without the assistance which capital and credit afford to the poorer classes in this country, they could not exist. In lieu of the comparative comforts which many enjoy, they would be left a prey to absolute starvation. But how convince them of this? How reason with empty stomachs? How persuade men who work fourteen, fifteen, and even sixteen hours a-day, for a pittance barely sufficient to sustain life, that there is not something unsound and rotten in a system which produces such results? And it must not be forgotten, that the sufferings of the poorer classes in this country are enhanced by the constant contemplation of the luxuries of the rich. They see every comfort and blessing that it is possible for wealth to purchase, or human ingenuity to devise, showered down upon the affluent, as if in mockery of their own distress, while they are entirely and hopelessly deprived of all anticipation of ever participating in blessings which they may learn to appreciate, but can never enjoy. I have visited many countries; and I have no hesitation in saying, that in no part of the world does there exist such a fearful distinction between the richer and poorer classes as here, — in no country is the line of demarcation between them so rigidly drawn and so seldom crossed, — in no country are the extremes of wealth and poverty brought into such fearful and dangerous juxtaposition. I can well understand, under these circumstances, how the feelings originate with which the Chartists have been taught to regard what they term the "property classes" in this country. Feelings of jealousy, hatred, and distrust have been excited against all who possess property amongst us; and a belief has been engendered in the minds of the labouring classes that we are money-mongers, profit-mongers, bloodsuckers, — men who would grind the faces of the poor for their own unworthy ends. Expressions of this kind are invariably applied to the property classes by the Chartist orators and the Chartist press; so that those who have nothing are induced to regard as their natural enemies all who have anything to lose. Much ingenuity has been shown by some of the Chartist leaders in enforcing these doctrines by the most singular misapplication and perversion of scriptural texts. Every one must have observed this, who has been in the habit of reading the productions of the Chartists; for it was only in a newspaper of Sunday last, which advocates their principles, that I saw a most singular interpretation of the text, "Be ye fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it," — which was construed not only into a permission, but a command, to every man of the age of twenty-one, to marry, whether he could support a family or not, with the assurance that, if labour failed him, he might claim as his inheritance a portion of the land. He was told that, if he could not obtain the means of subsistence otherwise, he was justified in demanding, or taking it, from the produce of the land. This feeling has been encouraged still more by the language of persons who have refused to countenance the resort to physical force or other outrage. An Honourable Friend of mine, whom I regret to see not in his place, — I mean the Honourable Member for Birmingham, — who has always kept honourably aloof from the violent proceedings of the Chartists, has, nevertheless, given the sanction of his authority to some of the extravagant opinions which they put forth. He has said, that it should be in the power of every man to procure "a fair day's wages for a fair day's work, and a full day's wages for a full day's work." Now, I cannot help expressing my regret at finding such a doctrine maintained by such a man, who has thus given the sanction of his name to what I cannot but regard as a gross politico-economical heresy. It may be said that the diffusion of education would put a stop such errors; but we have not time to wait for the result of education, when opinions like these are generally entertained. I listened with deep interest to the opinions expressed on the subject of education, the other night, by my Honourable Friend the Member for Liskeard; but, looking to the state of so large a portion of the population, I should like him to explain how we can expect to educate men whose lives are spent in procuring the means of living from day to day? What is the state of the population employed in the factories? They are engaged in long hours of wearisome toil every day of their lives, and in procuring food for the body, have no time to think of food for the mind. The handloom weavers are still worse off. I recollect, in the debate on the corn laws, I referred to the case of a man named Marsden, which made much impression on the House; but several Honourable Members immediately asked me whether this man was not a handloom weaver — when I had described the privations endured by him; and on my answering in the affirmative, many turned away, as if they were not surprised at such sufferings when they heard the occupation of the man. But are the handloom weavers "Pariahs?" Are they outcasts from society? Are one million of human beings to be exposed to such sufferings without pity or prospect of relief? It is now well ascertained that their distress is not caused by the mere competition with machinery; for it was proved before the commissioners appointed to inquire into their condition, that one great cause of the pressure on the handloom weavers is, the competition that exists in the trade itself. It was called by Mr. Symons "the common sewer of our industry," because so easily acquired, and, therefore, always overstocked. But how are we to bring education to bear upon men whose condition is so wretched, yet who form such a large mass of the population, as they amount in number to upwards of one million? Mr. Symons, in his report upon their state and prospects, says, —

> When a man's whole faculties are strained to the utmost, from sunrise to sunset, to procure a miserable subsistence, he has neither leisure, aptitude, nor desire for information. He is assimilated to the beasts of burden, and gradually partakes of their animalism; for, in the degree in which extreme privation bars out civilisation and refinement, is scope given to each brutalising impulse and passion.

He says, also, —

> There is a total decay of reading amongst them — that there is little scope for the exercise of prudence — and that religion has lost its influence, — as their only care and anxiety is how to procure their daily meal. Their children are growing up in a state of semi-barbarism, and yet they have the strongest desire to educate them. There is no communication between them and the wealthier classes; for rarely do the language of sympathy, or the kindlier influences of charity, gladden their damp and dreary dwellings.

The pressure is very great on other classes as well as the handloom weavers. If we inquire, we shall learn that in the factories the hours of labour are increasing, while the amount of wages is gradually growing less. If we go to the agricultural districts, more particularly in Devonshire, we shall find that wages during the last winter were only 6*s.* or 7*s.* a-week, while wheat was 10*s.* a bushel. Again, what is the condition of at least one half of the human race in this country? We are in the habit of boasting of being a moral country, and of the distinction and care with which women are treated amongst us. Yet in no country, with which I am acquainted, does there exist so vast a mass of female misery and degradation as here. Not more than one woman out of three can marry at an early age, because such is the pressure of population upon the means of subsistence that not more than that proportion of men can afford to do so. Employment of any kind is so difficult to be procured by females, that, after working sixteen or seventeen hours a-day at needlework, they hardly obtain sufficient to give them a bare subsistence, — I believe not more than 8*d.* a-day. The consequence is distress and prostitution to an extent, and beginning at an age, unheard of in any other Christian community. Thousands, every year, are running their brief career of misery, drunkenness, disease, the canal, or the unknown and unhallowed grave. This is the fate of a large portion of that sex which we profess to love, to honour, to revere, and which, under happier circumstances, sheds the brightest influence over our lives. Sir, these things may shock delicacy, and wound national pride; but they ought to be known. They are truths that must be told; for they are part of the system with which we have to deal, and of the evils that we have to remedy, if we wish to avoid the danger of what are termed revolutionary principles. Revolutionary principles are harmless in a sound and healthy state of society; but they become highly dangerous when put forward in a state of things like that which this country now sees, — when men in a condition of intense suffering and poverty, add to ignorance an organisation of numbers, with little or nothing to hope from things as they are, and are, consequently, prepared to welcome any and every change. Among the population of this country there is an immense mass of disaffection arising out of physical suffering, combined with ignorance, — with a consciousness of civil and political rights, a sense of injustice done, and a hopelessness of redress, which give a most formidable character to the present movement. But it is said, "Oh, we can easily stop this movement, and put down the Chartists." No doubt it is easy to suppress any temporary acts of violence; but Chartism cannot be put down in this way. The Legislature can only deal effectually with Chartism, by going to its source, and by removing, or mitigating, the pressure which occasions it. It is an evil of a purely economical character — a social evil, — the growth of freedom, not of political abuse. It is not an evil which has arisen from bad government or bad laws; it would be impossible to point out any law, the removal of which would place the working population of this country at once in a healthy state. It is to be traced clearly to the disproportion between our population and the field for the employment of labour, in spite of the thousand channels which capital and credit have opened to our industry. And not only in the humblest classes does this disproportion exist. The church, the bar, the army, the navy, trade, — all are subject to it. Every department is overstocked. There is but one prize for one hundred blanks. Profits are less; the demand for educated labour is less; for every opening there are twenty competitors. No man can rise above his original position in the world, and the most persevering industry is often cheated of its reward. Even the wealther portion of the community, though placed far above the reach of poverty, feel the pressure, to some extent, for their children and connections, if not for themselves. The picture, Sir, which I have drawn, is not an exaggerated one. I have no wish to exaggerate it. It is a picture which no lover of his country could contemplate without deep distress, if the hope of alleviation were limited to the confines of the British islands. Fortunately, however, this is not the case. There is another and a mightier resource available,—a resource to which I have referred in my motion this evening. I believe this resource to be an almost inexhaustible one. And why? Because it consists in a proper disposal of the waste lands in our colonies, and is limited only by their extent. And what is that extent? Look at the British colonial empire — the most magnificent empire the world ever saw! The old Spanish boast, that the sun never set in their dominions, has been more truly realised amongst ourselves; and not only do we possess in our colonies every possible variety of climate and of soil, but the power of producing almost every article of which our manufacturing industry stands in need. These are the treasures that Providence has bestowed upon us. To what account have we turned them? How have these materials of wealth been dispensed? Have colonies been regarded as an integral part of the empire — a place of refuge for thousands, who are wasting their lives in profitless labour, here? No; there has been no principle, or system, or plan, in our colonial policy, at all. Government has simply looked on the colonies as a field for patronage, and the Legislature has regarded them as a source from which contributions to the revenue might be drawn. The Legislature has done nothing. The Government nothing. Whatever good has been achieved is due to individual enterprise, and to individual enterprise alone. But surely the land in our colonies is intended to serve higher and better purposes than those to which I have referred. What are termed the "waste lands" are emphatically public lands, — the inheritance, the patrimony of every poor man in England, Ireland, and Scotland, who pays allegiance to the Crown, — and as such I claim them. They are a trust, which the Government of this country is bound to administer for the public good; and, further, so to administer as to afford the means of reaching the colonies, if they desire it, to all those whose poverty, not their will, binds them to our shores. Fortunately, the attainment of this great object is attended with little difficulty. In the first place, you cannot introduce any sound, or equal, or practical system of dealing with the lands in the colonies, without creating a revenue from them; and, judging from the result in other countries, in which the experiment has been tried, this revenue must be very large. Take, for instance, the United States, which are situated somewhat like ourselves in this respect. In forty-two years, they have realised from this source a sum of not less than seventeen millions sterling, while, during the very period in which they have been doing this, with incalculable national advantages, our waste lands have remained waste lands in every sense of the word. Yet the American colonies — (for theirs are colonies as much as ours, there being no essential difference between an emigrant's going to the back settlements from the coast towns of the United States) and his going to Australia from England, — so far from having been retarded by what might appear to be a heavy tax, have actually flourished, not only in spite of the tax, but, in fact, in consequence of it, to a degree which is quite unprecedented in the history of the world. They have advanced, by the most rapid strides, to wealth, power, and internal comfort. New towns, new states, have everywhere sprung up; while, on the other hand, the land in our colonies, which has been most lavishly granted for the most unwise purposes, has produced no revenue, created no wealth. Our settlers are few, and full of just complaints.

Sir, I cannot help thinking that this lamentable contrast, in itself, sufficiently bespeaks the fact, that there must be some fundamental error in the principle on which we have proceeded. That fundamental error was pointed out, some ten years ago, in a work called England and America, the author of which is now known to be Mr. Gibbon Wakefield; — a work, which — whether I look to the admirable clearness with which the theory of colonisation is developed in it, the vast array of facts brought to bear upon it, or the great practical results to which it must lead — all the offspring of one man's mind — I cannot but regard as an honour to the country and the age. I only trust that the theory, thus developed, will be taken up and acted upon by the Government of this country on a large scale, and within the shortest possible period of time. Mr. Wakefield, in his England and America, lays it down as the first principle of colonisation, rightly understood, not to disperse labour, but to concentrate it; to keep the population together, so as to secure for the colony, from the first step in its career, the advantages of co-operation, and of a continuous supply of combinable labour. He has shown, further, that some pressure from without is necessary to produce this effect — to check the natural tendency of every man who emigrates to a new country, from one, where people are plentiful and land scarce, to become a proprietor of land himself, under the idea, which he carries out with him, of the value attached to land in his own country; forgetful that land, without combinable labour to employ upon it, is of no more value than the sky above, or the sea around it.

The consequence of this fallacious tendency, wherever it has been indulged, has been, to isolate the settlers — to divide labour into fractional parts, — the single pair of hands of the single individual, — to prevent combination, exchange, or progress of any kind. All history, all experience prove that, when once a colony is suffered to fall into this state of stagnation, it never advances. Where there is a dispersion of settlers, there can obviously be no co-operation, and, consequently, no improvement. Nova Scotia is a proof of this, amongst our own colonies. The Gauchos of the Pampas are another. The Spaniards, there, are precisely what their forefathers were before them, 300 years ago; and if there are other colonies, which have not shared this fate, it is because the successors of the original settlers, being men of greater energy and capital, have corrected the vice of their position, by having recourse to the labour of slaves, in default of a supply of free labour; by the aid of which slave labour, they have raised a vast amount of exchangeable produce, and created an abundant trade. This is the real history of slavery, which, in a certain state of society, steps in to supply the place of that hired labour, which capital can always command in a country where people are plentiful, and land scarce, but which no capital can command in a country where this proportion between land and people is reversed. Hence, too, it is that the colonies of all nations have undergone, in their infancy, the curse of slavery; for, even where black slavery is not practised, there is white slavery to supply its place. To this day there is white slavery in Australia, and it produces an infinitely worse moral effect than the black slavery, which it has cost us twenty millions to get rid of in the West Indies. At the present moment, however, but for the white slavery, which is called the convict system, in New South Wales, that colony would be absolutely ruined, as it has no other combinable labour at all.

What is the remedy for these evils? To change the system — to create a sufficient check on the power of acquiring land — to secure the advantages of combined labour at once — to prevent the poor emigrant from becoming, upon his landing, a poor and useless landholder; and to prevent the capitalist from surrounding himself with a desart which he has no means or hope of cultivating. There must be a power somewhere to give land, and a power to withhold it. In whom should this power be vested? — in the Government or the individual? Both are bad. If we vest the power in the Government, a glance at all past colonial history shows what the result will be. If, on the other hand, it be vested in the individual, a few selfish persons, acting upon the true dog-in-the-manger principle, may take possession of a great tract of country, and shut out all other settlers from it. There must, therefore, be some established principle, some fixed rule, by which all parties are bound; and I believe that the more this subject is investigated, the more it will be seen that there is no fixed rule so fair, so equal, so just in its operation, as between man and man, as "price." Price is the only basis on which a sound principle of colonisation, in reference to the disposal of waste lands, can ever be founded. True, — price may, and will, vary according to the circumstances of each colony; as, for instance, the price of land in the West Indies, where half an acre of land suffices to support a family in abundance, must, under any system, be more than the price of land in Canada; but the principle is, that the price of land in every instance should be a "sufficient" price to secure to every capitalist a supply of hired labour, while it holds out to the labourer the prospect of such wages as will enable him to become, in turn, a capitalist, himself.

Upon this part of the subject I may be allowed to quote two passages from a very able circular addressed by the Government to the Governors of the West Indian Colonies, in January, 1836. The circular said, —

> In order to prevent this (the indisposition of the apprentices to work for hire), it will be necessary to prevent the occupation of any Crown lands by persons not possessing a proprietary title to them, and to fix such a price upon Crown land as may place them out of the reach of persons without capital. The natural tendency of the population to spread over the surface of the country, each man settling where he may, or moving from place to place in pursuit of virgin soil, is thus impeded. The territory, expanding only with the pressure of population, is commensurate with the actual wants of the entire community. Society being thus kept together is more open to civilising influences — more directly under the control of the Government — more full of the activity which is inspired by common wants, and the strength which is derived from the division of labour; and altogether is in a sounder state, morally, politically, and economically, than if left to pursue its natural course.

Sir, it is my conviction that these principles, fairly worked out, will produce, everywhere, the proper proportion between land and people, give the fullest scope to industry, and the greatest encouragement to exertion. They will secure a rapid advance, and render the colony to which they are applied equally attractive to the capitalist and to the labourer, by insuring to the one high wages, and to the other high profits, while they will give to every man fair play. The field of employment will be always ready to expand, but not too rapidly.

If we look only to the colony, then, leaving the mother country out of the question, it is desirable that a price should be affixed to land. But the interests of the mother country are not less concerned. A price cannot be put on land, without producing a revenue; and this revenue, if applied, in a sound way, to the purposes of emigration, affords the best emigration fund that the mother country or the colony could desire. By securing a certain supply of labour, it encourages the capitalist in the mother country to invest capital in land, while the more land is bought, the more labour can be supplied. Indeed, in the regulations of the South Australian Colony, which is founded on the principles that I am now advocating, I find the word "price" defined to be "a contribution to the emigration fund," and it is stated by the commissioners as the proud distinction of the colony, that "this is the sole condition on which land can be obtained there." As to the probable amount of this emigration fund, having no experience of our own to guide us, we must look again to the United States, and inquire what has been the system pursued there, and what the results. In the first place, I find that the right to all lands, with some exceptions in the old Atlantic states, is vested in the federal Government by Act of Congress. That Act of Congress has been at the bottom of all the good which the system has produced. There is one uniform price fixed of 1¼ dollar per acre, — a price which has been considered too low by the economists best informed on the subject. No credit is given. There is a perfect liberty of choice and appropriation at this price. Immense surveys are carried on, to an extent which strangers have no conception of. 140,000,000 of acres have been mapped and planned, at a cost of 2,164,000 dollars. There is a general land-office at Washington, with forty subordinate district offices, each having a registrar and a receiver, with salaries of 500 dollars, and one per cent. upon sales. Maps, plans, information of every kind, are accessible to the humblest persons. There is also the best check on the proceedings of these offices, by the means of annual reports to Congress; while, at the same time, every facility is given to individual enterprise. A man, if he pleases, may invest a million of dollars in land. If he miscalculate, it is his own fault; the public is, under any circumstances, the gainer. What has been the result of this system? Since 1795, when it was first established, the amount actually realised and paid into the public treasury has been 84,000,000 dollars. The national debt is paid off. There is a surplus revenue to divide; and these results are perfectly intelligible when we look to the produce of the land sales since 1795.

These are the pecuniary results of a system of disposing of waste lands by sale, fairly and honestly carried out. The moral results, if I may so term them, are equally great. The whole of the western wilderness of America has been converted into the most thriving combination of states that the world ever saw, full of the elements of prosperity, public and private, — fast increasing in population, wealth, happiness, and power. How melancholy a contrast does this present to the state of things which a contrary system has produced amongst ourselves! What was the English system up to 1831, when some beneficial changes were made in it? There was no Act of Parliament for regulating the sales of these lands — no responsible board or officer — no land offices — no information to be had — plenty of surveyors in the colonies, well paid; but no surveys, no maps or plans — no publicity — contradictory regulations constantly emanating from the Government, as to the disposal of land, all in force at the same time; the public lands, in short, were regarded as a sort of secret service fund, out of which lavish grants were made to any individual who happened to possess political or personal influence at home. The whole system was a system of favouritism and jobbing; and, as a necessary consequence, the public derived not one shilling of advantage from all these lands, while to individual colonists the system was equally fatal. I might mention many instances of this, but I will content myself with one — the case of the Swan River. Never was there a colony founded with more legitimate purposes or with higher hopes. A cousin of one of the Ministers of the day (Mr. Peel) was at the head of it; he took out a capital of 50,000*l*., which was invested in stock, seeds, agricultural labourers, and implements of various kinds. Many highly respectable individuals were joined with him in the undertaking; but all these advantages were neutralised and destroyed by the absurd principle on which the land was then disposed of. Mr. Peel began by taking to himself a grant of half a million of acres; the Governor took 100,000 acres; another person 80,000; and so an embryo right of proprietorship was spread over half the colony before a settlement of any kind was formed. In addition to these grants made in England, land was sold in the colony at 1*s*. 6*d*. an acre; and the consequence of these contradictory proceedings was, that the labourers who went out with Mr. Peel deserted him, and dispersed themselves over the wilderness; the stock was destroyed, the seeds rotted on the beach, and the colony itself was only saved from starvation by liberal supplies from the neighbouring colony of Van Diemen's Land. But in 1831 a new system was introduced; and certainly I cannot speak of that system in the presence of the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland without expressing my thanks for the service which that Noble Lord has rendered to the cause of common sense, and to the public interests, by the part he has taken in reforming the mode in which the Crown had previously disposed of the waste or public lands. The Noble Lord has given up a great deal of what was most exceptionable in the former system. He introduced a system of sales in the colonies. He laid down a general rule that there were to be no further grants of land in any place, to any person, of any class, whatever his influence might be, — a fair and equal principle, as far as it went. My only complaint against the Noble Lord is, that his principle does not go far enough, and that, even as far as it does go, it has not been honestly worked out. As to its not going far enough, the first objection to which it is open is, that there is no guarantee for permanency, no stability, no Act of Parliament, no responsibility — that it is considered as mere waste paper in America — and that it is subject to be changed with every change in the Colonial Office, since it is upon the will of the Ministers of the day that it is made to depend; and when the House reflects how many changes have occurred in that department in the course of only the last ten years, it will, I think, admit that anything which is to be called a national system should not rest on so precarious a foundation. Since 1830 — that is to say, in nine years — there have been no fewer than seven Colonial Ministers: Sir George Murray, Viscount Goderich, the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire, the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Glenelg, and now the Marquess of Normanby; and he must be a bold man who would predict who will be Colonial Minister in June, 1840. Now, no two of these Ministers have agreed precisely upon the application of the principle which Lord Ripon introduced. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, when Minister for the Colonies, undid a great part of what Lord Ripon had done; but, in return, he gave a charter, on very sound principles, to South Australia, which his predecessor (Lord Stanley) had refused. The first step in the Right Honourable Gentleman's colonial career, however, was to devote a large portion of the funds arising from the land sales in New South Wales to colonial purposes, — to colonial police, for instance, — and not to emigration. Upon this subject, Dr. Lang, in his excellent work, makes these observations: —

> It was thus virtually enacted by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, that a large portion of that revenue, which had been so unexpectedly and beneficently created, as if by the immediate interposition of the providence of God, for the counteraction of the enormous moral evils that had resulted from the past mismanagement of the transportation system in Australia, and for insuring the moral welfare of these colonies in all time to come, through the importation of virtuous and industrious free emigrant families from the mother country, and to the exclusive application of which to that object the inhabitants of New South Wales were looking with intense anxiety, should be applied towards the perpetual maintenance of the colony as a mere gaol and dunghill for the British empire.

Sir, if this fact be true, — and I am certain that it cannot be denied, — I must tell the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire, that I consider it a misapplication — a bastard application, of the principle which was sanctioned by him in 1831; and I feel myself entitled to call upon him to assist me in insuring to it the fair trial which it deserves. The Noble Lord understands the principle too well not to see the absolute necessity of giving a parliamentary sanction to it, before it can be worked out to any practical extent. He knows that the land sales must be anticipated before we can judge of their probable amount; he knows that competition for land, if it is to produce any extensive or beneficial results, must not be confined to the colony — that we must bring Englishmen, and English capital, into the field, as well as colonial capital. Besides, we are bound to consider the peculiar position in which our colonies are placed. We have no backwoods, no continuous communication with the colonies; we are separated from them by a great gulf, which the poor cannot pass over unless they are assisted. We must bridge it over for them — we must give them a conveyance, if we wish to take them there; and this, on a sufficiently large scale to effect what is wanted, both in the colony and here. The actual produce of the land sales will not suffice to do this; but they will serve as an ample security for any money which may be required for the purposes of emigration, so as to bring the system into practical operation at once, if we have an Act of Parliament as a guarantee. What, for instance, might not the United States raise upon a branch of their revenue, which has produced four millions sterling in one year? If we wish to equal America — if we wish to give the same impetus to our population, we must adopt her system — we must pass an Act of Parliament as she passed an Act of Congress — we must create a responsible Land Board — we must give to all classes the same advantages and facilities; and then, but not till then, we may arrive at the same results. With an Act of Parliament, there will be no lack of capitalists to put the machinery in motion. The security is known, and liked, in the British money market, already; and well it may be, since the whole loan is spent in adding to the value of the security. The land sales in New South Wales, though the land is sold at a most inadequate and insufficient price (5*s.* an acre), while land in South Australia is selling at 20*s.*, without the aid of English competition, or an adequate supply of labour in return, have realised a very large sum.

Now, 240,000*l.* would be a security for a million of money, if required as an emigration fund; but not without the aid of Parliament. What, then, is the objection to the interference of Parliament? It may be said that it is an invasion of the prerogative of the Crown; but the prerogative of the Crown, in this matter, simply means that the Crown is intrusted with the administration of the waste lands for the public good. It is a great and responsible trust — it is a moral trust; and I ask the Government, and more particularly my Right Honourable Friend the Under Secretary for the Colonies, whether, standing in the position in which he stands in this House, he can, without a blush, make himself responsible for the manner in which the prerogative of the Crown has hitherto been used? I ask him to look at the contrast between two cases — between the case of Canada, where the prerogative has exercised its virtues to the fullest conceivable extent, without check or limitation of any kind; and the case of South Australia, where the prerogative was very wisely waived. With the leave of the House — if I am not already tiring them — I will refer to those two cases more particularly. I wish that all the facts should be before the House, in order that it may the better judge of the results, which the exercise of the prerogative will inevitably produce. The House will find, in the contrast between Canada and South Australia, some encouragement to give extension to the principles of colonisation for which I am contending. Canada was specially excluded by my Right Honourable Friend the Judge Advocate (Sir George Grey) from the inquiries before my Colonial Land Committee in 1836.

The abuses in Canada had arisen long before my Right Honourable Friend had become connected with the colonial administration; and I am convinced that my Right Honourable Friend's only motive was, for the sake of the country, to prevent disclosures which he knew must be made. Unfortunately, however, for my Right Honourable Friend's views, Lord Durham's Report has since been published. Lord Durham has investigated the whole case, and has declared the result of his inquiries. There is, therefore, now no hope of preventing a disclosure of the real facts, however discreditable they may be to this country in the eyes of the civilised world. And what is the inference that must be drawn from the statements of Lord Durham? Why, that the land question is mixed up — closely and inextricably mixed up — with the whole history of our difficulties in Canada. The strongest dissatisfaction exists there with the manner in which the prerogative has been exercised, with regard to the disposal of land. The system adopted has been one pernicious to the colony, and useless to us. In the evidence taken before the commission, of which my Honourable Friend the Member for Liskeard was at the head, there is nothing to be found but a tissue of peculation, jobbing, mismanagement, and favouritism, countenanced by all the responsible officers of the Crown, by legislative councillors, by the Government themselves,—every man, in fact, who had any influence, trying to make something out of land, to the ruin and destruction of everybody else. And what were the results? In Upper Canada, out of 17,653,000 acres which had been surveyed, there remain only 1,597,019 acres unappropriated, 450,000 of which are required for roads. In Lower Canada, out of 6,169,963 acres surveyed, no less than 4,500,000 have been alienated. In Nova Scotia, of 6,000,000 acres surveyed, 5,750,000 are alienated. In Prince Edward's Island, it appears from the evidence, that 1,400,000 acres were alienated in one day, in blocks of from 20 to 150,000 acres. The greater part of this land has been granted to persons who have never taken possession of it at all, though, upon the true dog-in-the-manger principle, they excluded every one else. Three millions of acres are left to this day as clergy reserves, and Crown reserves, scattered over the whole surface of the colony, and operating as a bar to all improvement. Not one tenth of the land thus wantonly squandered has ever been occupied; and not one tenth of the part occupied has been brought into cultivation. I find, moreover, that the whole system of surveying in Canada has been conducted with the same reckless expenditure of means, and with the same unsatisfactory results. I find one gentleman receiving a salary of 500*l.* a-year for ten years, for superintending the sale of 100,000 acres of wild land. All titles are doubtful, in consequence of the inaccuracy of the surveys. Every duty of a Government has been badly performed, while the country has been put to an enormous expense. With respect to emigration, of which the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland spoke in terms of very strong approbation, so far, at least, as the emigration agents were concerned, on the occasion of the discussion upon New Zealand last year, — with respect to emigration, I find Lord Durham distinctly stating, in his Report, that nothing can be more inefficient, or worse, than the system of emigration to Canada, as now conducted. There is great mortality in the emigrant ships; great distress on landing; no sort of interference by the Government on behalf of the emigrants; no attempt to make provision, or give assistance, during the time that assistance is most required. The people in the interior of the province are dispersed, and isolated, from the want of roads. Most of the settlers are exceedingly poor. The markets are few, and almost inaccessible. There are no schools; and the clergy reserves fail to afford the consolations of religion to one half of the population. The colony is in a state of complete stagnation and decay. The farmers are ruined by the loss of their capital, through the want of the communications which they ought to have; and, of the emigrants from this country, not less than three fifths have been forced to re-emigrate to the United States, who gain by our mismanagement in population, and national wealth.

Such is the state to which the prerogative has reduced one of our finest colonies — a possession which, under happier auspices, might have been one of the most brilliant appendages of the British Crown. We have no means of getting over the difficulties which have been created by our own folly, but by retracing our steps. We must act upon the system which Lord Durham has, with so much firmness and acuteness, recommended. We must impose a tax on wild land, sufficient to bring a portion of it every year into the market, by making it too dear to keep; and we must, then, apply a sound principle of colonisation, and emigration to the Canadas, as the only way of making amends for the immense evils inflicted by the bad system which has been pursued up to the present time. I ask my Honourable Friend the Under Secretary for the Colonies, whether he can gainsay one word of the statement which I have made as to the system adopted in Canada, by each successive Government, for the last sixty years? My Honourable Friend cannot do it. When he stands up, he must admit, not only that the whole of those evils exist, but that they have been produced by the manner in which the prerogative has been hitherto applied to the disposal of land in that colony. But have we no example of an opposite system to look to? Yes; we have the example of South Australia, where the prerogative of the Crown has never been allowed to interfere. And I must now beg the attention of the House to the facts which I am about to state, respecting this colony, as they are extremely curious. South Australia was founded on the 15th of August, 1834, by an Act of Parliament. The Commissioners of Crown Lands were appointed in May, 1835, and the first vessel was chartered on the 24th of March, 1836, — three years ago, — at which time South Australia was a desert, on which a human foot had hardly ever trod. What is its condition now? The sales of land in South Australia, up to the present time (24th of June, 1839), were —

These were principally sales effected in England; but the total includes the sales effected in the colony, up to the 22d of January, 1839, which amounted to 22,000*l.*

As to emigration from this country, it appears that 7482 persons have gone out, in seventy-one vessels of 39,107 tons, at a cost of about 18*l.* for each adult. Adding to these 900 Germans, and about 600 emigrants from the neighbouring colonies, the total would be 8982. The population of South Australia, therefore, is, probably, by this time between 9000 and 10,000 souls. In the port of Adelaide, the number of vessels which entered the harbour bearing the British flag, in 1838, was 101. The rise in the value of land in Adelaide is something perfectly incredible; but it only corresponds with the increase which the colony has made in every other respect. Captain Hindmarsh, the first Governor, purchased two rural sections of 134 acres for 80*l.* each. They were sold, when he was leaving the colony, for 1000 guineas each. The town of Adelaide now contains 700 houses of stone, brick, wood, and pisé, and about 300 mud and rush huts, according to the latest returns. Single acres, in Adelaide, have been sold for 1000*l.* each. The twentieth part of one of these acres, which cost originally 12*s.*, was recently sold for 70*l.* Mr. John Rigge, a proprietor of the town, lets a town acre at a rent of 50*l.* per annum. Others have realised higher profits on their purchases. The half of one of Captain Hindmarsh's town acres has been let at 50*l.* per annum, and an Honourable Friend of my own, who was amongst the earliest of the fortunate adventurers in South Australian lands, has informed me that he has just let a town acre, for which he gave 12*s.*, in 1835, to a highly respectable and responsible tenant, at an annual rent of 100*l.* The ordinary profits of sheep farming in the colony are estimated at 80 per cent. There are two banks in Adelaide, and a third is in progress. We have, now, South Australian packet ships, — a South Australian Railway Company with a capital of 25,000*l.* for constructing a railway from Adelaide to the port, about six miles; and, in addition to the two South Australian newspapers established in the colony, we have the South Australian Record, in England, which has a circulation of 2000 numbers every month, among those who take an interest in the new sources of prosperity which colonisation is opening to this country.

Now, I entreat the House to contrast these facts with the statements made by Lord Durham, with regard to Canada, a few months ago. The new principle of colonisation in South Australia has been fairly tested, and the increase of the land sales in 1838, as compared with 1837, is the best proof of its soundness. The money realised by sales of land in the last five months of these two years was as follows: —

	1837.	1838.
August .	£480	£4,640
September .	160	2,960
October .	480	2,640
November .	560	1,760
December .	480	11,400

Now, it is my desire to see the principles acted upon with regard to South Australia universally applied. I want to see them applied to all colonies in which they can be fairly brought into operation; but they can only be applied to other colonies in the same way, — namely, by an Act of Parliament. It is not a thing that prerogative, without the interference of the Legislature, can do. I insist on this point the more, because it is one on which her Majesty's Ministers seem to entertain a doubt. Without an Act of Parliament the system is worthless as regards the public at large: it never can produce anything but half measures on the part of Government, and the most unsatisfactory and insufficient results. I may be told that the question of jurisdiction is full of difficulty. No doubt it is. Difficulties may be raised which it will require some management to meet. But the right of the mother country is unquestionable, for the sovereignty of a colony is never abandoned by the parent state. It is not enough that men have been located upon one portion of a colony in order to have a claim over the remainder. The colonists have their rights within the limits of the settled lands, but the home Government retains its original rights; and in giving a local Government to those who occupy part of the lands of a colony, it by no means follows that the inherent rights of the Crown to deal with the waste land which remains is given to them, also. The right of disposing of it is not delegated to any number of settlers, or to any colonial Legislature that may be formed. But, suppose there be a disputed jurisdiction: we know from Lord Durham's Report that the colonial Legislatures would gladly concur in the introduction of a sound system of colonisation, in which they would have as great an advantage as the mother country. In fact, they claim the sovereignty over waste lands only in the hope of preserving them from abuse, and as a security against jobbing. The present system is just as destructive to them as to us. The question of jurisdiction may, therefore, be very easily settled by the concurrent action of the Imperial Parliament and the colonial Legislature, if the Government be willing to act upon any defined and intelligible plan. We must always retain a great control over the colonies, because they want the stream of emigration which it is in our power to direct upon them. Over emigration, at all events, the mother country has perfect control. If Canada interpose difficulties in the way of a sound system of colonisation, this country may direct its emigration to Australia. England is, in fact, bound to direct her emigrants to those places in which, as colonists, they will be enabled to apply their energies in the most effective manner, and to derive from their labour the most ample reward. It is perfectly clear that we have duties as a nation to discharge towards emigrants, whom we induce, on the faith of our representations, to forsake their native land. There is one passage in Lord Durham's Report in which he lays down the full extent of the national obligations towards colonists in the strongest terms. After speaking of the disasters to which emigrants to Canada have been exposed, Lord Durham says, —

> In the Report on emigration, to which I have alluded before, I find favourable mention of the principle of intrusting some parts of the conduct of emigration rather to "charitable committees" than to an ordinary department of Government. From this doctrine I feel bound to express my entire dissent. I can scarcely imagine any obligation which is more incumbent on Government to fulfil, than that of guarding against an improper selection of emigrants, and securing to poor persons disposed to emigrate every possible facility and assistance, from the moment of their intending to leave this country to that of their comfortable establishment in the colony. No less an obligation is incurred by the Government, when, as is now the case, they invite poor persons to emigrate by tens of thousands every year. It would, indeed, be very mischievous if the Government were to deprive emigrants of self-reliance, by doing everything for them; but when the State leads great numbers of people into a situation in which it is impossible that they should do well without assistance, then the obligation to assist them begins; and it never ends, in my humble opinion, until those who have relied on the truth and paternal care of the Government are placed in a situation to take care of themselves.

In this doctrine I entirely concur; and I hope that, whenever the question is dealt with by the Government, as it will be, and must be, eventually, this portion of the subject, which is most important, since it relates to the wellbeing of thousands of humble individuals who have not the information necessary to enable them to protect themselves, will receive the most anxious and ample consideration.

The Government, however, both in this, and in its mode of dealing with the waste lands, has only, in my opinion, to act on a sound and intelligible principle, to insure the hearty concurrence of the colonial Legislatures.

I have stated, in my resolutions, that a separate department would be required to take charge of the details of the plan. My Honourable Friend the Under Secretary for the Colonies will admit that, with the manifold duties which the Colonial Office has already to discharge, it would be utterly impossible to add to them a task of such magnitude. It is a task which will require the time and ability of many able men. The interest and feeling about emigration are now universal. That feeling the Government may guide, but cannot dam up or control. We find, now, in this country,—what has not been seen, before, for the last two centuries,—men of high connections and family interesting themselves in colonisation adventures; disposed to give up the refinements of highly civilised life, with the dependence which is the lot of younger brothers in this country, whose energies can find no outlet in our over-crowded professions, and prepared to carve out their fortunes in the wilderness. Why should they not have full scope for these feelings, highly honourable and manly as they are, and not only honourable to themselves, but beneficial to us?

My Honourable Friend the Under Secretary for the Colonies, and the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland, know that the Government cannot check the tide of emigration. Last year Ministers were entreated to take into their own hands the guidance of the movement by which New Zealand is about to be colonised; and, had they consented, they might have prescribed the conditions, and laid down the rules, by which all parties would have agreed to abide. They refused, however; and what is the consequence? New Zealand is colonising itself. Enterprise and energy in this country cannot be repressed by the refusal of the Government to aid them in their attempts. Some of the first men in the kingdom are taking part in the colonisation of New Zealand, in a spirit similar to that which distinguishes the history of maritime adventure in the reign of Elizabeth. Lord Durham is at the head of the New Zealand Land Company; Lord Petre is one of the directors; so are the Honourable Member for Thetford (Mr. F. Baring), the Honourable Member for Hull (Mr. Hutt), the Honourable Member for Caithness (Sir G. Sinclair), the Honourable Member for Chichester (Mr. J. Abel Smith), and the Honourable Member for Sunderland (Alderman Thompson). The brother of the Honourable Member for Leeds (Sir W. Molesworth) has embarked his fortune in this colony, together with the sons of Lord Petre, and of the Member for Caithness. The feeling which influences these gentlemen cannot be repressed, but it may be regulated, and guided by the co-operation of the Legislature. This New Zealand Association has sold, up to this day, 666 sections, containing 67,266 acres of land, and the sale has produced within a fraction of 70,000*l*.

There is another part of our colonial dependencies — Natal, and the South-eastern coast of Africa, with respect to which there is an absolute necessity that the Government should adopt some measures. We have had petitions presented from Glasgow, from Liverpool, from the merchants connected with the African trade in London, calling on us to deal with this question of Natal. There are still more cogent reasons for doing so. There has been a re-emigration from the Cape of 5000 armed Boors, of the old Dutch race, who have declared themselves independent of Great Britain, and have seized a large tract of unoccupied territory, which forms the district or country of Natal. This re-emigration is owing as much to economical as to political causes. Population at the Cape is becoming cramped for room, while in the Natal country there are 15,000,000 of acres of fertile and well-watered land, unoccupied by any native tribes. Under these circumstances emigration in Southern Africa will go on; and the only question is, whether it shall go on uncontrolled, and under irresponsible guidance, or whether it shall be properly directed? This calls for the instant attention of the Government, which cannot leave matters as they are. The evils of the false and bastard system on which we are now proceeding, are most acutely felt. The Honourable Member for Kent, whom I now see in his place, has taken great interest in the question of the Aborigines. Now, both in Southern Africa, New Zealand, and the other islands of the South Seas, the Aborigines have been the great sufferers by the existing system of emigration, which has inflicted upon the native inhabitants the worst evils of the worst periods of colonisation, without imparting to them any of the good. The scum and refuse of the population of this country are directed there, instead of the best and most orderly. Mr. Williams, the missionary, gives an account of one fiend, in human shape, who has taken up his abode in one of the South Sea islands. Having brought with him the arts and weapons of civilisation, it is stated that he has destroyed, without risk to himself, 700 human beings, during the space of four or five years. The settlers in New Zealand have introduced muskets, gunpowder, rum, spirits, lawless habits, and whatever it is most desirable to exclude. The worst evils of civilised society are thus engrafted upon the passions of the barbarians, and the seed thus sown is producing a plentiful crop of immorality and bloodshed. Against this I ask the friends of the Aborigines to set the establishment of regular intercourse under fixed and well-ascertained laws, and the gradual introduction of civilised habits, arts, industry, and trade, which must be the best preparation for Christianity itself. I cannot understand that false and mawkish sensibility as to the Aborigines, which opposes a bar to colonisation, when, with proper precaution, it ought to be as beneficial to them as to ourselves. I shall be told, perhaps, that the two races will not amalgamate; but this is not true. It may be true of the warrior tribes of North America; but there are, at this day, 8,000,000 of Indians employed in agriculture in Mexico, Columbia, and Peru. The great desideratum is, to regulate upon principles of strict justice the intercourse between civilised and uncivilised man; and to this a proper disposal of colonial lands is the road. The rights of the Aborigines ought to be respected. They should be most carefully and tenderly treated, and justice should be to done them in every way; and, therefore, I repeat, they ought no longer to be left a prey to the present system of colonisation, which inflicts upon them all the evils of civilisation, without communicating any of the good. Why not apply this principle, at once, to Natal, a country of which districts have been repeatedly ceded to British subjects by Chaka and Dingaan, the Zulu chiefs, rich in pastures, admirably adapted to sheep farming, the natural emporium of the Bechuana and interior trade, and placed, by steam communication, within four days of the Cape,—in lieu of leaving it in its present most anomalous state, an English garrison being stationed, at the present moment, at Natal, for the express purpose of excluding British ships, which are not allowed, without a special licence, to enter the port?

Sir, in preaching this doctrine of colonisation, I do not look to any barren extension of territory; I look to a great impulse being given to our manufactures and trade—a relief from pressure here—a rapid increase in our colonies, in consequence of that very relief. Colonial markets are the best and least fluctuating of markets for the manufactures of this country. They afford a market which will survive the convulsions of war, or revolution itself. Plant a colony of men imbued with English wants, tastes, habits, and feelings, upon a virgin soil, where each man can raise ten times the amount of exchangable produce that he could have raised at home, and you create at once the most certain demand for every article that the manufacturing industry of England can supply. A very short reference to the state of our trade with different foreign countries as compared with our colonial trade will prove this; the one being stationary, the other always an increasing trade, when the colonies have fair play, and this, whether we retain our political connection with them or not. It grows with their growth, and strengthens with their strength, even where the connection with the mother country is dissolved. Thus, I find, from some old returns at the Board of Trade, that the exports from England to the United States, before the war of Independence, amounted, in 1762, to 1,667,285*l.*, and in 1773, to 2,462,148*l.* The ruin of England was predicted when these colonies were lost; but how far, in reality, has trade suffered by their independence? In 1827 the exports from England amounted to 7,018,272*l.*; in 1891, to 9,053,583*l.*; and in 1836, to 12,425,605*l.*, or to more than one half of the value of our shipments to the whole of Europe, with a population fifteen times as great as that of the United States. Look, on the other hand, at our trade with European countries, fluctuating as it does in consequence of political changes, and of alterations in their tariffs. To Russia, with its enormous population, our exports in 1827 were only 1,408,970*l.*; in 1834, 1,382,300*l.*; and in 1836, 1,743,433*l.* The exports to other countries were—

Germany .	4,654,618*l.*	4,463,729*l.*

Compare with this the trade with our own colonies. The exports to the British North American colonies were, in 1827, 1,397,350*l.*; and in 1836, in spite of the Canadian disturbances, 2,732,291. The exports to the West Indies were, in 1827, 3,583,222*l.*; and in 1836, 3,736,453, notwithstanding that those colonies have undergone the greatest social change that was ever accomplished without bloodshed. The increase of trade with other colonies shows something of the rapidity which marks the case of South Australia, to which I have already referred. The exports were —

To New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land	£449,892	£1,180,564
Cape of Good Hope	216,558	482,315
Algoa Bay alone	55,201 in 1834	236,000

Considerably exceeding the total amount of our exports to Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, in 1827, which was 190,776*l.*, and nearly equalling it in 1836, when it reached 284,079*l.* The exports of Van Diemen's Land have risen in twelve years from 14,000*l.* to 420,000*l.*; the amount of wool exported being, in 1827, 192,075 lbs.; and in 1835, 1,948,800 lbs. The exports of New South Wales were, in 1828, 84,008*l.*; and in 1836, 513,976: the quantity of wool, in 1828, being 138,498 lbs.; and in 1836, 5,240,090 lbs.

Sir, these facts are my case. I have now done with details. There are some people, indeed, who say, "We don't want to extend our colonies — we have colonies enough." I ask, in return, have we markets enough? Have we employment enough? Are wages high enough, and profits high enough? Is there no political discontent — no physical suffering? Yet the National Petition, with its 1,200,000 signatures, stands for discussion to-night; a petition which, as I began by proving, is at once the child, and the emblem, of national distress. That distress may be overcome, but not by refusing to look the danger in the face. Our trade is diminishing — our exports are changing their character — foreign competion is growing up. Is it not desirable, and wise, to open a safety-valve — in time? I believe that the most effectual remedy for the evils of our present condition will be found in the resolutions which I have laid upon the table of the House. I believe that they will tend to promote the welfare of many millions of human beings, and to enlarge the sovereignty of the British Crown. The Government is not called upon to incur any risk in order to make the attempt, but simply to lay down sound principles, which individual energy and enterprise will work out. If I am asked what is to be the result of such an experiment? I say, the creation of new communities, in which the laws, the language, and the virtues of England will be preserved, long after the ties which connect them with the mother country shall be dissolved. As to our future hold upon these communities, we may let futurity take care of itself. It is enough for us to know that, in the plan proposed, there is neither cost, nor outlay, nor risk; while, if it succeeds, — and it will succeed if we have the wisdom to let our colonies govern themselves, — we may have more people in the colonies, and more people at home, and all better off. I hope there will be no lurking indisposition on the part of the Government to entertain the question fairly, in all its comprehensive bearings; and I trust that my Right Honourable Friend, the Under Secretary for the Colonies, will not, by committing himself against it, shut himself out from the greatest career of practical utility which has ever been opened to an English statesman at a most critical period.

× With these feelings, Sir, I beg leave to move the following resolutions: —

1. That the occupation and cultivation of waste lands in the British colonies, by means of emigration, tend to improve the condition of all the industrious classes in the United Kingdom, by diminishing competition for employment at home, in consequence of the removal of superabundant numbers, creating new markets, and increasing the demand for shipping and manufactures.

2. That the prosperity of colonies, and the progress of colonisation, mainly depend upon the manner in which a right of private property in the waste lands of a colony may be acquired; and that, amidst the great variety of methods of disposing of waste lands which have been pursued by the British Government, the most effectual, beyond all comparison, is the plan of sale, at a fixed, uniform, and "sufficient" price, for ready money, without any other condition, or restriction; and the employment of the whole, or a large fixed proportion, of the purchase-money, in affording a passage to the colony, cost free, to young persons of the labouring class, in an equal proportion of the sexes.

3. That in order to derive the greatest possible advantage from this method of colonising, it is essential that the permanence of the system should be secured by the Legislature, and that its administration should be intrusted to a distinct branch of the Colonial Department, authorised to sell colonial lands in this country; to anticipate the sales of land by raising loans for emigration, on the security of future land sales, and generally to superintend the arrangements by which the comfort and wellbeing of the emigrants are to be secured.

4. That this method of colonising has been applied by the Legislature to the new colony of South Australia, with very remarkable and gratifying results, and that it is expedient that Parliament should extend the South Australian system to all other colonies which are suited to its operation.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH.—In seconding the motion of my Honourable Friend, I need not, after his most able speech, enter into any lengthened discussion of the principles upon which his motion is founded. My Honourable Friend proposes, first, that in every one of the colonies a certain price shall be affixed to its waste lands, that price to vary according to the circumstances of each colony; and, secondly, that the nett proceeds of the land sales shall constitute an emigration fund, each colony to be furnished with emigrant labour in proportion to its own land sales.

The object of these resolutions is, first, by a fixed price, to put an end to the favouritism and other abuses, which have always resulted, and must, in my opinion, necessarily result, from any system of free or conditional grants of land. Secondly, the fixed price ought to be a considerable one, in order to prevent individuals from acquiring large tracts of land, without any intention to cultivate them, and merely in the hope that, at some future period, they may become valuable by the increase of wealth and population. And here I may remark, that all experience and reason have shown, that such excessive appropriations are most injurious to a new community, by interposing deserts, and cutting off communication between its cultivated parts. And, lastly, the object of employing, in the promotion of emigration, the funds raised from the sales of land, is, to afford a profitable field of employment for the surplus population of this country, and to provide the purchasers of colonial land with a steady supply of labour, wherewith to render their land productive, and worth the price put upon it; for land, without labour to cultivate it, is worthless. It is evident, indeed, that a few half sterile acres in this densely peopled country are, on account of the facility of obtaining hired labour, far more valuable than millions of the most fertile acres in a place where no labourers can be obtained to reap the fruits of the soil. Now, if the regulations of my Honourable Friend be adopted, the purchasers of colonial land would not merely purchase a certain number of acres, but would indirectly buy the services of a number of labourers proportioned to the amount of lands bought.

As the chief object of putting a considerable price on waste land is to obtain a supply of labour, it is evident that the price of waste land ought to be so high, as to insure a sufficient supply of labour to cultivate the appropriated land in the most advantageous manner, that is, to raise from it the greatest amount of produce compared to the number of hands employed; for in that case, wages and profits would be high, and the community flourishing. For this purpose, the price of land in each colony should be such as, first, to produce a fund sufficient to convey to the colony the numbers of labourers required; and, secondly, to prevent the labourers, so conveyed, from passing from the state of labourers to that of landowners, before their place can be supplied by fresh emigrants.

These are the objects of the motion of my Honourable Friend. They are founded upon the self-evident fact, that land, without labour to cultivate it, is worthless. My Honourable Friend, therefore, proposes to render the waste lands of the colonies valuable, by making them the means of conveying labour to the colonies. My Honourable Friend's motion is likewise founded upon the now acknowledged fact, that individuals (particularly from this country) will not labour for hire, when they can easily become independent landowners, even though their pecuniary gains as petty landowners be much less than the wages they could earn as labourers. Therefore, if the price of waste land in a colony be very low, emigrant labourers too rapidly pass from the condition of labourers to that of landowners, and steady labour for hire is unattainable; consequently, in a colony so circumstanced, there would be very little or no combination of labour, no division of employment, no extensive branches of industry, and no profitable investment for capital; and this combination of circumstances would ultimately occasion a cessation of any demand for labour; consequently wages and profits would be low, and the community poor and half civilised. The history of colonisation offers but too many instances of such a result having been brought about by an excessive facility of acquiring land. On this account, my Honourable Friend proposes to render the acquisition of waste lands difficult, by putting a considerable price upon them.

In support of this plan, I must observe, that experience has shown that (except when accidental circumstances have obstructed, in some considerable degree, the appropriation of waste land) the only colonies in which there have been, from their commencement, combinable labour and extensive production, and which have rapidly increased in wealth, have been colonies in which slavery, in some shape or other, has been established; such, for instance, as that of the negroes in the Southern states of America, and in our own West Indian colonies; of indentured labourers in the early times of Pennsylvania, and of convicts in the penal colonies of Australia. As far as production is concerned, the effects of the plan of my Honourable Friend would be the same as those of slavery; namely, it would insure the existence of combinable labour, of extended and profitable production, and of wealth. The moral means by which this result would be brought about would be far different from those of slavery. Under slavery, the labourer is directly compelled to toil by the lash, without any prospect of bettering his condition. Under the plan of my Honourable Friend, the labourer would be indirectly compelled, by the price of land, to sell his labour, during a certain time, for high wages, with a hope, however, of ultimately not only acquiring landed property, but likewise of becoming an employer of labour himself; and this hope he could not entertain, were the price of land so low that, in a short period of time, the mere emigrant labourer could acquire a sufficient amount of land to maintain himself upon.

I will not, after the able exposition of my Honourable Friend, enter into any further discussion of the principles upon which his motion is founded. Though but recently discovered, the justice of those principles have been acknowledged by most persons well versed in the science of political economy. They were first put forth about the year 1829, by my friend, Mr. Wakefield; to whom, as my Honourable Friend the Member for Sheffield most justly observed, the great merit of their discovery is exclusively due. In 1833, they were fully developed in an admirable work of Mr. Wakefield's, called England and America. The preceding year they had been partially adopted by the Colonial Office, in certain regulations, known by the name of "Lord Howick's Regulations;" to the utility of which, as far as they went, ample testimony has been borne. In 1833, they were embodied in the Act for creating the colony of South Australia; and they constitute the basis of the wonderful advance of that rapidly flourishing community. In 1836, they were distinctly recognised by Lord Glenelg in a circular addressed to the West Indian colonies; but, unfortunately for the industry of those colonies, they have, since that period, been entirely overlooked. In the same year they were carefully investigated and approved of by a committee of the House of Commons, of which my Honourable Friend the Member for Sheffield was the chairman. Last year they were fully confirmed by the numerous and intelligent witnesses examined before the Transportation Committee. They form no inconsiderable, and by no means the least valuable, portion of Lord Durham's Report on Canada. My Honourable Friend the Member for Liskeard (Mr. C. Buller) has adopted them in his able Report on the waste lands of the North American colonies. And, lastly, within a few weeks, a company, with a capital of 250,000*l*., has been established on these very principles, to colonise New Zealand. The facts which I have just stated show how carefully the principles contained in the resolutions of my Honourable Friend have been examined, and how highly they have been approved of by shrewd and intelligent men.

I will now, with the permission of the House, attempt to comply with the wish of my Honourable Friend. My Honourable Friend has requested me, as having paid much attention to the affairs of the penal colonies of Australia, and having been chairman of the Transportation Committee, to show to how great and important an extent the principles upon which his measure is founded are immediately applicable to New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land. For that purpose I must first make a few remarks with regard to the history of the industry and productions of those colonies. The House is aware that the colony of New South Wales was founded in 1788, as a place of punishment for criminals. For many years after its commencement it was inhabited almost entirely by convicts, their superintendents, and the soldiers appointed to guard the prisoners. The first persons who acquired landed property in that colony were some officers in the regiments quartered there; some convicts, the period of whose sentences had expired; and a very few emigrants. To these persons the Government made grants of land, frequently on the condition that they should maintain a certain number of convicts. These convicts became the servants, or rather the slaves, of the settlers; for they were subjected to flagellation and other punishments for neglect of work. They were employed by their masters in cultivating the land, from which they raised a surplus produce. For that surplus produce the Government and convict establishments afforded a most excellent market. By these means, and by others of not so creditable a description, the first settlers rapidly made money; they obtained more land and more convict servants, and accumulated capital; emigrants arrived out from this country, and the colony appears to be most flourishing. The history of the industry of Van Diemen's Land is nearly the same as that of New South Wales. It was first settled in 1803, as a dependency of New South Wales; and, in 1825, was made independent of that colony. It is indebted for its wealth to the slave labour of transported convicts, and to the large sums expended on it by this country.

In proof of the rapid progress of these colonies in production and in commerce, I will read to the House a few facts which I have collected from Parliamentary Returns. The House is aware that wool is the staple produce of Australia. The sheep are chiefly of the Merino breed, with a slight cross of those from Bengal and the Cape of Good Hope. Their fleeces are of the finest quality, averaging about 2½ lbs., and worth from 1*s.* to 3*s.* per pound. In 1796 the number of sheep in New South Wales was only 1531; during the next year, Captain M'Arthur (a name which will ever be celebrated in the industrial history of that colony) obtained three rams and four ewes of the Merino breed. He applied himself to the rearing of fine-wooled sheep; he obtained, at different times, considerable grants of land from the Government (in all 18,000 acres), and a number of convicts as shepherds. His flocks were the best in the colony; and to his exertions, in no small degree, is to be attributed the extraordinary success of this branch of industry in Australia. About the beginning of this century the number of sheep in New South Wales amounted only to 6757; in 1821 they were estimated at 120,000; in 1830 they had reached 500,000; in 1834 they were not less than 1,000,000; and now they probably exceed 3,000,000. The first Return that I am able to find of the quantity of wool exported from New South Wales, is for the year 1807; it amounted only to 245 lbs.; in 1815 it had increased to 32,000 lbs.; in 1820, to 100,000 lbs.; in 1828, to 834,000 lbs.; and, in the same year, from the two colonies of New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land, 1,574,000 pounds were exported. Since 1828, the quantity of wool received from those colonies has increased fivefold: last year it amounted nearly to 8,000,000 lbs., the value of which could not have been less than 600,000*l.*, probably somewhat more. Thus the Australian colonies, which, at the commencement of the century, did not import a single pound weight of wool, now supply us with about one seventh of the whole quantity of wool imported; and I feel persuaded that, in less than another half century, if those colonies be properly managed, our commerce with them, in wool alone, will exceed our whole trade in that commodity at the present moment. There is known to be, in Australia, an all but indefinite amount of the finest pasturage lands; on these lands flocks of sheep, with proper care, will double themselves in every two or three years: all that is wanted is, a sufficient amount of labour; and how, by adopting the principles of my Honourable Friend, that amount of labour can be obtained, I will presently show.

First, however, I will state some other facts with reference to the progress of the industry of the penal colonies. The value of the fisheries of Australia has increased with great rapidity. They consist chiefly in the pursuit of the black and sperm whales. In 1828 they produced about 38,000*l.*; seven years afterwards, in 1835, they had increased nearly sixfold, to 214,000*l.* The value of the exports from New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land in 1828 did not exceed 181,000*l.*; in 1836 they amounted to 1,168,000*l.*, or about 15*l.* per head for every free person. The value of the imports into those colonies in 1828 was 811,000*l.*; in 1836, it had more than doubled, being about 1,795,000*l.*, or 23*l.* per head for every free person. The shipping of these colonies has likewise doubled during the last 8 years. The number of vessels entered inwards in 1828 was 268, with a tonnage of 56,000 tons; in 1836 the number of vessels entered inwards was 561, with a tonnage of 124,000 tons. In 1828 the number of vessels entered outwards was 202, with a tonnage of 44,000 tons; in 1836 the number of vessels entered outwards was 541, with a tonnage of 116,000 tons.

Comparing the trade, revenue, and expenditure of the penal colonies, with those of the United Kingdom, I find that, in proportion to their respective populations, the exports of the penal colonies are seven times, the imports ten times, the revenue twice, and the expenditure one and a half times, as great as those of the United Kingdom.

For the purpose of showing the great commercial importance of these colonies, and their value to this country, as compared with other portions of our colonial empire, I have instituted a comparison between their trade and that of the larger of our other colonies. I find that in 1836 the commerce (including under that term the sum of the exports and imports) of this country with the penal colonies whose population did not then exceed 125,000 persons (convicts as well as free), was equal to four fifths of our commerce with the two Canadas, containing a population of 1,000,000; to three fourths of our commerce with Jamaica, containing a population of 361,000; to nearly double that with the Mauritius, and to one third of that with our Indian empire.

The extent of the market of our colonies for the products of the industry of this country may be inferred from the fact, that in 1836 the exports of British produce and manufactures to New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land were equal in value to about one eighth of the whole of our exports to the colonial empire, whose population was nearly 100,000,000; — to two fifths of the exports to the North American colonies; — to three sevenths of the exports to India; — they were nearly equal to the exports to the West Indian colonies, both insular and continental; and were four times as great as those to the Mauritius. And, lastly, I must state, as a proof of the wealth of these colonies, that in the immediate vicinity of Sydney the value of land is from 100*l.* to 1000*l.* an acre; and in Sydney itself it has been sold at the rate of 10,000*l.* an acre.

I wish to direct the attention of the House to the facts I have just stated, in order to impress the House with the importance of the subject which I am now about to discuss, — namely, the causes which threaten the industry of these colonies, and the necessity of adopting the principles of my Honourable Friend, in order to provide them with the supply of labour which is requisite to maintain them in their present state.

I have already remarked that the rapid progress of these colonies is to be attributed, not to the circumstance that the Government has furnished the settlers with land free of expense; but that it has provided them with the combinable labour which renders that land productive, and which consists in convict slaves, transported at the cost of this country; and, in addition to this, that the Government has created an excellent market in the form of convict, military, and civil establishments, paid for out of the British estimates. Since the commencement of the two colonies, the Government has granted away nearly 7,000,000 of acres, only a trifling portion of which, and that during but the last three or four years, has been paid for. About 110,000 convicts have been transported, most of whom have been assigned as labourers; at the present moment there are probably between 30,000 and 40,000 convicts in private service. The amount of British funds expended upon these colonies since 1786, was estimated by the Transportation Committee to have been at least 8,000,000*l.* sterling; the sum defrayed out of the public purse for these colonies, in 1837, was 461,000*l.*, having increased to that extent, from 354,000*l.* in 1831. These are the elements of the wealth of the penal colonies, — namely, land well adapted to the growth of wool and other produce, a steady market at hand, and a constant and abundant supply of labour. As long as a sufficient supply of labour can be obtained, so long will these colonies prosper. And this brings me to the consideration of the present state of the Australian colonies, and to the deficiency of the supply of labour which exists at present, and will augment, unless means be taken of providing those colonies with labour from other sources than from the gaols of this country, which have of late become inadequate.

During the earlier period of these colonies the supply of convict labour exceeded the demand, and the Government granted various indulgences to the settlers who would take convicts under their charge. At a subsequent period the supply of convict labour only equalled the demand; then there was no difficulty in disposing of convicts, and the strange system of confiding the punishment of offenders to the discretion of private individuals (called the assignment system) acquired its full extension. At present the supply of convict labour is much less than the demand; and the competition for labourers is very great. New South Wales, especially, is suffering from this cause. The flocks of sheep, from the want of shepherds, are twice the size they ought to be; numbers of sheep perish for want of care; and many proprietors, I have been informed, have been obliged to destroy their lambs. It was estimated, last year, that no less than 10,000 labourers were required for that colony alone. Every arrival of late from New South Wales has brought complaints of the want of labour. The diminution in the general and in the land revenue last year may in some degree be attributed to this cause, the effects of which will every year become more striking, unless vigorous measures be adopted to remove the disproportion now existing between the demand for and the supply of labour.

That disproportion is the result of a variety of causes: — First, of the great increase of capital, to which I have already referred; and which has occasioned a great increase in the demand for labour, in order to render that capital productive. Secondly, the deficiency of labour may be partly attributed to the manner in which the Australian colonies have been peopled, — namely, chiefly by convicts, with a very unequal proportion of the two sexes. Population has, in consequence, increased very slowly; as the convicts, who die, rarely leave behind them children to supply their places. The fresh importations of convicts do little more than fill up the void occasioned by deaths, and by the secession of convicts from the class of labourers. Thus the transportation of convicts does not actually afford any additional supply of labour to the settlers in New South Wales, nor enable them to extend their field of production in proportion to the extension of their capital. Thirdly, the employment of criminals as labourers has made various descriptions of labour discreditable for persons who have not been convicted. The free emigrants, who of late years have arrived in New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land, are, therefore, disinclined to adopt occupations similar to those performed by convicts; they are unwilling to labour in company, and thus to confound themselves with criminals under punishment. Precisely the same feelings act upon free persons in the penal colonies as operate upon the white population in the southern states of America, and which make it disgraceful for a white man — and cause him to be stigmatised as a mean white — if he consent to work in those kinds of industry which are the usual employments of the black race. And, lastly, this disinclination to labour for another is strengthened in the Australian colonies by the facility with which land can be obtained. For the price of land is so low, that any person, who has obtained a small sum of money, can set up for himself; and even the mere emigrant labourer can, in a short time, by the savings from his high wages, become the independent proprietor of a small plot of land.

These are the main causes of the disproportion between the supply of and the demand for labour in New South Wales. In Van Diemen's Land the same causes do not operate to the same extent; because the territory of that colony is comparatively limited, and most of the fertile land is already occupied. In Van Diemen's Land, therefore, the yearly importation of convicts from this country is nearly sufficient for the labour market of that colony. In New South Wales this is not the case. If, however, that source of labour be cut off, without new channels of supply being opened, the want of labour will be most intensely felt in both colonies.

Now I feel convinced that no Government can long permit the existence of the present system of transportation. The employment of convicts as slaves (that is, the assignment system) has been condemned by every authority, as a most unequal and improper punishment. It is allowed, even by those most interested in the economical prosperity of the penal colonies, to be the source of innumerable and incalculable moral evils; and to have produced communities as depraved as they are wealthy; in both respects without parallel in the world. Its discontinuance has been recommended by the Noble Lord the Member for Stroud (Lord John Russell), and by the late Secretary of State for the Colonies (Lord Glenelg). Orders have been transmitted to the governors of these colonies to the effect, that no more convicts shall be assigned to settlers. Whether or not convicts should continue to be sent to these colonies, to be punished in gaols or penitentiaries, is (though in itself a question of great importance) one that I will not now discuss. I shall call the attention of the House to this subject on a future, and I trust early occasion, when I shall bring under the consideration of the House the Report and resolutions of the transportation committee. It is the continuance or discontinuance of convict slavery — that is, of the assignment system—which affects the pecuniary interests of the penal colonies. The colonists want convicts to rear their flocks, and till their fields, and for no other purposes. Their present prosperity will vanish if they be deprived of their present supply of convict labour, unless they obtain labour from some other source. They will cease to flourish, especially in New South Wales, even if they retain the present supply of convict labour, unless an additional quantity of labour be procured from other quarters.

How, I ask, can such a supply of labour be obtained, as will compensate for the abolition of transportation, or at least of the assignment system, and will furnish a regularly increasing amount of labour in proportion to the increase of the field of production? So severely is the want of labour felt in New South Wales, that it was proposed to import Hindoos, as indentured labourers, who were to be returned to their native country, at the end of a certain period of time. With regard to this plan, I must observe, that experience has fully shown that it is impossible to enforce bonds of indenture without a system of punishment, which would make the indentured labourer almost a slave. It has generally happened, when the indentured labourer was of the same race as his master, and equal to him in intelligence, that he has broken his indenture, and sold his labour to the highest bidder for it. On the other hand, where the labourer was of an inferior race, he was first entrapped, and subsequently reduced by his master to a state of bondage. Now, every one, who is aware of the ignorance and helplessness of the Hill Coolies (the particular caste of Hindoos proposed to be imported as indentured labourers), must at once perceive that this mode of supplying New South Wales with labour would, in reality, establish a species of slavery in that colony. The Colonial Office has, therefore, very properly refused to assent to such a proceeding. Moreover, if the indentured labourers were to be ultimately sent back to their own country, the importation of a few thousand Hindoos, annually, would be a mere temporary expedient, wholly inadequate to that extension of industry of which New South Wales is capable. On the other hand, if they were permanently to settle in the colony, they would form a separate class, distinct in colour, language, and religion; and a state of society would ensue, such as, I think, no statesman would desire to produce in Australia, after the ample experience, which we have had, of the pernicious consequences of a similar state of society in our West Indian colonies and in the Southern States of America.

Emigration from this country is, therefore, the only source from which labour can be advantageously supplied to New South Wales. But here several difficult questions arise. If transportation continue, the emigration of free labourers to the same place, where criminals are sent to be punished, is most objectionable; first, because it would destroy a great portion of the terrors of transportation, inasmuch as the condition of a labourer in the penal colony is represented to be better than that of one in this country; and the mere banishment, which is generally considered to be the greater portion of the punishment, would in consequence be considered rather in the light of a benefit than of an evil. Secondly, because transportation has produced, and tends to perpetuate, in the penal colonies, a state of morality worse than that of any other community in the world. This has been amply proved by the Report of the Transportation Committee. I entertain, therefore, the most serious doubts whether the Government is morally justified in encouraging the industrious classes of this country in emigrating to a community, where it is all but certain that their moral principles will be subverted by association with the criminals, who are compelled to accompany them. To send 5000 criminals and as many free emigrants to labour together in the same place is an anomaly in legislation, in defence of which no arguments of any validity can be urged. If transportation continue, it would be far better to circumscribe the penal colonies, to allow none but offenders to dwell in them, and to make them nothing else than large gaols, — such as was the condition of Van Diemen's Land under Sir George Arthur. New South Wales should then be limited to the territory which is now occupied; and the remainder of it, especially Port Philip, and the surrounding district of most fertile land, called Australia Felix, should be established into a new colony, untainted by convicts, and inhabited only by free, industrious, and intelligent emigrants. Such a colony would in a short time afford a market for the productions of this country, and a commerce, as extensive as those of the present penal colonies. It is true the penal colonies would still be the sinks of iniquity and vice which they now are; they would not become worse — that is impossible; they would not, however, contaminate the whole of that vast and fertile district, which at present is included within the boundaries of New South Wales. Undoubtedly this proposition is one highly injurious to the interests of the free settlers of New South Wales. But it is the only alternative which, in my opinion, the continuance of transportation permits. Some of the inhabitants of New South Wales claim a vested interest in the labour of the criminals of this country; if so, they must take it with all its consequences. They have selected a gaol as their abode; they must submit to its inconveniences and sufferings. They have chosen to dwell amongst offenders; they must not expect that the Legislature will encourage, or even permit, innocent men to become their companions. For I consider the Legislature to be equally bound to guard over the moral, as well as the economical, interests of its subjects. It ought to prevent those, over whom it exercises authority, from sacrificing their dearer and more important, though remoter, interests, for the sake of some minor, though immediate, advantage; especially when such persons are liable to act in ignorance, as is the case with the greater portion of the emigrant labourers. I, myself, cannot conceive how any virtuous, any high-minded man, any person in whom the desire of pecuniary gain has not obliterated every other and better feeling, can consent to become an inmate of these colonies, if transportation continue, unless under the most erroneous impressions of the consequences of that system of punishment. Indeed, I feel firmly convinced that, with the continuance of transportation, all the better portion of the inhabitants of these colonies, and of the emigrants, will remove to the other Australian communities, that are now springing up, where similar descriptions of industry are carried on, where a better state of society exists, and where free institutions will soon be established, which can never be the case in the penal colonies, so long as convicts are transported.

Sir, if transportation be abolished, I see no obvious difficulty in maintaining the present economical prosperity of those colonies, and in purifying them. The motion of my Honourable Friend points out the means; all that is required is the inclination and the determination on the part of the Government vigorously to adopt those means.

In order that New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land may continue in their career of wealth, the place of the 30,000 or 40,000 convicts, who are now labourers in the penal colonies, must be supplied by a similar number of free labourers. And here I must remark, that 40,000 free men will produce far more than 40,000 convicts; for there was no fact better established before the Transportation Committee, than that, even at the present high rate of wages, free labour, when it can be obtained, is more profitable to its employer than the compulsory labour of unpaid convicts. And, likewise, I should observe, that the whole of this amount of labour would not be required at once; for a certain period of time must elapse before the whole of the convicts, who are now employed as labourers, could be withdrawn from private service, or could become free by the expiration of their terms of punishment. This period should, in my opinion, not exceed four or five years; after which no persons should be permitted to be owners of convict labourers. In addition to these circumstances, it should be remarked that a considerable portion of the now convicts would, on becoming free, become labourers. It is therefore evident, that the emigration, during the next four or five years, of 40,000 labourers, would fully compensate for the abolition of transportation. But, as I have already observed, the present supply of convict labour is insufficient for the demand for labour in New South Wales; therefore some additional free emigration would be required for that colony, in order to prevent any check to the progress of its industry. It is all but impossible accurately to calculate what that additional emigration ought to be. I feel persuaded that, if these colonies were provided, during the next four or five years, with 100,000 emigrants, of equal proportions of men and women, not only would the cessation of the assignment system, and of the supply of convicts from this country, not be felt on the industry of these communities, but they would be amply furnished with labour, and with a population which, unlike the present one, would rapidly increase.

So far, with regard to the effects of such an amount of emigration on the industry and production of these colonies. Its moral effects would be still more striking. Whereas, at present, with a small free emigration, a considerable transportation of convicts demoralises the free emigrants, and is a perennial source of vice; a large free emigration, and no transportation, would soon swamp the remainder of the convict population, and establish a new standard of morality. At the last census, in 1836, the population of these colonies consisted of 120,000 persons, half of whom were, or had been, convicts. Now, it is no exaggeration to suppose, that, if 100,000 emigrants were carried out, free of expense, during the next five years, what with those who would emigrate at their own expense, and with births, the population of these colonies would, at the end of that period, be not less than 300,000 souls, of whom not more than one seventh, or between 40,000 and 50,000, would have been convicts. This result, the House must acknowledge, would be a most desirable one; the permanent prosperity of these colonies would be insured; an increasing trade with this country would be certain; and their population would be constituted of such materials as would fit them for receiving those free institutions and that self-government, without which good colonial government is impossible.

It will be asked, what would be the cost of such an amount of emigration, and how could the money be raised? Twenty pounds a-head would, under a proper system of management, more than cover the expenses of passage, of salaries to the agents of emigration, and of all incidental expenditure. For I find that the cost to the Government for the passage of convicts to the penal colonies was between 13*l.* and 14*l.* a-head, in 1836. 17*l.* a-head were allowed by the Government to the Committee for Female Emigration to Australia; and that committee contracted with their own secretary (Mr. John Marshall) to procure women and convey them to Australia for 16*l.* a-head, out of which he is said to have made a very large profit. According to the Commissioners of Colonisation for South Australia, the whole cost of emigration to that colony was about 18*l.* for every adult. For these reasons it appears to me that 20*l.* a-head would be more than sufficient to defray all the expenses of the emigration which I have proposed. At this rate, 2,000,000*l.* would be required for the emigration of 100,000 persons; and this sum, spread over a period of 4 or 5 years, would amount to between 400,000*l.* and 500,000*l.* a-year, for the next four or five years.

How can this sum be raised? I think, if it were necessary, that a good case could be made out for calling upon this country to contribute a portion of the money, in consideration of the evils which it has inflicted upon these colonies, by making them an abode of criminals; and in consideration of the enormous extension of commerce, which such an emigration would undoubtedly occasion. It is not, however, in my opinion, in any way necessary that there should be any call upon the public purse for this object. The resources of these colonies are amply sufficient for the purpose of carrying on that amount of emigration. The sum required might easily be raised on the security of the sales of waste lands. In proof thereof, I wish to call the attention of the House to the amount of the sales of waste land in the penal colonies. In 1832, the system commenced of selling waste land at the upset price of 5*s.* an acre; in that year 27,000*l.* were raised from the sale of land; in 1833, 33,000*l.* were obtained; in 1834, 48,000*l.*; in 1835, 104,000*l.*; in 1836, 160,000*l.*

This large sum has been raised at the upset price of 5*s.* an acre, — a price universally acknowledged to be far too low; — in consequence, this year, the Government has raised the price of land to 12*s.* an acre. I believe that 1*l.* an acre — the price recommended by the Transportation committee — would not be too high. For the fixed price of land, in the neighbouring colony of South Australia, is 1*l.* an acre; and it appears, from a statement, with which the Colonisation Commissioners of South Australia have favoured me, that that price has not been found to be exorbitant. Since the commencement of that colony, in 1836, the commissioners have sold 138,195 acres; the first 58,995 acres at 12*s.* an acre, the remainder at 1*l.* an acre; they have received, for the sales of land, 109,597*l.*; they have sent out 7115 emigrants, in 66 vessels, of the burden of 36,294 tons: the whole amount of population is not known; but, I believe, what from births and from the emigration from the other Australian colonies, it is not, at present, less than 10,000 souls. In October last, the number of sheep and lambs was 22,500, and of horned cattle 2175. The future sales of land, this year, — taking as a guide the land which has been sold since the commencement of 1839, — are estimated at not less than 5000 acres a-month, and the number of emigrants, this year, will be more than 5000 persons. These facts, I think, cannot fail to produce the conviction, that 1*l.* an acre is by no means too high a price for the wealthy communities of New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land. At this price the land revenue of the penal colonies would greatly increase, if even it be entirely employed in emigration. At the present moment, the sale of land is limited by the deficiency of labour, arising partly from the small emigration; for only an inconsiderable portion of the existing land fund has been devoted to emigration; and partly from the low price of land, which has tempted many of the emigrants immediately to become small proprietors. Now, if there were the security of an Act of Parliament that the price of land would not be lowered, as might be the case, according to the whim and caprice of every Honourable Gentleman who becomes Colonial Secretary, — if the regulations of my Honourable Friend were confirmed by the Legislature, — and if a facility be given to the disposal in this country of colonial lands by the sale of land warrants, — I am convinced that I do not exaggerate, when I suppose that, with an emigration of 20,000 persons annually, and with a price, for waste lands, of from 12*s.* to 1*l.* an acre, the land revenue would soon increase from 160,000*l.*, the amount in 1836, to above 200,000*l.* a-year. Therefore, I conceive that, upon the security of those sales, a sum of 2,000,000*l.* could easily be raised, at less than the colonial rate of interest, — namely, 10 per cent.; still more easily could the sum of 400,000*l.* or 500,000*l.* be raised every year, for the next four or five years, at the same rate of interest. But this amount of interest would be excessive, and would put the colony to an unnecessary expense. If the Government would guarantee a loan, it is evident that the sum of 2,000,000*l.* could be raised, at a very small premium, on the rate of Government securities, — say between 3½ and 4 per cent.: at this rate, the interest upon the loan of 2,000,000*l.* would be between 75,000*l.* and 80,000*l.*, or about one half of the amount of the land revenue of these colonies in 1836; leaving, therefore, even if the land revenue did not increase (an extravagant supposition), a considerable sum for gradually paying off the debt. I think the House must perceive that, in every one of these statements, I have put the cost of emigration, the number of emigrants required, and the expense of the loan at the highest amount. I am, therefore, warranted in concluding that there would be no difficulty in carrying into effect the plan I have proposed.

This plan is the result of much and careful consideration on my part. It has unexpectedly received the strongest confirmation of which it is susceptible. I have within a few days obtained from New South Wales the Report of the Committee of the Legislative Council on Emigration, which committee sat towards the close of last year. From that Report it appears that a plan precisely similar to my own, namely, of raising 200,000*l.* on the security of waste lands, to be expended on emigration, has been submitted to the Legislative Council; and that a letter had been addressed to the Council, giving the sanction and approbation of numerous persons of property and intelligence to the proposal in question. I understand the committee referred this proposal to eighty-four of the most intelligent and extensive proprietors in the colony; that fifty-eight expressed themselves in terms of the highest approbation of the measure; eight only declined to give an opinion; and eighteen objected to it, chiefly from the fear of its becoming a job, and that there was no security that the whole money would be applied to emigration, as the colonial Government had already applied a considerable portion of the proceeds of the land sales to other purposes than those of emigration. If the motion of my Honourable Friend were carried, the only objection to this plan would therefore be removed, and I am assured that the colony would be unanimous in its support.

To conclude, I entreat the earnest consideration of the House and of the Government to this subject, as the only means of abolishing transportation, without endangering the prosperity of the penal colonies; as the only means of continuing that prosperity, and improving the moral state of these communities. It is a means, likewise, of affording, without any expense to this country, the most extensive fields for the employment of our surplus population. It would create a commerce so vast that the imagination could hardly form a conception of what, in a brief period, it might not become. I am profoundly convinced that the southern regions of the globe — Australia, New Zealand, and the myriads of islands of the Polynesian Sea — might, ere long, form the most important markets for the productions of the industry of Great Britain, and amply compensate for those markets which we are on the eve of losing in the Old World; provided those fair and fertile portions of the earth's surface were peopled with men of the British race, with wants, feelings, and desires similar to our own; and this, I firmly believe, might be accomplished by that plan of systematic emigration which has been proposed by my Honourable Friend, and to which I give my most cordial support.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — Whatever differences of opinion may be entertained on this subject, or on the general principle involved in the resolutions proposed by my Honourable Friend the Member for Sheffield, or in any of those various details by which my Honourable Friend proposes to carry these resolutions into effect, — I am quite sure that it is the unanimous opinion of the House, that no greater or more important subject — no question more truly deserving the serious attention of Parliament — can possibly be brought under our consideration. I agree with my Honourable Friend, that, as it is the duty, at all times, of the Government of this country, and of the colonies, to encourage emigration, by every fair and legitimate means, so it is a duty still more incumbent upon us, on many accounts, at the present time. During the short period of time for which I have had the honour to be connected with the Colonial Office, it is impossible for me not to have been forcibly struck with the circumstances that have been adverted to, — that, not only on the part of the labouring classes of this country, but also on the part of a class of persons who have hitherto shown a reluctance to leave their native country, of many persons in the higher conditions of life, and possessed of small capital, there has been shown a most remarkable desire, at the present moment, to seek in other colonies, and in the distant possessions of the British empire, those means of acquiring an honest independence, which are not so readily afforded in the mother country. I concur in the sentiment of my Honourable Friend; and so far from this being a matter of reproach to these persons, and so far from these persons being to be discouraged for it, it reflects the highest honour upon them; and I rejoice in thinking that, in leaving this country, they do not estrange themselves from its real and permanent interests; but, on the contrary, they prove their attachment to those interests by trusting themselves to those distant possessions to which they are proceeding. I will say, therefore, that assuredly I have anything rather than a prejudice against emigration; on the contrary, it always has appeared to me, among the many glories and blessings permitted to this country, as a means by which Providence has allowed the English race and language, the manners, laws, liberties, and institutions of this country, to spread over so vast a surface; there can be no more solemn duty imposed upon us than that we should avail ourselves to the utmost of the vast means which Providence has been pleased to put into our hands, in order that we may effect the greatest blessing granted to the human race; namely, that wherever there are unoccupied lands, affording the means of extending the influence of the British nation, we should avail ourselves of such opportunities. I must fairly confess to the House, that I could have wished, consistently with my duty, not to have been called upon to deal with this question so soon after my connection with the Colonial Office, or to have addressed the House upon a subject of so much complication and difficulty, to which many Gentlemen present have had an opportunity of paying much more attention than I have been able to afford to give to it. At the same time, I feel bound to make some statements in reply to the motion of my Honourable Friend. My Honourable Friend began his speech by attacking the system of disposing of the waste lands of the Crown, which prevailed previously to the last ten years. I can assure my Honourable Friend, and the House, that you shall hear no defence or apology of that system from me. System I can hardly call that, which would be more accurately described as a total want of all system. It is really quite melancholy to see the mischief that has been done by the pestilent system of jobbing that has existed. It is impossible to read the Earl of Durham's account of the North American colonies, and to reflect upon what was done there under the old system — what the people of those colonies might have been under another system — and what they are, now, — without the strongest feelings of indignation and regret. I can, therefore, assure my Honourable Friend that he will be disappointed if he expects that I shall, in any degree, defend that former system. But, as in many other things, so in this; — it is difficult to retrace our steps.

Hic labor, hoc opus est.

Immediately to return to sounder principles may be attended with very considerable difficulties; and a just and reasonable Government must proceed with caution in a question surrounded by so many difficulties, and in which the rights and feelings of the people of the colonies and the Legislatures are so much involved. I can only assure the House, on the part of the Government, that I shall extremely rejoice if I find a disposition — and I have reason to believe it exists — among the local Legislatures of the North American provinces, to take the most effectual means of getting rid of existing abuses; and, so far from throwing any impediment in their way, the Government would be glad to assist them in getting rid of them. As to the resolutions of my Honourable Friend: in the first place, I am not prepared to deny what the Honourable Member calls the fundamental principle of the disposition of colonial lands. I quite concur with my Honourable Friend, that free grants are altogether an abuse; and I altogether concur with him, that the only just means for the disposition of the lands of the Crown, in the colonies, is by impartial sale, at a just and sufficient price. But while I entirely assent to this principle, I heard several details in my Honourable Friend's speech from which I will not say that I entirely dissent, but upon which I confess I have not sufficient means to give any decided opinion; but I do say this, that there is enough of difference of opinion among persons whose authority is great in this House, — persons of official station, and personal experience in the colonies, — persons who have the best means of understanding the subject, and who have considered it impartially and closely,—to induce me to think that it would be extremely unadvisable that this House should pledge itself not only to the general principles of these resolutions, but to the details by which my Honourable Friend seeks to carry them into execution. The first important principle in these resolutions is that contained in the second resolution, in which it is stated that, "amidst the great variety of methods of disposing of waste lands which have been pursued by the British Parliament, the most effectual, beyond all comparison, is the plan of sale at a fixed, uniform, and sufficient price." This plan obtains at the present moment in the colonies, where the mode of sale is by auction, to the highest bidder, with a minimum price. I have found many of the most intelligent persons with whom I have had communication,—some of them governors of colonies, who have had the amplest means of forming an opinion,—who all believe that it would be unwise to act on the principle recommended by my Honourable Friend,—namely, that all lands, however different in situation and soil, however circumstanced as to the convenience of rivers and towns, should be sold precisely at the same price. I have found a different scheme more generally recommended,—namely, the setting of a sufficient minimum price, and then throwing the land into the market; leaving it to competition to determine, by auction, whether a greater price ought not to be given. My own impression is, certainly, in favour of selling by auction,—which is the system which had been adopted in the United States of America. I think that, under the system proposed, there would be extreme difficulty in guarding against jobbing and unfair preferences, where there might happen to be valuable land. I will, on this subject, refer the House to the opinion of an intelligent and distinguished public officer, Sir G. Gipps, Governor of New South Wales; who says, in one of his despatches, that nothing, in his opinion, is so essential to the prosperity of a colony, as to maintain inviolate the principle of selling all lands by public auction to the highest bidder. I warn the House to guard against committing themselves to a principle like that proposed, until it has had further time for investigation. I will come to the next part of the resolution, which goes on to recommend "the employment of the whole or a large fixed portion of the purchase money in affording a passage to the colony, cost free, to young persons of the labouring classes, in an equal proportion of the sexes." I agree, as a general principle, that it is most desirable that a large proportion of the money received from the sale of land should be devoted to the purpose of promoting emigration; but I object to the House pledging itself to any strict and definite proposal on this subject. The colony of South Australia is held out as a model for all future colonies; and, in the fourth resolution, it is stated that "this method of colonising has been applied to the new colony of South Australia with very remarkable and gratifying results."

Now, I beg to call the attention of the House to what has actually taken place in that colony. The fundamental principle on which that colony is founded is, that the nett proceeds of the land shall be devoted to the purposes of emigration. It is quite true that, in the first Bill, this principle was strictly and rigidly laid down. The commissioners were forbidden from devoting a shilling to any other purpose whatever; and I am quite sure what I am going to say will be a warning to the House against precipitately laying down abstract rules. For what is the fact? Not a year passed over, when the promoters of the first Bill came and asked for an important qualification. They had been borrowing money at 10*l.* per cent. to carry on the general government of the colony; and finding this a very extravagant mode of proceeding, whilst they were getting money through the sale of their lands, they brought in a Bill to enable the land fund to be loaned to the fund for the general government, or, in other words, to apply the proceeds of the land fund to the general government. Am I not, then, justified in calling upon the House to pause before they commit themselves to any plan of a similar description? But there is a claim of a more sacred and important nature to be provided for than even emigration, most important as that is,—I mean the protection of the interests of the aboriginal inhabitants. One of our first objects should be, to see that those persons are duly protected and taken care of out of the proceeds of the land funds. There are, also, other expenses, such as road making and surveying, which may, very properly, be charged upon the land funds. These are grounds against laying down a strict and invariable rules, which, however well they look on paper, would, I am sure, fail in practice. The next point, adverted to in the resolutions, to which I will call the attention of the House, is, the recommendation, "that in order to derive the greatest possible advantage from this method of colonising, it is essential that the permanence of the system should be secured by the Legislature, and that its administration should be intrusted to a distinct subordinate branch of the colonial department, authorised to sell colonial lands in this country, to anticipate the sales of land by raising loans for emigration on the security of future land sales." I am very far from saying that it may not be right and proper, under circumstances, to anticipate the land revenues of a country for purposes of this kind; but I feel that this is a principle which ought not to be brought into action without the greatest caution, and under very strict limitations, and I, for one, shall object to Parliament holding out vague promises which it may not be expedient to act up to afterwards. I have already ventured to refer to a passage from a despatch of Sir G. Gipps, on one part of this subject; and I will beg leave to read another, as I am sure it will have much more weight than anything I can say. Sir G. Gipps says, —

> With regard to the project of pledging the land revenue to purposes of emigration, it should be recollected that this is the only fund which the executive Government has to defray any charges which the Legislative Council may be disposed to reject; that it is impossible to maintain in a distant colony a sufficient check over imprudent expenditure.

I beg pardon, I am reading a wrong extract. I am not by any means sorry that I have read it; but the passage I did mean to read is to the effect that the carrying on of emigration on a large scale, by means of a loan, would tend to create a perpetual debt against the colony, which experience has taught us would not easily be got rid of; and, moreover, it would be extremely difficult to administer the government of the colony with a proper economy in the midst of the fictitious wealth produced by the loan. My Honourable Friend the Member for Sheffield has only done justice to my Noble Friend near me (Lord Viscount Howick), when he stated that he has been instrumental in placing the system with regard to the disposal of the land revenues on a much better footing than it was previous to the year 1831. At that period the regulations of Lord Goderich were adopted; and the effect produced by them on the land revenues of Australia, and the emigration to that country, was very remarkable. In 1830, the land revenues of New South Wales amounted to 1896*l.* This was under the old system. In 1831, they amounted to 3018*l.*; in 1832, to 18,683*l.*; in 1833, to 26,272*l.*; in 1834, to 43,489*l.*; in 1835, to 83,875*l.*; in 1836, to 108,558*l.*; and in 1837, to 127,866*l.* This affords a most encouraging proof of the extent to which these resources have been called into operation under a fair and proper system. I will state how the money has been applied to emigration during that time. In the year 1832, 5177*l.* was devoted to emigration; in 1833, 9025*l.*; in 1834, 7979*l.*; in 1835, 10,764*l.*; in 1836, 11,794*l.*; and in 1837, 44,729*l.* The House will observe that the year 1837 was the first year in which the Government system of emigration was really carried into operation. In 1838, when the system came fully into operation, no less a sum than 110,000*l.* was devoted to the purposes of emigration to New South Wales alone. No less than twenty-four emigrant ships went out, containing 6500 persons; and during that year the total number of emigrants to New South Wales amounted to 10,000. I think that this statement will satisfy the House that there is every disposition on the part of the Government to give encouragement to well-regulated emigration; but I must warn the House against supposing that it is impossible to send emigrants to a colony in too great numbers, in the absence of previous inquiry and regulations. Great temporary evil may occur from taking to a particular colony, at a certain time, a very large number of emigrants; and at this moment, by the last accounts from Sir George Gipps, it appears that even in New South Wales, owing to the accidental circumstance of a long drought, there is no demand for labour, and persons may be seen with their hands crossed, unable to find employment. If we take from the colonies all control, and give it to an office in London, I do feel that the results may be very disastrous and unfortunate. I do not wish to trouble the House with any further observations. I am truly sensible of the deep importance of this subject; and I may say for the Noble Marquess who holds the seals of the Colonial Office, that there is no subject on which he is more anxious. I can assure my Honourable Friend and the House that my Noble Friend approaches this subject with a mind wholly unprejudiced, and that he is most desirous, at the first season of leisure, to examine the question in all its details, with a sincere anxiety to do what is best for the interest of the colonies and of the mother country. I hope that my Honourable Friend will rest satisfied with this assurance, and that he will be of opinion that this is a question which might more properly be left to the Executive. I do not say this with any wish to evade the question, as I am animated solely by a desire cautiously and carefully to come to a conclusion that would most conduce to the interest and the welfare of the colonies and of the mother country.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I hope my Honourable Friend the Member for Sheffield will not rest satisfied with the mere assurance of the Government that this matter shall receive due consideration from them. The question stands ripe for the decision of the Government upon it. What is asked for by the present motion is this: that certain fixed principles shall be laid down, on which the Government, in all future sales of colonial land, and in the application of the produce of those sales, shall be bound to act; that the Colonial Office shall be deprived of that discretion which it now does, or may in future, exercise according to its will and pleasure, of acting or declining to act upon those principles. The Government understand those principles; for they have already acted upon them, to a limited extent, in New South Wales and in the new colony of South Australia; and by these two experiments, which have been eminently successful, the practical importance to this country of an adherence to those principles has been fully ascertained. Why, then, delay passing an Act which should be a rule for the guidance, in time to come, of the Colonial Office?

In the place of such a rule, what have we now to depend upon, but the capricious exercise of the prerogative? and with how utter a disregard to the interests of the colonies that prerogative is exercised, an example is afforded in the case of Nova Scotia. What can be thought of the attention paid by the mother country to the interests of that colony, when, in order to pay a gambling debt of the Duke of York, all the mines and minerals of Nova Scotia were, at one fell swoop, granted away to that Royal Duke? This grant was sold to a London silversmith, to whom these important rights were thus transferred in perpetuity. The important coal mines of that colony, — situated, like those of our own country, near the sea coast, — on the proper working of which, in future time, may depend the navigation by steam of those seas, and the maintenance, in that quarter, of our naval superiority, — the Crown, by one lavish grant, assigned away. If a man wished for a libel upon our system of colonial government, where could he find a stronger one than in the fact I have adduced? Acts, pregnant with mischief, such as these, done in utter disregard to the interests of the colony, would almost justify rebellion.

The Under Secretary for the Colonies has stated that other demands, than demands for emigration, may be made upon the land revenues, — demands which ought to be defrayed from that source. For the sake of argument, grant that to be the case. I would then say, let one fourth or one fifth be applied for those demands, and let three fourths or four fifths be applied for the purposes of emigration. Let them only lay down a fixed principle, not to be set aside or overruled by the mere dictum of a Colonial Secretary, but a permanent basis to which the country can look with certainty. After the luminous exposition of this principle given by the Honourable Member for Sheffield, and by the Honourable Baronet the Member for Leeds, I do not consider I need expatiate on this part of the subject. I only wish to express my conviction that the present and future prosperity of our colonies mainly depends on the carrying into complete effect the principles, first expounded by the clear intelligence of Mr. Wakefield. I sincerely trust that some distinct statement will go forth from the Government, that they intend steadily to apply the proceeds of the colonial land revenues in aid of emigration.

There is one part of the plan of my Honourable Friend the Member for Sheffield, from which I dissent; and that is, the reservation to the commissioners of power to raise loans by way of mortgage, in anticipation of the annual revenue, to accrue from the sale of lands. This would occasion an unsteady and fluctuating demand for emigrant labour in the mother country, — a great demand in those years when the capital, thus received by loan, is to be expended; a slack demand in those years when we have only the surplus annual revenue to apply. Now, it is of importance to the mother country that the yearly demand for the labourers who are to emigrate, and for the shipping to be employed in conveying the labourers, should be, as nearly as may be, constant, or steadily progressive.

Desirous as I am of promoting this plan of emigration, as a means of relieving the pressure of our population on the means of subsistence, I beg to guard against my being supposed to maintain the doctrine, that the Legislature, by affording this manner of relief, is in any degree exempted from the obligation of taking those other measures which would give life to industry at home, and advance the prosperity of the operatives, — from the bligation of allowing our artisans freely o exchange the work of their hands with he produce of other countries, of whatever lescription. Free trade in articles of ubsistence, and a well-devised system of migration, are the means best calculated o promote the permanent prosperity of he working classes in this country.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — I ave observed, with very great satisfac- ion, the apparently general concurrence of the House in the important principle, with respect to the disposal and occupation of land in the British colonies, which has been so ably stated, in his speech, by the Honourable Member for Sheffield. Nothing, certainly, can be farther from my intention than to express any difference of opinion from the Honourable Member respecting this principle; on the contrary, I entirely agree with him as to its soundness and extreme importance, — and I think, also, with him, that its discovery reflects great honour upon the gentleman by whom it was brought to light, and who first pointed out its influence upon the success of all schemes of colonisation. As far as I am aware, the benefits to be derived from the prevention of an undue dispersion of settlers in a new territory, with the means by which this object can best be accomplished, and the necessity of combined labour,—which, in a new country, can only be secured by artificially maintaining a proper proportion between the members of the population and the extent of land which they occupy, —had entirely escaped the notice of all writers upon political economy, until they were stated in those works of Mr. Wakefield to which the Honourable Member for Sheffield has referred, in terms of well-deserved commendation. I consider these principles to be not less important than they were novel at the time they were brought into notice by Mr. Wakefield; and they will, also, I am convinced, be found to be of very general application. They apply, not only to the Australian and North American colonies, but, as the Honourable Member has justly observed, it is in them that we must seek for the real cause of the introduction of slavery into our West Indian colonies; and it is only, therefore, I believe, by measures founded upon them, that the difficulties which have followed its abolition can be effectually removed; nor will the great measure of emancipation be rendered productive of all the good which ought to flow from it, unless the Legislatures of these colonies, by a wise application of the principles I have now referred to, endeavour to procure a regular supply of free labour.

But, however fully I agree with the Honourable Member for Sheffield as to the importance of the leading principle of the resolutions he has moved, I must, at the same time, express my strong doubts whether it would be expedient that they should now be adopted by the House. The first resolution states only an abstract truth, which it is, I believe, impossible to deny; I have, therefore, no other objection to offer to it, except that it is unnecessary, and that, taken by itself, and if not followed up by others tending to practical measures, it could lead to no useful result. But the second and third resolutions, which do point to practical measures, are expressed in terms much too absolute and too general to be safely adopted by the House — at least, in their present form. These resolutions would imply that the adoption of that policy with respect to the occupation of land, for which the Honourable Member contends, should at once be enforced in all the British colonies by the authority of Parliament.

Now — at least, so far as regards the North American colonies, which have attained considerable wealth, civilisation, and importance, and which have Legislatures of their own — this would, in my opinion, be a most inexpedient course; it would be an interference with the local Legislatures, which would be in the highest degree impolitic and improper. It is perfectly true, as the Honourable Member has stated, that there have been in these colonies very great abuses and much mismanagement in the way in which land has been granted; but I cannot concur with him in attributing this mismanagement entirely, or even principally, to anything like corruption, or a desire to promote improperly their own individual interests, on the part either of the Government or of the colonial authorities. I had no connection with the Government in those days in which these things took place, and I have, therefore, no interest in undertaking its defence; but, in justice to it, I must say that, although I am not prepared to deny the existence of jobbing in some cases, the mismanagement, with respect to grants of lands, was mainly attributable to the ignorance which then generally prevailed of the principles upon which this most important part of the administration of a colony should be conducted; the evil arose principally from mistakes honestly committed, — and mistakes, I must add, for which the colonial Legislatures were certainly not less to blame than the Government. The popular feeling in these colonies was altogether in favour of facilitating the acquisition of land by the bonâ fide settler,—and this was the object which the Government had in view; but neither the Government nor the colonial Legislatures perceived that it was one which could not practically be accomplished in the manner in which it was attempted. It was in vain to declare that no individual should obtain a grant of more than a certain size. Large tracts of land, which they could not improve, were still monopolised by individuals, who evaded the regulation by purchasing, at a nominal price, the grants which poor settlers had a right to claim; and this evasion could not be prevented by forbidding, for a certain time, the alienation of land which had been granted, without greatly impeding the application of capital, and the improvement of the land. In the same manner, the most stringent regulations which could be devised to enforce the settlement and improvement of the land which was granted, have always failed, from the impossibility which has been experienced of enforcing the rules that have been laid down, and compelling parties to perform the conditions attached to their grants. The whole system upon which these measures were adopted, was, in my opinion, unsound; and that was the far wiser and better principle, which Mr. Wakefield was the first to recommend, that every man should be allowed to obtain, not by grant, but by purchase, as much land as he chose, free from all conditions and all restrictions as to the use he might make of it,—trusting that, by requiring a sufficient price to be paid, a regard for their own interest would prevent individuals from seeking to obtain more land than they could occupy with advantage to themselves and to the community. In answer to a complaint of the Assembly of Lower Canada upon the subject, the reasons for the adoption of this principle in the disposal of the Crown lands were stated by Lord Ripon, in a despatch with which I am sure the Honourable Member for Sheffield is acquainted, and of which I am equally sure that he must entirely approve. But, Sir, the Honourable Member must be aware that the views stated in that despatch, however consistent with his opinion and with sound policy, failed to command the assent of the Colonial Legislature. The Assembly, and, I believe, I may add the colonists generally, still continued to prefer the policy of granting land, and of endeavouring to facilitate, as much as possible, its occupation by the poor settler. Nor is this the popular opinion only in our own colonies,—it extends equally to the United States; and the Honourable Member, when he so highly commends the system which has there been adopted, cannot be ignorant that there is, at this moment, a strong and general feeling amongst a large part of the population in favour of what is termed the "easy occupation of land," and that a proposition has been made (nor am I sure that it has not been adopted) for a reduction of the price of land, already far too low, according to the principle for which the Honourable Member contends.

Indeed, I so far differ from the praise which the Honourable Member for Sheffield has bestowed upon the management of their public lands by the United States, that I think those States, at this moment, afford a very striking proof of the bad effects which result from neglecting that most important principle of restraining the natural tendency to disperse in the settlers of a new country, which it was the main object of Mr. Wakefield's writings to enforce. Formerly, from being surrounded by hostile tribes of warlike savages, the settlers in what are now the United States were compelled to keep closely together, for the purposes of mutual succour and defence; but now that they are no longer under the influence of the same motives, they have scattered themselves to immense distances over extensive tracts of land; and it is this dispersion of the population, which has not been checked by the too low price demanded for land, which has, in my opinion, been the principal cause of that almost barbarous condition of some of the Western States, in which we hear of Lynch law, and of so many other moral and social evils. I have mentioned these things, in order to show how exceedingly strong a prejudice pervades the whole North American continent, in favour of giving every facility to the settlement and occupation of land. If, therefore, by Act of Parliament, we were to attempt to run counter to this strong popular feeling, and to enforce the adoption of a wiser policy, I fear it would be at the risk of entirely failing in the measures we might adopt. By persuasion and influence we may do much towards introducing that system, which I agree with the Honourable Member for Sheffield in approving; but if we carry our interference too far, and endeavour to act with authority, we may produce an effect the very opposite of that which we desire, and, at the same time, the most disastrous political consequences. It must not be forgotten that, since the Crown revenues in the North American colonies have been given up to the Assemblies, the Imperial Government has no power to act in these matters, except with their concurrence. With their concurrence, much, no doubt, may be done; and I trust that all proper means will be adopted to obtain it; but I must most seriously caution the House against encouraging any attempt to proceed by coercive measures.

For these reasons, I think the resolutions which have been proposed are inapplicable to our North American colonies; nor are they less so to those in the West Indies. The Honourable Member said that the principle which should be followed in the disposal of lands had been very recently stated in a despatch, addressed to the governors of the West Indian colonies by Lord Glenelg; but he complained that this despatch had been allowed to become a dead letter. I admit that this despatch has not led to any important results; but the Honourable Member has not adverted to the fact, that the reason of its having been so nearly inoperative is, that most of the lands in these colonies had previously been granted to individuals. Even in the large Island of Jamaica, of which so small a portion is yet occupied, I am informed that the right of property in only about 5000 acres remains to the Crown. It is not, therefore, by merely restricting the grants of land that the principle of the Honourable Member can be practically carried into effect; it is in vain for the Crown to put a high price on the land of which it still retains possession, while so much belonging to individuals can be brought into the market, and, by competition, will necessarily keep down its value. Under these circumstances, the only manner in which the principle of restricting the occupation of land can be carried into effect, is, by the measure to which the Honourable Member himself adverted, — namely, the imposition of a tax upon land. Undoubtedly this would, in my opinion, be a most advisable measure; nor do I believe that, in a majority of the West Indian colonies, a regular supply of labour will ever be obtained, until the greater part of the revenue necessary for carrying on the public service shall be raised by a direct impost upon the land, instead of by indirect taxation. But here, again, it is only by the intervention of the colonial Legislatures that this policy can be adopted. The resolutions, therefore, which the Honourable Member has proposed, in terms so general and extensive, are as inapplicable to the West Indian as to the North American colonies.

There remain, then, only the Australian colonies, as to which the resolutions of the Honourable Member can with propriety be applied; and I would ask him, what are the grounds upon which, even as regards them, he conceives it to be necessary for the House to adopt such a step? The intervention of Parliament is surely not required for the purpose of inducing the executive Government to adopt that policy in the disposal of land in Australia which he has advocated, since he has himself stated that this policy was first suggested in some writings of Mr. Wakefield, about ten years ago; and in the beginning of 1831, — that is, within two years, or little more, of the time when the suggestion was made, — it was adopted by Lord Ripon, so far as regards the Australian colonies. But, then, the Honourable Member said, "It is not sufficient that the system should be adopted by the Government; what one Secretary of State has done, another may undo, — and with the rapid succession of different persons at the head of the Colonial Office, there can be no security for that permanence in one line of policy upon this subject which is so essential for its success." No doubt, that is a plausible objection; but have we practically experienced those constant changes in the system of disposing of land in Australia, which the Honourable Member apprehends must be the consequence of frequent changes in the Colonial Office? On the contrary, though Lord Normanby is the fifth Secretary of State who has held that office since Lord Ripon's resignation, the rule which was laid down in 1831, that Crown land should be alienated by public sale, has ever since been strictly adhered to. It is true, some grants have been made; but these have only been grants to which parties were entitled under engagements entered into by the Government previously to 1831; and I am sure the Honourable Member is the last man who would contend that the change of system then adopted would have justified a breach of engagements with private individuals, which had already been contracted. For the purpose, then, of insuring a permanent adherence to the system adopted by Lord Ripon, so far as regards the alienation of the Crown lands in Australia, exclusively by public sale, — I think the Honourable Member cannot possibly contend that it is necessary for the House to come to the resolution he has proposed, or to legislate upon this subject. But I think I hear the Honourable Member say, that there has not been equal steadiness in adhering to the policy adopted by Lord Ripon with regard to the appropriation of the revenue derived from the sale of land; that the money so produced ought to be exclusively devoted to the promotion of education; and that, in 1834, a large proportion of it was improperly diverted to other objects.

I agree with the Honourable Member in thinking not only that land ought to be alienated exclusively by sale, but also that, in the present condition of the Australian colonies, the encouragement of emigration is the most useful object to which the proceeds of the land sales can be applied. But though I concur so far in the opinion of the Honourable Gentleman, I cannot admit that it is proper to lay down any strict and inflexible rule — that the whole, or even any given and large proportion, of the revenue derived from the sale of land, shall be laid out in carrying on a system of emigration. It must, in the first place, be admitted, by all, that the expense of collecting the revenue must, at all events, be defrayed out of it; and in this must be reckoned not only the expense of survey, but other very large items of charge, in the formation of roads, and the building of bridges, schools, and churches, which are necessary for the advantageous settlement of the country. The sums so laid out may justly be regarded as employed in preparing more land for sale, and increasing its value, and augmenting the future revenue; and as such means of communication and public buildings are absolutely essential for the existence of civilised society, if the funds necessary for effecting these improvements be not provided from the proceeds of the sales of land, they must, in the settlement of a colony, be defrayed by taxes, which every Government, including that of the United States, has found it very difficult and very disadvantageous to impose upon such infant communities.

Mr. C. BULLER. — Hear, hear, hear!

LORD HOWICK. — I perceive that my Honourable Friend the Member for Liskeard cheers in a manner which implies a contradiction of what I have now asserted. I understand what he means; I know that he would imply, that the great superiority of the system of settlement adopted by the United States, over that pursued in the adjoining British colonies, is, that in the former there exist municipal institutions, which, by the power they possess of imposing rates, provide for those important local objects to which I have just adverted. I do not deny this advantage on the part of the United States; I am aware that the improvements of civilised life make their appearance in an early stage of their settlements, as compared with those of Canada. I am far from undervaluing the achievements of their extraordinary energy and enterprise; but still, unless we are to disbelieve the accounts of every traveller who has described the condition of the Western States, it is impossible to doubt that the manner in which the wilderness is first occupied by the backwoodsmen — who have been termed the pioneers of civilisation — is rude and barbarous in the extreme. Each family settles upon the land cleared by its own labour, separated often from its nearest neighbours by impenetrable forests, without roads, without schools, without churches, without those advantages which constitute the whole difference between civilisation and barbarism. The Honourable Member says that the only revenue which by law they can raise for such objects as these, is that derived from local sales. But, Sir, it is because such is the case, — it is because a higher price is not put upon land, and the purchase money applied to these most necessary purposes, — that they are altogether neglected in the early stages of settlement, when the population is thinly scattered, and money cannot be raised by local contributions. My Honourable Friend may have a different account to give of all these things; he may tell us that, even in the back settlements of the United States, good roads, public buildings, and all the evidences of a highly civilised society are to be found: but he must excuse me for saying, that the three or four months which he has had the advantage of passing on the other side of the Atlantic, do not quite entitle him to knock down at once, with his authority, what those who have not travelled like himself may advance, on what they consider sufficient evidence. Travellers' tales should proverbially be received with caution; and though I am well aware that nothing can be farther from my Honourable Friend's intention than to mislead us by erroneous information, I cannot help thinking that he saw so much, and heard so much, during his short visit to America, that his recollection is not upon all points quite so clear as might be wished. Nor can I help reminding him, that this is not the first time that he has used his authority, as a traveller, to give me a point blank contradiction upon a matter on which he has since turned out to be completely in the wrong. I am aware that I am going a little out of the subject immediately under discussion; but I trust I may be excused for mentioning to the House one circumstance, as a proof of the necessity of our placing some limit to that credence which we are always disposed to yield to the bold and positive statements of these travelled gentlemen. The House may perhaps remember that, some time ago, during a discussion upon the alleged insufficiency of the force in New Brunswick, when threatened with hostilities from the State of Maine, the Honourable Gentleman made himself very merry at my expense, for having asserted that Sir John Harvey might, in case of necessity, receive assistance from the Governor of Lower Canada; he treated with supreme contempt the "ignorance" which such a supposition implied, and told me that the succour upon which I calculated could not possibly, at such a time, reach New Brunswick from Lower Canada, — unless, indeed, the troops who were to afford it could be carried in a balloon. Now, it so happens, that at the very time it was said to be so entirely impossible, a regiment was marched without the slightest difficulty from Lower Canada to New Brunswick, — that it arrived there in ample time to have afforded the aid which it was apprehended that Sir John Harvey might have required, — and when this was found not to be the case, it marched back with the same ease that it had got thither.

I have mentioned this fact, only to show to the House the propriety of receiving with a little caution the somewhat hasty statements of the Honourable Gentleman. To return to the argument I was pursuing: I must repeat, upon the concurrent testimony of every traveller, except my Honourable Friend, that in their infancy the new settlements of the Western States of America do not enjoy the advantage of tolerable roads, of schools, and of similar works of civilisation. I contend that if, in the colonisation of Australia, we would realise the views of Mr. Wakefield, and occupy the country, not with a population falling back into a rude and semi-barbarous condition, but with one enjoying all the advantages of civilisation and of a regularly organised society, we must not only take care to prevent the undue dispersion of the inhabitants, by requiring a sufficient price for the land, but we must also apply a part of the revenue thus obtained in effecting those necessary local improvements which cannot, by any other means, be so well provided for.

I have always thought that the money derived from the sale of lands in the colonies should be regarded as a part of their capital, which, as such, should be invested in their permanent improvement, not applied, in common with the rest of the ordinary revenue, to the purposes of current expenditure. Upon this principle, it seems to me that in the present condition of the Australian colonies, there is no permanent object to which these sums can be devoted of equal importance with the encouragement of emigration; and I therefore entirely concur with the Honourable Member for Sheffield in thinking that the largest part of these funds ought to be so applied for the present; but when the Honourable Member for Bridport hence argues that we ought to fix, by positive law, the proportion of the land revenue which shall be strictly reserved for this exclusive purpose, I would point out to him the objection to this course, which arises from the fact, that the proportion which he would invariably fix — is liable to constant alteration. It is obvious that, — although at the present moment it may be expedient to apply much the larger proportion of the funds in question to emigration, and reserve only a smaller sum for those local objects which I have mentioned, — as the colony increases in population and in extent, this will cease to be the case, as the necessity of emigration will diminish, and the amount of expenditure required in preparing new tracts of land for the occupation of the native inhabitants will increase.

But the Honourable Member, no doubt, will say that even the principle I have now endeavoured to lay down was widely departed from, by the diversion, in 1834, of a large part of the revenue derived from the sale of land in New South Wales to the maintenance of the police. I admit this to have been the case, and I regret, with the Honourable Member, the necessity which existed for so applying this money; but, at the same time, I must observe, that this necessity arose from the reluctance of the colonists to provide, by other taxes, for an expense which, in justice, they were bound to defray. The expense of the police in New South Wales is a charge which, upon no principles of fairness, can be imposed upon the people of this country; for, though it may be true that the necessity for keeping up so large and expensive a police force in that colony may arise from the character of the convicts sent from hence, it is no less true — as was well observed by the Honourable Baronet the Member for Leeds — that the astonishing wealth of our penal colonies is almost entirely derived from the labour of these same convicts. Surely, then, the colonists cannot expect at once to enjoy this advantage, and to be relieved from the burden by which it is accompanied? I conceive, therefore, that the charge for the police was properly thrown upon the colony; and that, as its inhabitants were unwilling to provide for the charge by other taxes, it was only just that it should be met by a diversion of the land revenue from an object in which they are chiefly interested, instead of throwing the burden upon the people of this country.

These considerations justify the conduct, in this particular, of the Government in 1834, which was objected to by the Honourable Member for Sheffield; and I can conceive many cases in which it would be better to divert a portion of the revenue arising from the sale of lands, to meet the necessary expenses of the colony, than to press too severely upon the revenue of a young and growing society by premature taxation: nor is it a little remarkable that this is the course which has been actually followed both in the United States and in South Australia —the very examples which the Honourable Member for Sheffield particularly pointed out to us for imitation. As to the United States, indeed, I think that when the Honourable Member for Sheffield said that we ought to follow in their footsteps, and that if we meant to pursue the same wise policy as to the disposal of land, we must take the system as a whole, and not attempt to adopt it only in part,—he must surely have forgotten that, although the sale of land may be conducted in that republic in a manner conformable to his views, such certainly is not the case with respect to the application of the revenue thus obtained; on the contrary, not one shilling of the money so obtained is applied in assisting emigration from the Eastern States; it is not even applied to those purposes of local improvement, which I regard as one of the most legitimate modes of employing it,—but it is, on the contrary, almost entirely expended as a part of the ordinary revenues in carrying on the public service. This is a mode of appropriating the sums received from the sale of land, which appears to me even an unwise one, though I am not prepared to push to the same extent with him the principle for which the Honourable Member contends.

But the example of South Australia is still more remarkable. This colony was founded for the very purpose of practically trying that system of colonisation, which it is the object of the Honourable Member to recommend to us. Its administration is principally intrusted to commissioners, who are almost all gentlemen particularly distinguished for their advocacy of this system. The Secretary of State has left them to pursue their own course, almost free from any interference on his part; and yet, even in this colony, so founded and so governed, it has not been found practically possible to adhere rigidly to that mode of appropriating the funds derived from this sale of land, which the Honourable Member now calls upon the House to declare, by his proposed resolution, that the Legislature ought to enforce generally, in all our colonies, by strict enactment. I confess I was greatly surprised that the Honourable Member, in his speech, totally omitted all reference to that very remarkable circumstance to which I now allude, and which was stated by my Right Honourable Friend the Under Secretary of State; namely, that the Commissioners of South Australia had been compelled to obtain the authority of Parliament for diverting to other objects a part of those funds arising from the sale of land, which, by the original Act, were made exclusively applicable to emigration. It is true some explanation of this has been attempted; but to what does it amount? Why, simply to this;—that to meet the necessary expenses of the first settlement of the colony, it was better to take a part of the funds derived from the sale of land, than to borrow money at so high an interest as 10 per cent. on the credit of its future revenue. No doubt it was so; and it is on that account I say Parliament ought not to lay down a strict and unvarying rule, which experience has shown that it is impossible, in all cases, to adhere to without great inconvenience; since even in South Australia it has been found that an application of a part of the funds derived from the sale of land, which the resolutions of the Honourable Member would, under no circumstances, permit, has afforded the only method of avoiding the necessity of saddling the colony with the burden of a loan on very high interest. I perceive the Honourable Member for Hull is listening to what I have now stated. If I am wrong, I shall be glad to hear from him an account of the revenue hitherto raised in the colony from any source but the sale of land, and therefore applicable, according to the original scheme, to its ordinary expenses. Something, no doubt, may have been raised by duties on importation; but I am much mistaken, if, as yet, funds have been levied, by these or any other taxes, nearly sufficient to meet the necessary expenses of the Government,—leaving these, therefore, inevitably to be defrayed either by loan, or by a partial diversion from their intended object of the funds obtained from the sales of land.

These considerations seem to me clearly to establish the inexpediency of laying down so strictly as the Honourable Member would recommend, the principle, that money obtained by the sale of land is to be reserved for the encouragement of emigration. But I think there is a still stronger objection to that part of the resolutions, in which it is proposed that for this purpose, the revenue derived from that source should be anticipated. I might leave this part of the case upon the admission of the Honourable Member for Bridport, who, though he supports the resolutions, has yet shown the inexpediency of adopting, without much more inquiry than has yet been bestowed upon the subject, the principle of anticipating the revenue in the manner which has been suggested. But I must add that I think the course proposed would be in the highest degree imprudent, because, if the number of emigrants were to be at once so much increased, there would be considerable danger that more might arrive at one time than it would be possible adequately to provide for. Should this occur, great distress and difficulty would be occasioned to the emigrants, of which the most exaggerated accounts would be circulated; and thus the disposition to emigrate, which is now so strong in this country, would receive a check from which it might not for many years recover. Those who remember the effect produced in discouraging emigration to Canada by the distress and suffering to which the emigrants were exposed in 1832, by the unfortunate breaking out of the cholera at Quebec and Montreal, and the panic which that disease created, will perceive how important it is that no similar interruption should occur in the progress of emigration to Australia. Bearing this in mind, I must believe that, upon further consideration, the Honourable Member, himself, will agree with me in thinking that it would be unwise to increase, in the manner he has proposed, the number of emigrants who are sent to Australia; and when he reflects that the present population of New South Wales being only about 100,000, has received, as my Right Honourable Friend has stated, in the last year, an addition, by emigration, of about 10,000 persons, or an increase of 10 per cent., he must concur with me in thinking that this is proceeding as fast as it is yet prudent to go. If we allow things to take their natural course, the labour of the emigrants already sent out will increase the resources of the colony, and thus, each year, the funds for emigration, and the means of receiving and providing for the emigrants on their arrival, will be enlarged; while, if we do not produce confusion and distress by attempting unduly to hasten the flow of the current, we may calculate that the emigrants will, in general, succeed and prosper, and that their letters to their friends and relations in this country will be the most effectual stimulants to further emigration. I must add, as another reason for abstaining from the attempt to increase emigration by means of a loan, instead of leaving the stream to become stronger and more rapid by degrees, that I believe, even now, the agent for emigration does not find the number of eligible candidates for emigration to New South Wales much to exceed that for which, with the funds at his disposal, he is enabled to provide the means of conveyance.

For these reasons, I trust the Honourable Member will not press the House to adopt the resolutions he has moved; and, if he should be inclined to do so, I hope, at least, he will make some change in the words as they at present stand. These words, I perceive, contain a declaration that land in the colonies should be sold at a "fixed, uniform, and sufficient price;" but the Honourable Member has not, in his speech, given us a single reason for establishing a rule which — at first sight, at least — appears so contrary to every principle of justice and of common sense, as that of affixing the same price to all land, however it may vary in fertility and in natural advantages. Why, I would ask, is this to be? One piece of land may possess the advantage of water frontage, which renders it far more valuable to the occupier than another; one allotment may have a much more productive soil than that which lies next to it. Surely, therefore, it is reasonable that there should be some difference in the price of lands, of which the comparative value is subject to such extreme variations. If one uniform and arbitrary price should be affixed to all land, whatever may be its quality, we should once more give rise to all those complaints and difficulties which arose under the old system of grants. I well remember how impossible it was, under that system, to give satisfaction to the parties to whom grants were made: each man thought that his neighbour's allotment was better than his own; and there was no end to the dissatisfaction that was created, and to the complaints, and applications to change one piece of land for another, which were continually pressed upon the attention both of the governors of the colonies, and of the Secretary of State. All these difficulties have now been effectually got rid of by the simple expedient of public sale and free competition; but they would all again recur, if we were to adopt the principle, recommended in the resolutions, of affixing one uniform and fixed price to all land, whatever might be its natural advantages.

In conclusion, I have only to repeat, that the resolutions which the Honourable Member has moved, are not called for by any practical necessity, and that, in their present shape, they are liable to serious objections. I trust, therefore, that he will agree with me, that it is better for the success of that policy which he has advocated, and for which I am not less sincerely anxious than himself, that he should be satisfied with the discussion which has taken place, without pressing his motion to a division, — which, I fear, would not look very well in our votes to-morrow.

SIR R. H. INGLIS. — The Right Honourable the Under Secretary for the Colonies has talked of clothing distant parts of the world with the laws, habits, and institutions of England, but he has omitted those two points which, in my estimation, are the most worthy the consideration of the Legislature of this country, because they are the only permanent bonds which can unite the colonies with the mother country. These two bonds are, the language and the religion of Great Britain,—without which, any other effort at union would be unsuccessful. This principle is applicable not only to Australia and the West Indies, but to every dependency of the British empire. It is applicable not only to those colonies where the language of the mother country is indigenous, but to those regions where the duty of inculcating the common language and common religion has been neglected. I have listened with great interest and attention to the speech of the Noble Lord who has just sat down, and I cannot but regret that the Noble Lord has wholly left unnoticed the observations which have fallen from the Honourable Member for Bridport, with respect to the grant made by his late Majesty George IV. to the Duke of York, — observations which I have heard with pain, and which ought not to be allowed to pass without comment, by those who are officially the protectors of the rights and prerogatives of the Crown. The great part of the speech of the Honourable Member for Sheffield went to the point that the prerogative of the Crown is to be superseded; and the Honourable Member for Bridport objected, not merely to the legitimate influence, but the lawful right, of the Crown to make that grant. Do these Honourable Members forget that, by law, the Crown was entitled to grant that which it did grant to the late Duke of York? That question has been decided; and I believe no doubt exists in the mind of any person, in or out of the profession, that the Crown had a perfect right to alienate its seignorial rights in the mines of North America. If that be the case, no Member of this House is justified in saying Parliament has a right to interfere in the matter. The only observation on the subject of general colonisation on which I think it necessary to trouble the House, is one which, I believe, was brought forward, ably and eloquently, both in this House and in his public writings, by my Right Honourable Friend Sir Wilmot Horton. No man ever bestowed more anxious and unwearied attention on the subject than my Right Honourable Friend. The general principle advocated by him was, that all emigration colonisation ought to be in the hands of the Government. In that proposition I entirely concurred; and, as the Duke of Wellington said on a different subject, that "this country can engage in no small war," I think that the colonisation of such a country as this ought to proceed from its own resources, and that we ought not to leave it to New Zealand commissioners here, or Australian commissioners there, or to some bubble company elsewhere, to send off the industrious, and in many cases too credulous, population of this country. The Government of the country ought to form their plans cautiously, and with a full sense, not only of what they owe to the people here, but also to the people elsewhere; and if we send out a constitution, at all, to the colonies, we ought to send out a miniature constitution of England. And, above all, we ought to send out the other blessings of England, great as they are. We ought to send out an adequate provision for religion, which has been greatly neglected in almost every enterprise that has ever been dispatched from England. I am not prepared to consent to enter on the Minutes of the House the resolutions of the Honourable Member, because the first resolution is a mere truism, and, as such, ought not to be entered upon our Journals; and the other involves a question which I think the House ought not be called upon, at present, to decide. I consider that the first, therefore, proves nothing, and that if we agree to the other, we may, hereafter, be charged with entering upon our minutes a resolution which we are not prepared to sustain.

Mr. C. BULLER. — I will occupy but a few moments of the time of the House in answering one or two matters (sufficiently irrelevant),—among them the Duke of York's debts, and other subjects,—which have been introduced into this debate. The Noble Lord has prolonged the debate, thinking, I suppose, that he has convicted me of an inaccuracy in a discussion which occurred three months ago. I then told the Noble Lord that the road from Quebec to New Brunswick was occasionally impassable. I used the word "now," and I should have said "in the spring;" for in the spring, at the breaking up of the winter, it is utterly impassable. Now, I misstated the time of the year. And thus, Sir, having refreshed my knowledge of the seasons, I assert that no mail can pass from Quebec to New Brunswick at the season when the roads are impassable; and if the Noble Lord dispute this point, it is one upon which we are decidedly at issue. The Noble Lord also says that I have given myself the airs of a traveller. I have given myself no such airs. I simply referred to a certain article in the constitution of the United States; and the Noble Lord argues, that if I be correct in my statement, it must be impossible to have local taxation in Australia, since it is found impracticable to have local taxation in the new States of North America. Now, travelling has taught me that the sole resources of those new states arise from local taxation. The Noble Lord says that the result is, that many public works are ill provided for; but I ask the Noble Lord, or any other person having an intimate knowledge of the colonies, whether, when compared with the new states, whatever may be the defects of the executive Government in those states, they are not better, in this respect, than any colony of this country, though such colony may be double the age of those new states? It was my intention to have made some observations on this important question; but at this late hour I will content myself with saying that I am glad to hear the language held by Ministers, and that they do not venture to deny the gross abuses which exist in the land grants and in the system of emigration into the colonies; indeed, the House generally has, by its silence, virtually admitted the truth of the charges, and has thus shown, in the best manner, its intention to take into its serious consideration these gross abuses. I hope the House will so take the matter into its serious consideration; and I did trust that her Majesty's Ministers would have given some assurance that they would establish the system of land grants on that permanent basis which legislation by the Imperial Parliament can, alone, secure, — for I believe, till this be done, no sound principle will ever be fixed upon; and that we shall continue to waste those mighty resources of this country and of the colonies, which the waste lands, if properly employed, would afford. This is a course most important to this country, as providing what this country requires,—namely, a vent for the surplus population; and to the colonies, as affording a remedy for the great want of every colony, — a permanent supply of working population. Therefore it is that I think it desirable that the House should pledge itself to such views, that my Right Honourable Friend the Under Secretary for the Colonies shall not feel himself at liberty to entertain any feeling in the matter to which the House is not a party. It is essential, also, that Ministers should not confine themselves to the mere expression of good intentions, but that they should apply to this subject that attention which the interests, as well of the labouring population at home, as of the colonies, so loudly demand.

Mr. SHAW. — I would suggest that surveys and inquiries should be conducted along the coast of Australia, with the view of applying steam communication for the connection of those districts adjacent to the coast in which it is most important to found settlements. I suggest this to the Government in the same spirit as the discussion has been carried on, — without any party feeling.

Mr. S. O'BRIEN.—The Noble Lord has said that there would be great difficulty in obtaining 10,000 emigrants to send to Australia. I can only observe, that in the district of Ireland with which I am connected, I believe that there would be no difficulty in annually obtaining that number of emigrants,— and those, individuals of good character, too. In the West of Ireland the people are nearly all in a state of starvation for want of employment, but they have no means of emigrating.

Mr. DARBY. — As emigration is going on to a great extent from Sussex, I wish to state my objections to these resolutions. In the speech of the Noble Lord I fully concur; and I object to the resolutions, because the first is a mere truism, and the second declares that the price of these lands shall be fixed at a uniform rate, — and how is it possible that this can be a fair rate? Either the good land will be sold for too little money, or the price of the inferior land will be too high. Again, how can we determine that a fixed proportion of the produce of these sales shall go for a fund to provide passage money? But if the expense be fluctuating expense for the survey of the land, how can we put by a fixed proportion of the money produced by the sale of lands for passage money? Then, again, as to the next resolution, it is declared, that "in order to derive the greatest possible advantage from this method of colonisation, it is essential that the permanence of the system should be secured by the Legislature, and that its administration should be intrusted to a distinct subordinate branch of the Colonial Department." What I understand the Honourable Gentleman to wish is, that the colonial branch of the Administration for this purpose shall be fixed, and not fluctuating: but I can see nothing in this resolution which will make this branch of the Colonial Office permanent and fixed, or secure to us that it shall not fluctuate as well as any other. The Honourable Member also said that this principle "should extend to all the colonies which may be suited to its operation;" but who are to judge as to which of the colonies its operations will be suitable to?

Mr. WARD. — I was aware, Sir, that, in bringing forward the motion, which has occupied so much of your time, one of the difficulties with which I should have to contend would be its novelty, and the startling nature of some of the propositions involved in it, to which few men become reconciled without a deeper examination of the subject than Members of this House in general have time to enter upon. From the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland, who perfectly understands the principle upon which the new system of colonisation rests, I differ, principally, as to the possibility of carrying it out without the aid of an Act of Parliament, — which I hold to be indispensable. The Noble Lord, indeed, disputes the necessity of loans; but I must beg to remind him that loans, in anticipation of the land sales, are just as much a part of the theory developed in the works upon which he has bestowed so high and just a eulogium, as any of those other parts which he himself adopts.

My Right Honourable Friend, the Under Secretary for the Colonies, has gratified me much by not attempting any defence of the old system, which I denounce. He admits its enormities, but says that they never can return. I wish I could think so, too; but the passage which, by an unfortunate lapsus linguæ, my Right Honourable Friend read from the despatch of Sir George Gipps, proves that colonial governors are just as much inclined, as ever, to keep a control over the land revenue, "as the only disposable fund upon which the colonial Executive can draw in an emergency." Now, it was this very feeling in Canada, that destroyed the sinews of our strength there, and led to the very abuses which my Right Honourable Friend has condemned; and, unless the colonial governors be limited to the application of a small fixed proportion of the land revenue in their casual demands, and compelled to employ the remainder in emigration, those abuses will be repeated, with the best intentions, no doubt, under the present Government, as under all those that have preceded it. This is the principal difference between us. With regard to auction, if he wish to produce the greatest possible amount of money from land, there is a great deal in what he has alleged. If he wish to produce the proper proportion between land and people in the colony, he will find auction decidedly inferior, as a system, to the fixed and uniform price. In what he has said respecting South Australia, he must allow me to set him right. There has been no change of principle or system there, since the Act of 1834 was passed; but as the commissioners (for the security of the emigrants) find it expedient to pay only one half of the passage money in advance, and have, consequently, one moiety of the emigration fund always idle upon their hands, for twelve months at a time, they took power, last Session, to make advances from the emigration fund to the revenue fund, from time to time, in order to avoid the necessity of borrowing money at 10 per cent. These advances, however, are repaid within the year, the commissioners regarding it as their most sacred duty to maintain inviolate the principle of applying to emigration the whole proceeds of the land sales, without deduction of any kind. Sir, I have already trespassed too largely upon the indulgence of the House, to weary it with any farther details, and shall only now add, that, if I had brought forward this question at an earlier period of the Session, I should not have shrunk from testing, by a division, the soundness of my principles; but, as I have admitted the impossibility of legislating in the matter, this year, I shall leave it, now, in the hands of the Go-rnment, — hoping that it will be so dealt th during the recess as to make it unecessary for me, or any other independent ember, again to take it up.

I shall, therefore, beg leave to withdraw y resolutions, and content myself, for e present, with the hope that they have en the means of bringing, for the first me, a most important subject fairly der the consideration of the House.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

The motion was then, by leave, withawn.

TONNAGE ON SLAVE VESSELS.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — I rise, Sir, to bring forward a motion, of which I have given notice, respecting the operation of the Act of last Session, for granting allowance on tonnage of slave vessels taken by her Majesty's ships, and condemned under the late treaty with Spain. It has been charged, in another place, against the officers commanding the British cruizers employed in the suppression of the slave trade, that they were influenced by motives of personal interest in their mode of conducting that service.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — I move, Sir, that the House be counted.

House counted accordingly; and, forty Members not being present, the House adjourned at a quarter after twelve o'clock.

EDUCATION (NATIONAL).

The MARQUESS of WESTMINSTER.—I beg leave to present a petition in favour of national education, — from the congregation of Unitarian Dissenters of the Presbyterian chapel, Crook's Lane, Chester. It has been asserted lately, that, in the same proportion as education is extended, crime also increases; but this I most distinctly contradict.

Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

VOTE BY BALLOT, TRIENNIAL PARLIAMENTS, AND A MORE EXTENDED SUFFRAGE.

The MARQUESS of WESTMINSTER. — I hold in my hand a petition from an individual named Charles Lee, in favour of the Ballot, triennial Parliaments, and a more extended suffrage. I have long entertained the same opinions as are expressed by the petitioner with respect to the Ballot, and every day serves but to strengthen them. I am not sure that the Ballot would be all-powerful; but I have made up my mind to this, — that, without it, there never can be an effectual stop put to intimidation and bribery. With regard to triennial Parliaments, I may say that they were so held formerly, and that such is the more constitutional practice. And as to an extension of the suffrage, there is a stronger reason for it, now, than existed formerly, in consequence of the 50*l.* clause in the Reform Bill.

Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

LONDON AND BLACKWALL COMMERCIAL RAILWAY BILL.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON. — I beg leave to present a petition from inhabitants, householders, occupiers of houses, and premises within the wards of Aldgate and Portsoken, in the city of London, against the Blackwall Railway Bill. This Bill has been read a first time, and is now lying for consideration on some future day; but, whatever general objection I may feel to interfere with Bills in such a stage, there are circumstances attending this, so extraordinary, that I consider it my duty to give notice that I shall oppose it on the second reading. I shall take that course on this principle: — About three years ago an Act of Parliament was obtained for purposes connected with this railway, containing certain conditions, — which conditions have not been performed by the company which was to carry the railway into execution; and they now come to ask your Lordships to permit them to depart from those conditions. One condition was, that the works of this railway should not be carried on within the city of London, westward of the Minories; and yet their proposition, at present, is to extend it to Fenchurch Street. There were also certain conditions stipulated as to the form and level of the railway,— every one of which has been broken through. I therefore think the House must relax the rule that it is generally understood should obtain, of not rejecting these Bills on the second reading, by refusing to pass the one now before you, even through that stage.

The MARQUESS of SALISBURY.— I regret that the Noble Duke should propose to depart from the usual course of proceeding in this House, and trust that your Lordships will suspend your judgment on this Bill until the second reading.

JAMAICA BILL.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — I beg to give notice, that, to-morrow, I shall move the second reading of the Jamaica Bill, as I understand there will be no opposition to my doing so; after which, counsel may be heard upon it, and the discussion may take place on Monday.

FOREIGN FRUIT.

The EARL of WINCHILSEA presented petitions against the importation of, unless upon payment of a duty sufficient for the protection of the home grower,— of owners and occupiers of orchards and fruit plantations, and others interested in the growth and sale of British fruit, of Sittingbourn and Faversham; Canterbury; and Wingham.— Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.

The EARL of WINCHILSEA presented petitions against any further grant of money for the support of, — of ministers chapelwardens, and congregation of Trinity Church, Leicester; and of freeholders of Peckham. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

PRISONS BILL.

The EARL of WINCHILSEA. — I beg leave to present a petition from members of the Protestant Association, in which the petitioners state, that they have learned with deep regret that, in the House of Commons, there is a Bill now pending for the better ordering of prisons, into which it has been proposed to introduce a clause for providing, under certain circumstances, Roman Catholic chaplains to the gaols, to be paid by the state. They believe that this Bill, if it were passed, would increase the power and serve the purposes of the Papists, and therefore pray your Lordships not to sanction it. I will only say, on the presentation of this petition, that if ever the measure to which the petitioners refer should come up to this House, it shall have my most decided opposition. The principle of paying Roman Catholic chaplains to gaols is directly contrary to the Protestant constitution of this country, as it would be making the teaching of Popery to be paid by the state. This, I repeat, is a direct violation of the principles which placed her Majesty on the throne; and if her Majesty should unhappily be so ill advised as to sanction such a measure, I am bold enough to contend that she would thereby forfeit the only title she has to hold the sceptre of these realms. I have now to present two petitions to the same effect,— from inhabitants of Piccadilly; and Blendworth.

Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

ROMAN CATHOLIC RELIEF ACT.

The EARL of WINCHILSEA presented a petition for repeal of, — of inhabitants of Blendworth. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CLERGY RESERVES IN CANADA.

The BISHOP of EXETER. — I wish to put a question or two to the Noble Marquess the Secretary for the Colonies. I first wish to know — is the Noble Marquess yet able to say whether the Bill respecting the clergy reserves, said to have been passed by the Legislature of Upper Canada, has reached this country? and whether it is such a Bill as her Majesty's Government will deem it right to lay on the table of the House, before it receives the Royal assent?

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — The Bill alluded to by the Right Reverend Prelate has arrived; but not in such a formal state as to admit of its being laid before Parliament. The Great Western is hourly expected; and I hope soon to be able to give the Right Reverend Prelate a more definite answer.

The BISHOP of EXETER. — I wish also to know from the Noble Marquess, whether any instructions have been sent out, by Government, to Sir George Arthur, on the subject of the clergy reserves, and generally for the support of religion and the extension of religious instruction in Upper Canada?

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — Such instructions have been sent out; and I believe they are included in the papers laid before the House, on the Rectory question; but if they are not, I will undertake that they shall be laid on the table.

BEER ACT.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I hold in my hand a petition in favour of the Beer Act in Part Repeal Bill,— from inhabitants of New Shoreham, in the county of Sussex. I have received a vast number of letters on this subject, from the owners of beer-houses. It is easy to receive such communications; but it is not so easy to answer them. Many of those persons complain of my having described them as dealers, without any capital, and whose furniture consisted of only a few chairs and broken mugs; and they invite me to visit their houses, and judge, for myself, whether they have not capital embarked in their business. Now, as it is impossible that I can comply with their request, I will only observe, that I never said, nor did I ever hear any one say, that there was no capital embarked in these beer-shops. What I did say was, that, from the very nature of the business, it could be, and was in many instances, carried on by persons with little or no capital, and that in one case a parish pauper had opened a beer-shop; but I do not mean to deny that there are, perhaps, thousands in the business who have embarked considerable capital in it.

The MARQUESS of WESTMINSTER. — I should be glad if the Noble and Learned Lord would go with me to some of these beer-shops, to judge for himself, whether or not they have capital, and how they are conducted.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I beg to apologise to my Noble Friend for not being able to avail myself of his invitation on the present occasion, any more than I could attend the great entertainment the other evening in Eaton Square.

Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL.

On moving the third reading of this Bill, —

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE said: — I beg leave to move two amendments to this Bill, by way of rider, to which I wish to call the attention of the Noble Duke (the Duke of Wellington); though I do not expect that they will be objected to. There is a prevalent practice in the city of London, which is technically called "forbearance," — that is, that when a bill is expired, it is renewed without a payment, and fresh advance; and the object of one of my amendments is to enable a person who forbears, to take the same rate of interest, as if there were a new advance made: my other suggestion is, to extend the operation of the Bill to other securities besides those already mentioned; — to warrants of goods, bills of lading, or other commercial securities.

LORD ASHBURTON. — I consider that the taking any amount of interest on goods in pledge would be very dangerous, and as totally distinct from the principle on which the other parts of the Bill have been introduced.

The Bill was then read a third time.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — I now beg leave to move the assertion of the words "warrants for goods," &c. This amendment has been pressed upon me by those who are well versed in commercial affairs; and, as warrants for goods represent property in transitu, I see no objection to the proposal.

LORD ASHBURTON. — Those who wish for a repeal of the whole of the usury laws, will, doubtless, agree to this amendment. Looking at the recent proceeding of the Bank, in raising the interest of money to 5½ per cent., I must say that I think that was an imprudent one; but that, in my opinion, does not justify the extension of the principle now proposed.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I would caution the Noble Marquess against the use of such general terms as "or other commercial securities." I am alarmed at the possible construction which a court of law might put on those words. Many things may be considered commercial securities, which the Legislature does not contemplate in the application of the principle of the Bill.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — Well; I have no objection to strike out the words "or other commercial securities."

On the next clause being read, allowing interest above 5 per cent. to parties holding Bills on forbearance, —

LORD WYNFORD said: — I, certainly, for one, cannot agree to this clause, for it would, virtually, amount to a repeal of the usury laws.

The LORD CHANCELLOR. — The

objection raised by my Noble and Learned Friend (Lord Wynford) is the same in effect as that which your Lordships discussed and decided on a former evening. The interest on the forbearance would be interest, as it were, on a new loan.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—I would suggest, that, as these clauses seem to be after-thoughts of the framers of the Bill, and as there appear to be grave differences of opinion amongst Noble and Learned Lords respecting their effect, it would be better to have them printed, and stand over for consideration till to-morrow. It is only due to justice, and to the interests of the persons who will be affected by the Bill, that your Lordships should not legislate upon such an important subject without a previous opportunity being given to consider the nature of the amendments proposed.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — I am perfectly willing to act upon the suggestion of the Noble and Learned Lord opposite.

The debate on amendments was accordingly adjourned till to-morrow. The Bill, as amended, to be printed; and the proposed amendments also to be printed.

HIGH SHERIFFS' EXPENSES BILL.

LORD COLBORNE. — I rise to move the second reading of the High Sheriffs' Expenses Bill. This measure originated in a Report of a committee of the House of Commons in 1830, on the expenses which fall on the high sheriff. I need not point out to your Lordships the fact, that the office of high sheriff is one of great importance and of high ambition; yet, instead of being regarded as an honour, it is looked on rather as a burden, so that every person tries to shuffle it off his shoulders. The object of this Bill is to regulate and reduce the expenses at present incurred by the high sheriffs, and throw them on the county rates. After some discussions, and two divisions, this Bill passed the other House. I know of two objections, only, that are to be started against this measure: one is, that the effect of it would be to lower the character and station of the high sheriff, and induce individuals of lower rank in life to take the office. That is an objection far more specious than true. What is the real fact? Why, that individuals, who, from their known standing in the country, and from their landed property, are nominated to the office, — deterred by the expenses attaching to it, — are induced to become officers of the militia, in order that they may obtain an exemption from the liability. The other objection is, that the expenses are to be charged on the county rates. I have all my life been as unwilling as any one can be to throw any charge on those rates; but as the expenses of the office of high sheriff will be reduced from 600*l.* or 800*l.* a-year, to 200*l.* or 300*l.*, I do think, as far as this Bill is concerned, that the principle of transferring the charge is good. I only ask your Lordships to give this measure a fair consideration. The office of high sheriff is a very arduous task imposed on a very useful class of society, — namely, the country gentlemen.

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — In pursuance of the notice I have given, I rise to move, That this Bill be read a second time this day six months. The very reason for which the Noble Baron thinks that the measure ought to pass into a law, is the reason on which I think it ought not, — that is, because the Bill was recommended by a committee of the House of Commons in 1830. My Noble Friend was a Member of the House of Commons at that time; and if he thought this so useful a measure, why did he not then introduce such a Bill? The very fact of the subject not having been taken up from that period to the present, shows that the Members of the House of Commons agree with me that this Bill is a useless one. The Noble Lord says that the high sheriff's office is an office of high honour. I admit it to be such; and the high sheriff must pay for honour, like everybody else. I do not want the expenses which fall on the high sheriffs, however, to be so high as to ruin them. The Noble Lord says that the high sheriffs, when appointed, use great interest to get off, and that the country gentlemen get, in that view, appointed militia officers, — by which proceeding they become exempt from serving the office. There is, I know, very great difficulty to get off the liability to serve; and I think you ought to prevent the being in the militia an exemption from the duty. One objection I have to the Bill is this, — that the high sheriff is to be paid for his javelin-men; that he is to appoint not more than twenty-two men and two trumpeters, nor less than ten javelin-men and one trumpeter; the clerk of the peace is to pay for these, and the justices are then bound to pay this sum out of the county rates. Now, I think it rather a new principle, that the clerk of the peace is to go into what expenses he shall think fit, and, then, that the magistrates are to be obliged to pay for them. I want to know why the high sheriff is not to pay for the distinction of his office, the same as every other person? If the guardians of the poor — if the overseers of the poor — if the jurymen — and if the grand jurymen — travel great distances to do their duty to their country, and do that duty cheerfully, why is the high sheriff to be relieved? The case amounts to no more than this, — that you are going to relieve the rich man from a certain expense, and put it on the county rates. Now, who pays the county rates? The landholder, the farmer, and the labourer — ay, the labourer too, for he pays his quota, and yet you are going to make him contribute towards this expense. I think, that if gentlemen in the country are of opinion that this expense ought not to be paid, they should be straightforward enough to come forward and say, "We cannot afford to pay this expense, and we decline to do so." In conclusion, I beg to move that this Bill be read a second time this day six months.

The EARL of WINCHILSEA. — As regards this Bill, I will only express my belief that it will be a most unpopular measure, because it will increase the county rates. The duties and expense of the office of high sheriff are only borne once, whilst the duties of jurymen and other onerous duties are borne frequently by other classes. On these grounds I shall support the amendment of my Noble Friend.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — In my opinion it would be hardly worth while to interfere with the appointment of high sheriff in the way that is proposed by this Bill; and as it would throw the burden of the expense on the poor, and relieve the pocket of the rich man, or of him who ought to be rich, I think it is better that it should not be passed. It is true that very often persons appear on the roll who ought not to be placed on it; and persons who ought to be on it are omitted. There should be greater care in nominating the persons eligible for the office. Those who are appointed, are quite repaid for the expense by the honour of serving the old constitutional office of high sheriff, which I should be sorry to see pass into disrepute, and which is an office that always gives a gentleman an opportunity of distinguishing himself by the manner in which he discharges his duty. With respect to the point referred to by the Noble Duke, — that of taking away the exemption from serving at present enjoyed by those who hold commissions in the militia, except when on actual duty, — I beg to say that I have a Bill now actually drawn up for that very object. As respects the present measure, I really do not think it would afford much relief; while it would, certainly, be clothed with a very invidious character.

LORD COLBORNE. — What has been said convinces me, not that the Bill is a bad one, but that I have no chance of carrying it. The Noble Earl says, "Why are not the sheriffs to pay their expenses the same as grand jurymen?" But the pinch of the case is this, — that a grand juryman pays but his own expenses, whereas the high sheriff is called on to pay the expenses of other people. I will not trouble your Lordships to divide on the question, but beg to withdraw the Bill.

The Bill was, accordingly, ordered to be read a second time this day six months.

AFFAIRS OF MALTA.

The EARL of RIPON. — I have, at length, an opportunity of drawing the attention of your Lordships to some matters connected with Malta, which appear to me of considerable importance. I regret, considerably, that circumstances occurred, beyond my control, which prevented my bringing this subject under your Lordships' consideration at the time I had selected for that purpose; and I should have been very unwilling, indeed, now, to press it on your Lordships' notice, if I did not feel that it related to matters which have always affected individuals, most severely, — which have inflicted on individuals great hardships, great injustice, great wrong, — if it did not involve principles which I think are of great moment as regards the constitutional relations of the Commissioners of Inquiry and the executive Government; and I have also to observe, as another reason why I feel myself bound to proceed with this motion, that there are matters connected with it which personally affect myself; and although the Noble Marquess (the Marquess of Normanby), when I gave notice on the subject, was pleased to characterise it as "an injudicious motion," I, nevertheless, feel that I should not be doing justice to the individuals to whose cases I refer, if I did not bring this question before your Lordships. In what respect it is injudicious, I, certainly, am at a loss to conceive. No doubt it is very injudicious in me to suspect the infallibility of the Maltese commissioners, and the propriety of the mode in which they have treated persons of very great consequence. It may be very presumptuous in me to ques tion the infallibility of the conduct of the Colonial Office, or of the Lords of the Treasury, for the way in which they have dealt with those persons: if so, I am very sorry for it. But I trust I shall be able to show to your Lordships that there are just grounds of complaint with respect to the conduct of the commissioners and of the Colonial Office in this instance. The matters which I have to lay before your Lordships relate to the removal from office of three individuals, — the Chief Justice, the Attorney General, and the Collector of Land Revenues. My object is to obtain certain information with respect to these cases, in order that your Lordships may see whether or not justice has been dealt out. Those gentlemen had held situations in Malta for different periods; the Chief Justice for twelve years and a half, the Attorney General for seven years, and the Collector of Land Revenues for something more than five years. They were, every one of them, cashiered without ever being heard in their defence; no questions were asked of them; no examinations were gone into, at which they were present, with respect to the nature of their duties or the manner in which they performed them — with respect to the effect, or the consequences, of so depriving them of their situations; they had no one opportunity of vindicating their conduct, and showing that the opinion of the commissioners was wrong. They never knew, and they do not know at this moment, who had been examined with respect to their conduct; they do not know whether anybody was examined; nothing has been communicated to them of what anybody has said of them. They have never been told whether the evidence given against them was given by some rival, by a personal enemy, or by a subordinate in an office; and they may, for aught they know, be the victims of persons stating things behind their backs, which they have never appeared in open day to confirm. The resolution taken by the commissioners, to recommend the removal of those gentlemen, was sent home without any communication being given to the parties concerned that such a recommendation had been given; and they were therefore deprived of the opportunity of meeting any impression to be made on the Noble Lord's mind, by any protest against that resolution. I think that here was a course of proceeding contrary to the first principles of justice, — a course never adopted towards any persons with respect to whose offices commissioners had theretofore been appointed to inquire. If, indeed, the duties of these commissioners had been to make inquiry respecting reports, abstract principles, and dilettanti views of society, it might be thought unnecessary to go into inquiries; but when the result of that investigation was, — to affect the present interests, the individual characters, and the personal feeling of individuals, I do say that they had a right to expect that they would, themselves, have been examined, and have been furnished with an opportunity of showing that they were not to be deprived of their situations, and have their prospects in life blasted, and have — (as has been the case in one instance) — positive ruin inflicted on them, without the opportunity of showing how unjust such a removal would be. I must confess that I am astonished that my Noble Friend, himself, was not struck with the unfairness of this course, before he came to a decision on the subject, and advised the Crown to adopt this recommendation. I wonder that my Noble Friend did not think it would have been just to ask those gentlemen whether they had anything to say in their own defence? But he did not do that: he adopted the recommendation of the commissioners, and cashiered those gentlemen; and although the commissioners did recommend, in the most unequivocal manner, that they should not be removed without having a fair remuneration and superannuation, my Noble Friend, in a moment of forgetfulness, removed them without either remuneration or superannuation. This recommendation is to be found in one of the earlier Reports, which lays down this general principle, —

> That it has been the usage in the colonial service to give compensation to persons whose offices have been abolished.

And they go on to say, —

> Unless a provision of that kind were made for such persons, we, ourselves, should be unwilling to recommend reductions which would cause so much suffering to individuals, and her Majesty's Government would perhaps be unwilling to adopt such recommendation.

My Noble Friend (Lord Glenelg) did partially adopt the recommendation of the commissioners: he transmitted the cases to the Lords of the Treasury; and he, no doubt, sincerely recommended to the Treasury to consider the situations of these gentlemen favourably: but my Noble Friend ought to have reflected; for he knows very well that the Treasury are governed by strict and inflexible rules, — my Noble Friend ought to have remembered that there is a robur et æs triplex round the bosoms of those occupants of Downing Street, which it is difficult to soften — or, — softening, — to bend. But I must say, I do wonder why my Noble Friend did not at once say, openly and fairly, to the Lords of the Treasury, "If you do not give these men compensation, I shall postpone acting upon the recommendations of the commissioners." This would have been fair to the public, and fair to the parties. But this course my Noble Friend did not follow. I think I have now shown that great harshness has been practised towards the gentlemen in question. They have been deprived of their offices without any previous intimation of such an intention being entertained, and without anything like an opportunity of stating their own view of the case, by way of explanation or defence. This is bad enough; but the harshness of which I complain does not end here. When these gentlemen came to England, they were obliged to fight their own battles — to go themselves to the Treasury, and represent their case; and everybody knows how hardly parties in such a situation are likely to be treated there, and how unlikely they are to obtain what they are entitled to. I contend that a grievous injury has been inflicted upon these gentlemen. I shall next proceed to state the principal circumstances of each case. The Attorney General and the Chief Justice of the island were both recommended to be removed, by virtue of two several Reports of the commissioners, dated respectively the 19th and 18th of April, 1828. But your Lordships will be surprised to learn that, in reality, no Reports, written at the period of those dates, are in existence, — the Reports which purport to be of those dates having been, in truth, framed and written at a subsequent period, and antedated for the purpose of giving a proper colour to the transaction. The following are, what I must think, the very peculiar circumstances of this affair. It seems that the real Reports reached the Colonial Office in the month of May, 1838, and immediately engaged the attention of my Noble Friend. My Noble Friend, in his despatch of November 10. 1838, says, —

> The result of much consideration was to convince me that the recommendations of the commissioners, as originally framed, could not be acted upon without some serious inconvenience.

This paragraph, I think, may give room for some little doubt as to the propriety of the recommendations upon which, according to the Secretary of State, it was thus inexpedient to act. It also absolves me from the Noble Marquess's charge of bringing forward this subject injudiciously. But the despatch goes on to say that my Noble Friend, in these circumstances, thought it advisable to wait until the commissioners came to England. Then my Noble Friend the Secretary of State, and my Noble and Learned Friend on the woolsack, in conjunction with the commissioners, proceeded to revise the original Reports, and to concoct an entirely new scheme. My Noble Friend states, —

> Various conferences were held between the commissioners and myself, assisted by the Lord Chancellor, whose judgment upon questions of this nature is, of course, entitled to the highest authority. . . . Having received a full statement of the difficulties which suggested themselves, the commissioners requested permission to withdraw their original Reports, with a view of making such amendments as, upon a consideration of the whole subject, should appear to them desirable.

After mature consideration, the commissioners returned their Reports to me in the form in which they now appear. The original dates are retained, and the amendments are not distinguished, nor am I aware that there was any sufficient motive why such a distinction should be made. I confess this does appear to me to be a very extraordinary proceeding indeed. This was confounding the relations of the executive Government and its commissioners. Why are commissioners appointed? And why is power of inquiring and of reporting given to them? Because the executive Government have not time, or have not opportunity or other means, to make the necessary inquiries. The Crown therefore steps in and delegates the necessary power to commissioners, whom it sends out to pursue the investigation on the spot. But what is the duty of the commissioners? They are bound to give the Crown the best of their judgment and suggestions upon the subjects submitted to them; they are bound to present to the Crown, not what the executive Government may please to concoct, but the deliberate result of their own free opinions. But if this were not the duty of commissioners, and if they were to be allowed to concoct their Reports so as to meet the views of the executive Government, what injury might be done, and what injustice on individuals? I do not say that my Noble Friend would permit or abet anything of that sort, — I only point out the tendency of such a practice; but I do say, and I say it with all respect, that the commissioners, in conjunction with my Noble Friend and the Noble and Learned Lord on the woolsack, appeared to forget, in these consultations of theirs, the relative situations which they held with respect to one another. But if they thus got hold of the Reports of these gentlemen, and then made them take them back and alter them to meet their own views, — then my Noble Friend opposite (Lord Glenelg), and my Noble and Learned Friend on the woolsack, surely made themselves responsible for the amendments, which, probably, they suggested on the original Reports. They are responsible, in fact, for the whole and for every part of the new Reports; and especially have they made themselves responsible for that part of the Report which respects the chief justiceship. To this I will now call your Lordships' attention, although it is the same part to which I took the liberty of calling attention, formerly; for at that time I did not know, or, at least, did not advert to, the remarkable circumstances which attended the making of this Report. This is what the Report says, after stating that an objection might be made to the abolition of the office of chief justice, inasmuch as the presence of an English lawyer, in an official measure, is a useful restraint upon the military government of the island, and imbues its legislation and administration with the free spirit of British institutions: —

> This objection to the measure is refuted by experience; for though, during some years, the chief legal offices have been filled by English lawyers, the island was not governed, before the accession of the present Governor, with the requisite regard to the reasonable wishes of the people.

Now, I wish to know upon what grounds the commissioners made that statement? Did they inquire into the subject before they made the Report? I have been a colleague of my Noble Friend; and though I am not called upon to defend other Governments, yet I am bound to defend myself; and I must say, I should like to know what my Noble Friend ever found in my administration of the affairs of Malta, which showed that I did not pay every requisite attention to the wishes of the people of the island. I protest against the statement as coming from these commissioners; — I protest against it as coming from my Noble Friend, who must have had proper knowledge of the real state of the case; — but, most of all, I protest against it as coming from the Noble and Learned Lord on the woolsack. For what could my Noble and Learned Friend know about it? It is impossible that he should have investigated the matter. I must say, therefore, that I am surprised and sorry that my Noble and Learned Friend should have sanctioned such a statement; and I defy him to prove it. The Report goes on, in all its own singular complacency, to contrast the results of the mode of administering the government of Malta which has been pursued under former governors, with the contrary effects which would have followed, had what they, themselves, now suggested, been adopted formerly; and among other things in which they contrast themselves with other persons, is mentioned that celebrated law of libel which my Noble Friend was so good as to introduce into the island. Now, I have looked into that law; and I do believe, that if I had my Noble Friend and my Noble and Learned Friend and the two commissioners in the Island of Malta, — if I were only half as acute as a pettifogging Maltese attorney, — I could convict them all of a libel under their own law, and shut them up in prison for six months.

LORD BROUGHAM. — For twelve months.

The EARL of RIPON. — I thought six months.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Where there is no defence, the punishment is six months; but if there be a defence, it is twelve months.

The EARL of RIPON. — I am afraid, then, that my Noble Friend (Lord Glenelg) and the Noble and Learned Lord would not escape with less than twelve months. At all events, it is quite clear that this loose way of effecting general changes, resting only upon vague statements from a couple of commissioners, is not the way in which public business ought to be done. But the commissioners recommend the abolition of the chief justiceship on the ground that the office is useless, — that it is very exorbitantly paid, while there is but little to do; — and they go further, and actually lay it down as a principle, that it is a sort of robbery of the Maltese bar, that one English judge should be allowed on the bench. This proposition I hold it to be quite impossible to maintain. But I would not have the bench exclusively filled by English judges: nor is it so, in fact; there always are several Maltese judges. It is true that, by excluding English judges, you may succeed in confining the Governor to make his selection of each judge from the small Maltese bar; but it is obvious that, limited as the business of such an island must be, its bar must be too confined a body to select judges from, at all times. They will become committed to and engaged in the petty party politics of the place; and there may be imagined many circumstances and situations of affairs in which, with such a taint upon him, a judge so chosen would be most unfit to administer justice. It is, therefore, an erroneous assumption, to say that no judge should be chosen, except from out of the Maltese bar. In another point of view, this will appear clearly. From the moment that Malta was first assigned to us by the peace of Paris, down to the present time, the whole efforts of this Government have been directed to improve the law of the place, — that law, which was, then, by far the most barbarous that I am acquainted with, — and to infuse into it the just principles of British jurisprudence. Incorporated, therefore, as the existing law of Malta is with our sytem, how can the commissioners expect that we shall be able to administer it, satisfactorily, without having an English lawyer on the bench? There are many others besides Maltese who frequent or inhabit the island, and come under the jurisdiction of the courts. There are crews of British vessels, — there are traders and merchants, and visitors for pleasure, and great numbers of English of all descriptions; — and I am convinced that the adoption of this principle of doing without an English judge will be found to be odious and impracticable, — and it appears to me extrordinary that any one should think otherwise. But, whatever may be the value of my opinion, there was one to whom this alteration did not occur, and I think that his opinion is worthy of every attention, — I mean the late judge, Sir John Richardson. He was a man of high honour and unimpeachable integrity; and it having happened to him to take a voyage to Malta for the benefit of his health, the Government asked him to take up the subject of the state of the law there. He did this for the space of two years, and made several valuable reports, — all of which showed that he had well considered the object of the introduction of the English law, and of ameliorating the Maltese law; but it never occurred to Sir John Richardson to suggest that there should be no English judge. The commissioners have done this; but I think Sir J. Richardson decidedly the better authority.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

But it seems the chief justiceship is held by these gentlemen to be useless. I wonder on whose evidence this was assumed? I am curious to know who was the wise man in Malta who gave the hint to the commissioners? They did not, I suppose, ask the opinion of Sir John Stoddart himself. Such an alteration ought not, however, to have been made, without calling upon that individual to state what he could on his own behalf. Was there nothing in the fact of his having been Chief Justice twelve years and a half, that made it likely he would be well qualified to give evidence on the state of the administration of justice? Nobody doubted his honour, nobody doubted his integrity; and therefore I should have thought it proper that the commissioners should have consulted him. But there was another who took much interest, in 1830, in conjunction with the authorities of Malta, in introducing ameliorations into the civil code; and the terms in which this person (the Secretary of State) conveyed his sense of the merits of Sir J. Stoddart are highly laudatory of the clearness and ability with which the subject of legal reform had been brought before him by Sir J. Stoddart. This was the opinion which he formed, as Secretary of State, of Sir J. Stoddart's merits. If it was well deserved, then I say that Sir J. Stoddart ought to have been consulted, — for in that case he possessed, above all men, the very qualifications which would have enabled him to render valuable assistance. But his advice they never condescended to ask; and whoever reads that Report will be struck with the cold harsh manner in which the commissioners speak of Sir J. Stoddart, as an incubus upon the exhausted revenues of Malta, as a usurper of the rights of the Maltese bar, and as one who ought not to be allowed to retain his situation. That is not the way in which public servants ought to be treated, if you wish the public service to be well done. On the 10th of November, 1838, my Noble Friend said that he was anxious that Sir J. Stoddart should be informed that, from the 31st of December following, his office of Chief Justice should cease and determine; and such was the first intimation he received of his removal. Yes; the first intimation he had was to the effect that, in six weeks from that time, he was to pack up his goods and be off, bag and baggage, as though he were a person from whom the Maltese ought to thank God they were to be relieved. I think this was very sharp practice. My Noble Friend opposite seems to have been petrified by the coldness of the commissioners; for all the explanation that he deigned to make to Sir J. Stoddart was in a dry notice, that the decision of the Government to abolish the office of chief justice after the 1st of January, 1839, had been arrived at solely on considerations of general policy. This was all that my Noble Friend opposite thought it necessary to say to the gentleman who was thus harshly and unexpectedly deprived of his office: this was all the attempt that was made to soothe his wounded feelings under so heavy a blow. Perhaps my Noble Friend is not acquainted with those lines of Spenser:—

Ah! little know'st thou, that hast not been tried,
What hell it is in sighing long to bide,
To pass long days that might be better spent,
To waste long nights in hopeless discontent;
To speed to-day, to be put back to-morrow,
To feed on hope, to pine in fear and sorrow;
To fret thy soul with crosses and with cares,
To eat thy heart with comfortless despairs;
To fawn, to crouch, to wait, to ride, to run,
To ask, to give, to want, to be undone!

I will now call your Lordships' attention to the abolition of an office which I, myself, created,—that of Attorney General. I incurred some blame for calling this office into existence. The commissioners assert that it was a sinecure; but that I confidently deny. I deny it upon the authority of the Attorney General himself; and I say that they were bound to listen to that authority; whereas the commissioners never asked him a single vivâ voce question with respect to his office. They did not even think of consulting the Governor, the Chief Justice, or any other of the great functionaries of the colony. In August, 1837, the gentleman who filled the office of Attorney General having suffered materially in his health from the climate, obtained leave of absence, and came to England. About the end of January, 1838, he reported himself as sufficiently recovered to be able to return to the discharge of his duties. My Noble Friend opposite, however, desired this gentleman not to go back, because it was probable that the commissioners would recommend the extinction of his office. But this command to remain in England bore very hard upon the Attorney General for another reason,—that during the time of his stay here, he would receive only half of his salary,—400*l.*, instead of 800*l.* At last, permission was given to this gentleman to go back, and he sailed in the month of April; the vessel which carried him to Malta leaving Portsmouth about the same day on which the vessel sailed from Malta that conveyed to my Noble Friend the recommendation to abolish the office in question. The first news that greeted the Attorney General on his arrival in Malta was, that the commissioners had written home to recommend the extinction of his office; and there he was left, wounded in his personal feelings, injured in his character, and with his professional prospects blasted. I know that there is not a respectable man in the island, who, if called to your Lordships' bar, would not say that this was really the case. I was induced to create this office upon the representations of Sir F. Ponsonby, who stated that he was constantly placed in the most difficult situations from the want of an English legal adviser, and declared, that if such an officer were not sent out, it would be impossible for him to administer the affairs of the colony in a satisfactory way. It would have been unseemly that the Lord Chief Justice should have discharged the duty of giving legal advice upon points which might afterwards come before him in his judicial capacity; and I therefore thought it necessary to appoint an Attorney General. Had this office been a sinecure, I might have bestowed it upon some one person out of many who would have been exceedingly obliged to me,—and no blame for so doing could have been imputed to me; but, knowing the importance of the office, I, instead of gratifying any personal wishes of my own, applied to my Noble and Learned Friend opposite, who then held the great seal, and begged him to recommend me a man well qualified to fill it. That is a pretty good proof that I did not think the office a sinecure; and the person recommended by my Noble Friend was one whom I did not know, and had never seen. Nobody has ever said that this gentleman was incompetent to do the duties of the office, or that he did not discharge them faithfully; but he was condemned without a hearing, on the bare assertion of the commissioners that the office he filled was a sinecure. On returning to Malta, and learning that they had recommended its abolition, this gentleman was kept, as it were, in a state of suspended animation for some months, uncertain what the decision of the Government at home would be. At last he came to England, in August, to learn what that decision was. Ministers had not yet made up their minds; but at length, on the 17th of October, he received a communication from the Secretary of State's Office, containing the warrant for his execution, as it might be termed, which was to be carried into effect on the 31st of the month. The grounds of the decision were never communicated to that gentleman, and he could not, therefore, enter on any defence at the Treasury. At last, Ministers took his case into consideration, and acquainted him that, on reviewing the nature of the office, and the other circumstances of the case, they had come to a resolution of granting him 300*l.* So here was a man who had abandoned his professional prospects, in this country, to accept an office which he ad held for seven years, without a suspi-ion that he was to be cashiered,—who was eemed to be sufficiently rewarded for loss f reputation, and injury to his feelings,— or he has suffered all these wrongs, — by sum of 300*l.* It is difficult, even, to dis-over from the letter, that the sum is to be 100*l.*; and I would really recommend the Lords of the Treasury, if they wish their neaning to be clearly known, in any fu-ure case of this kind that may occur, to write English.

I must now say a few words on the case of the island collector. I appointed a gen-tleman to that office in 1832. I knew that it was not an office that would re-quire great labour; but I knew that it would require good sense, honour, in-tegrity, firmness, and resolution, — and all those qualities the gentleman whom I appointed possessed. The commissioners, who seem to have taken as their rule of guidance a crotchetty notion that no En-glishman ought ever to be employed in the colony, recommended his removal; and accordingly this gentleman, whose name is Cumberland, was removed. Poor man! he had not much fortune to boast of. The loss of his office — for which he was not prepared by any previous timely intimation of the intention to remove him — went far to deprive him of the means of subsistence; but he was in some degree consoled by being told that he would have an excellent retired allowance. What, then, was his consternation, when he learned that the decision of the Treasury was, that he should be paid, — in full, — the paltry sum of 250*l.* — which was to be considered a superannuation allowance! That sum was expended in removing his family of five or six children to England; and this gentleman is now reduced to de-pend for subsistence on the assistance of his personal friends. This gentleman felt his case to be so hard, that he represented it to the Secretary of State; and from the manner in which he was received, he was induced to hope that that Noble Lord would interest himself in it, and procure him some permanent allowance. Months elapsed without anything being done, until, in November last, Mr. Cum-berland was told that the papers relating to his case were lost, at the Treasury! December and January passed; and at last, in February, my Noble Friend op-posite was, himself, cashiered, and, I be-lieve, also, without being examined.

Several NOBLE LORDS. — Hear, hear!

The EARL of RIPON. — Some dirty anonymous scribbler has insinuated that I have a personal motive in bringing this case forward; — I have no personal motive, my Lords, beyond an honest desire to see jus-tice done; — at the same time, I will not conceal from your Lordships that Mr. Cumberland is a connection of mine. I recommended that gentleman to make an application to the Chancellor of the Ex-chequer, and Mr. Cumberland accord-ingly addressed a letter to that Right Ho-nourable Gentleman, which I will take the liberty of reading to your Lordships: —

I entreat your personal consideration of my unhappy case, which has been before the Trea-sury for many months, whither it had been transmitted by the late Secretary of State for the Colonies, Lord Glenelg. I held a responsible situation under the Government at Malta, to which I was appointed by Lord Ripon in 1833; and having for then five years discharged the duties of the office, was deprived of it last year upon the recommendation of the Maltese Com-missioners, not upon ground affecting my cha-racter and conduct, but in order to give im-mediate effect to the general principle laid down by the commissioners, of employing native Maltese, and not Englishmen, in offices such as that which had been intrusted to me. The commis-sioners, however, accompanied their suggestion of my removal, by recommending that I should have an adequate superannuation. All, how-ever, that has been granted to me was a sum of 250*l.*, once for all, — the whole of which was ab-sorbed in the inevitable and ruinous expense of moving myself and family to England. I am now left with a wife and six young children utterly destitute, with all the horrors of poverty staring me in the face: I am, in fact, supported (and as a gentleman you will understand the pain I feel in avowing it) by the bounty of con-nections; but that is a resource which cannot last, and upon which I have no right to rely. I ap-peal, therefore, to your humanity, as well as justice; and if you will be kind enough to look into the circumstances of the case yourself, — and, above all, if you would permit me to give you any personal explanation upon the subject, — I am confident that you will feel that my case is one of hardship, if not of cruelty, as singular as it is undeserved. I feel that I have very imper-fectly stated my case; but I could not say more without intruding too long upon your time. At all events, I implore you to obtain for me some decision, — even if it be adverse.

Such is the affecting language in which this gentleman states his case. I may inform your Lordships that Mr. Cum-berland is the grandson of the gentleman of that name distinguished in the literary world, but whose labours did not enable him to leave his children independent. Mr. Cumberland entered the army at an very early age, and he had, for a short time, the honour of being aide-de-camp to the Illustrious Duke near me. Mr. Cumberland had the honour of standing by that great man's side at the assault of Badajoz, — one of the most splendid achievements which crowned his im-mortal career. Although compelled, by ill health, to quit that arduous situation, he returned to his regimental duties at the very earliest moment his health permitted. At the siege of Bayonne he had an opportunity of distinguishing himself — not, certainly, in a way to be very conspicuously noticed; but he behaved most gallantly when in command of a picquet of guards who opposed the first resistance to a sortie made from Bayonne, at a time when a detachment of British troops under General Stopford was exposed to great danger in consequence of a failure to carry a bridge. Such has been the conduct of this gentleman, who is reduced to poverty by the recommendation of the commissioners. Another misfortune has also fallen upon him, which is not unfrequently contingent on such circumstances, — he has had born to him, nearly as fast as possible, six children. Well; Mr. Cumberland returned to England — he sought to obtain from the Chancellor of the Exchequer a personal interview. That interview was not, however, afforded to him. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was unwilling to be hampered with the case; nay, more, something or other occurred, which prevented him from even sending an answer to Mr. Cumberland's application. He did, however, something for Mr. Cumberland; for, after the lapse of some time, the Treasury thought that the case was a hard one, and gave Mr. Cumberland, as a superannuation, 100*l*. They admitted that the sum of 250*l*. was useless as a superannuation, — it having been absorbed in the expense of bringing his family home; so that, for these five years of public service, having been dismissed not for any misconduct, — not at his own request, — not upon any charge preferred against him, — he has the comfort of endeavouring to live, or rather to starve, upon the interest of 100*l*. This is melancholy treatment for any gentleman to experience; and such treatment as Mr. Cumberland, after his services, ought not to have been exposed to. It would have been only fair to Mr. Cumberland that the Secretary of State should have provided for him, before his removal from his office was carried into execution, such a compensation as would have relieved him from the painful situation in which he is now placed. Now, I thought the case of Mr. Cumberland so hard, that I wrote an official letter to the Noble Marquess opposite, the Secretary of State for the Colonies. In that letter I recapitulated to my Noble Friend, as briefly as possible, all the circumstances connected with it. I invited his personal attention to them; and requested him, on public grounds as well as on private ones, to see whether something more could not be done for this unfortunate gentleman; and to consider whether the recommendation of the commissioners could not be more effectually carried into execution on his behalf? I have no reason to find fault with the course pursued by my Noble Friend opposite in this affair. I believe that my Noble Friend has, personally, a friendly feeling towards Mr. Cumberland; but the case was substantially decided before he came into office. I have no doubt that my Noble Friend did make a representation to the Treasury on the subject. That representation, however, was not successful. On the 9th of April last, the Treasury wrote a letter to the Noble Marquess opposite, which was subsequently communicated to me, declining to do anything more for Mr. Cumberland, and using, at the same time, such expressions which I consider as consummating the measure of gross injustice with which that gentleman has been treated.

You will also further observe to his Lordship that Mr. Cumberland's removal from the office in which he had been placed at Malta had been recommended by the Commissioners of Inquiry on the express ground of notorious and admitted inefficiency and incompetency for the performance of the duties of it; and the adoption of that recommendation by Lord Glenelg had, as it appeared to my Lords, evinced his Lordship's assent to the grounds on which it was submitted.

The Lords of the Treasury added, that for these reasons, they could not grant any further extension of the gratuities which had been already assigned to Mr. Cumberland.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Who signed the letter?

The EARL of RIPON. — It is signed by the pro-secretary. Now, at the eleventh hour, to come out with a statement of this kind against a gentleman who had never been charged with inefficiency and incompetency, and who had never been either examined or heard on such a charge, is, in my opinion, an unprecedented act of injustice. The Treasury refused to do justice to Mr. Cumberland upon that statement, which alleged a very different ground from that whereon the commissioners recommended, and on which my Noble Friend (Lord Glenelg) authorised, his removal. If the commissioners should undertake — and I have no reason to believe that they would undertake — to charge Mr. Cumberland with inefficiency and incompetency, I would, on that gentleman's behalf, affirm, unhesitatingly, that there is no foundation whatever for such a charge. With your Lordships' permission, I will read the terms in which the commissioners recommended the bolition of Mr. Cumberland's office. I xperienced some difficulty in finding that ecommendation, as it is contained in a leport relating to another office. It is hus expressed, and I will read all that he commissioners wrote respecting it: —

As nearly the fourth part of the public revenues of Malta is derived from the Government lands, it is obviously very important that the office of collector should be efficiently discharged; and it appears to us, that from his necessary ignorance of the language of the country, and of the details of the management of landed property, scarcely any Englishman would be competent to discharge it.

Now, that is clearly no charge against Mr. Cumberland; it is a general reflection levelled against all Englishmen — and a very absurd one too. It would be ridiculous to suppose that my Noble Friend the Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests would refuse to appoint a gentleman to the situation of collector of the rents of the Crown in Yorkshire, simply because he might be ignorant of the Yorkshire dialect, or, at least, not as well acquainted with the language of its peasantry as I am, who happen to be a Yorkshireman. I verily believe, that when my Noble Friend appointed, a few days ago, a young gentleman to collect the rents of the Crown in Wales, he never inquired whether that gentleman could talk Welch, or whether he was well acquainted with the details of Welch agriculture. And yet, because Mr. Cumberland cannot talk that barbaro-Arabico-Italico jargon which is jabbered in Malta, he is to be deemed incompetent for his office! But the Report proceeds: —

We likewise think that the present salary of the collector is higher than is requisite for obtaining the services of a perfectly competent Maltese functionary. We therefore recommend that Mr. Cumberland be immediately superannuated.

Now, I would ask the House to consider whether the commissioners could have recommended that Mr. Cumberland should have a retired allowance and a superannuation, if they had deemed him incompetent to the discharge of the duties of his office? If they had deemed him incompetent, they would have said, "Give Mr. Cumberland nothing." But this they did not say, and therefore their language ought not to be construed as insinuating that he was incompetent. I boldly assert, that if the commissioners were at this moment standing before me, they would tell me that they never intended to cast any reflection upon the competency of the mode in which Mr. Cumberland discharged the duties of his office. I complain, however, of this Treasury letter on another account; — it is a recorded bar against Mr. Cumberland's future employment in any capacity in the public service. If Mr. Cumberland should ask for it, the Noble Marquess opposite would say, and would be entitled to say, "I am sorry for your case. I feel all its hardship; but I cannot fly in the face of the Treasury Report. You have been dismissed once from your situation on account of notorious incompetency. What a clamour will be raised against me in the House of Commons, if I should venture to restore you to it after such a declaration! I am sorry, I repeat, for your case; but I cannot do anything to relieve it." So that not only is Mr. Cumberland placed, by this Treasury letter, in a situation of great distress, but he is also deprived of all chance of obtaining, hereafter, a situation in the public service. I will not detain your Lordships with any further observations on this case. It is enough for me to repeat, that this unfortunate gentleman was removed from his office without being examined or heard in his defence; that no money was lost — that no job was encouraged — that no delay was occasioned by him; — that no circumstance was alleged against him in the discharge of the functions of his office. Even now he does not know who was examined against him. He knows that he was not examined, himself. He knows that the Governor of Malta was not examined; for that officer would have gladly borne his testimony to his zeal and competency. He knows that the chief secretary was not examined; for the chief secretary would also have borne testimony to the same effect. He knows that the Auditor General was not examined; for he, too, would have spoken to his competency. If Mr. Cumberland had been incompetent, that officer, at least, must have known the fact, as being the person best qualified to decide how Mr. Cumberland had discharged the functions of his office. I therefore say that it is impossible to impute anything to Mr. Cumberland which would have justified his removal from office without a superannuation. The upshot of these proceedings is, that he has been calumniated without being heard in reply; that he has been condemned without proof; and that he has been ruined without redress. I am well aware that this is a case, in which the House cannot formally interfere; but, perhaps, as a matter of admonition, what I have said this night may not be deemed unworthy of attention. I hope that it may teach commissioners, in future, to examine well before they report; and those who are intrusted with the executive Government to consider that they may not be doing justice in carrying blindly and carelessly into execution the recommendations of their commissioners, and in confirming the injustice to individuals which their recommendations may be calculated to inflict. The motion with which I beg to conclude, is for the production of the evidence taken in the cases of the Chief Justice, the Attorney General, and the Collector of Inland Revenues in the Island of Malta: Also,

Copy of any Report of the Commissioners upon the case of the Collector of Inland Revenues, subsequent to the Report of January (or February), 1838: Also,

Copy of a letter from the Treasury to the Colonial Office, of the 9th of April, 1839, respecting Mr. Cumberland's case: And, also, Memorial of the Attorney General to the Treasury, dated the 10th of December, 1838.

LORD GLENELG.—I am anxious to offer a few considerations to your Lordships on the speech of my Noble Friend. In that speech, my Noble Friend has passed animadversions on the conduct of the Government—on the conduct of the Maltese commissioners—on the conduct of the Colonial Office—on the conduct of the Treasury. Entering, as I do, into the feelings of my Noble Friend, on certain parts of the subject, I am not surprised at the warmth with which my Noble Friend has expressed himself in reference to some of his topics. But, in the very outset, I beg leave to enter my protest against one species of doctrine which my Noble Friend has adopted, because I think that it is inconsistent with what are usually termed constitutional principles, and with the ordinary experience of official life. I am alluding to my Noble Friend's assumption that, when an office is abolished, such abolition amounts to a cashiering of the officer,—fixing upon him a rebuke and a reproach, and levying on him a penalty as for some criminal conduct, or at least for misconduct. I am well aware that my Noble Friend has not made that assertion in so many express words; but throughout his speech he has spoken of these officers as being "cashiered," and has taken it for granted that, because they have been dismissed, they have been condemned in the eyes of the whole country. Now, that, I maintain, is an untenable proposition; and I appeal to my Noble Friend, whether he ever admitted it whilst he, himself, was in possession of office? I allude more particularly to the report made by the commission issued by my Noble Friend to inquire into the revenue offices in Ireland, and to the offices which my Noble Friend abolished in consequence of that Report.

The EARL of RIPON.—The holders of all the offices then abolished were examined.

LORD GLENELG.—That is a different question, to which, hereafter, I shall have occasion to advert. Certain offices, in consequence of the Report of that commission, were abolished in Ireland, and the holders of them lost their places; but it never was acknowledged as a principle, that a stigma was thereby affixed upon their characters. But I must state further, that there were two questions blended together in my Noble Friend's speech, which ought always to be kept separate;—the first was the abolition of the office; and the next, the compensation granted to the loser of it. I have always maintained that, where, for a public purpose, a man is deprived of an office, it is the duty of Government, on every account, to be liberal in their compensation to such a person. That is a principle which, I contend, rests not less on grounds of public economy, than on grounds of private justice and humanity. The abolition of an office is not intended as a punishment for past abuses, but as a step to prospective improvement. Now, with respect to Mr. Cumberland. I feel for this gentleman's case. I did, I believe, induce the Treasury to reconsider his claim. My Noble Friend has alleged that a great deal of time was wasted in the consideration of his (Mr. Cumberland's) claim, owing to the loss of his papers. That was owing to the extreme illness of the Under Secretary, which incapacitated him, for some time, for the discharge of business. However, I induced the Treasury to reconsider Mr. Cumberland's claim. The last decision upon it was come to, since my relinquishment of office. I regret that the Treasury were not more liberal in the compensation which they awarded; and I have the less reluctance to make that avowal in my place in Parliament, because I have made it already when in office. My Noble Friend has also rebuked me, because I did not say to the Treasury, "Unless you agree to the compensation which I think fit for Mr. Cumberland, I will postpone the abolition of his office." Now, if my Noble Friend had never been in office, I should have felt some surprise at hearing him use such language; but my surprise is almost beyond expression, when I hear such lan-age proceed from him, after his long official experience. In all such cases, the first estion to be considered is, "Ought the ice to be abolished on public grounds?" iat is a very simple question. Assuming at it ought to be abolished on public ounds, what claim can I, or any man in y place, put in to the Treasury in this rm:—"I will not abolish it, unless you eet me on my own terms on the question compensation?" With all deference to y Noble Friend, I must say that that is preposterous proposition, which cannot ear consideration for a single moment, id on which no public man has ever yet ted in this country. With respect to Ir. Cumberland, it is a painful task to iter into a consideration of his claims, any one who regrets, as I do, his preent situation. But that has now become necessary task, as my Noble Friend has sserted that he (Mr. Cumberland) was emoved without any previous communicaon, and without being called upon to dend his conduct. The case of Mr. Cumerland was this:—His situation was that f collector of the land revenues in the sland of Malta, which amount to 30,000*l.* -year, or very near it. Those revenues re collected from a multitude of small teants, scattered throughout the country. t is essential to the proper discharge of he duties of the office, that the officer who oes among them for that purpose should e acquainted with the language spoken y the Maltese. It is further essential hat he should know something of the abits and manners of that people. Moreover, it is also essential that he should now something of the tenure of land in hat island, and of the mode in which it is enerally let. Would any of your Lordships, I would ask, who have large property in Ireland, think of sending to that country,—to collect the rents due from a scattered tenantry,—a foreigner, unacquainted with their language, their tenures, and their mode of letting and cultivating land? I am sure that your Lordships would not. Well, Mr. Cumberland accepted this office, and went to Malta. He found the duties of it executed there by a gentleman who was his deputy, who did understand the language, the habits, and the laws of the people, and who was, practically, the collector. This office, then,—one of 700*l.* a-year,—was performed by deputy. It was generally known that the office was executed by the deputy. In the Colonial Office there is a letter addressed by the commissioners to me, in which they state that they have communicated to Mr. Cumberland their intention to recommend the abolition of his office, and that the manner in which he received the proposition seemed to them to furnish a claim for additional compensation.

The EARL of RIPON.—They promised him ample compensation.

LORD GLENELG.—There can, at all events, be no doubt of the fact that Mr. Cumberland was perfectly cognizant of the intention to abolish his office. The statement of the commissioners is decisive upon that point; and Mr. Cumberland presented no remonstrance on the subject. It has been alleged by my Noble Friend, that the only reason why the commissioners recommended the abolition of this office was, that Mr. Cumberland was an Englishman. This was not so. The fact was, the office was a sinecure—the person holding it not being able to fulfil its duties, which were actually performed by deputy: and that was the reason, and I conceive it was a sufficient reason, for abolishing the office. With respect to the Chief Justice and the Attorney General, it is not only enough to justify the abolition of an office that it is pronounced to be a sinecure, and absolutely useless,—it is sufficient to justify its abolition or consolidation, if the duties can be performed as efficiently and more economically. The question of compensation rested mainly and entirely with the Treasury; it was considered after his retirement from office. Certainly, my intention was, that both those officers should be recalled into the service of the Crown as soon as circumstances might permit; and the Attorney General has been offered a situation of equal emolument, though not in so favourable a climate; and I believe it is also in contemplation to give some situation to the Chief Justice. The commissioners maintained that the duty performed by seven judges, including the Chief Justice, in Malta, could be discharged by six judges; and they recommended that a change should take place, the effect of which would be to relieve the revenue of Malta of a large salary of 1600*l.* received by the Chief Justice,—an income entirely disproportionate to the salaries of the Maltese judges, who receive only between 400*l.* and 500*l.* a-year. They recommended that the Chief Justice should be removed, because the other six judges, with very inferior salaries, could satisfactorily perform the whole of the duty. This arrangement, which was adopted on the recommendation of the commissioners, has now been in operation nearly six months;—the Chief Justice having been removed, and the Attorney General having also been deprived of his office. It is no longer, therefore, matter of conjecture, speculation, or argument, what would be the effect of the abolition of those offices. We can already appeal to the result, which has been perfectly satisfactory, and exactly what the commissioners anticipated. Among the papers which have been laid on your Lordships' table, to-day, is a letter from the Governor of Malta, dated the 7th of May, in which he states that the new system is working remarkably well; that the business never was conducted in a more efficient manner; and that, altogether, the change is most satisfactory. There are no complaints of this change from the people of Malta; the only complaint is from those who have lost their offices, who are, naturally enough, anxious to make out as strong a claim for compensation as they can. I am not called on to prove that the commissioners are correct in the conclusions or anticipations they have formed; the result has justified them: I have, therefore, the strong ground of experience on which to rest; and there I am satisfied to leave the question. My Noble Friend has referred to a despatch of mine, addressed to the commissioners, in a manner which seems to indicate that I ought to be held responsible for the whole of their Report. So far from exercising any influence on the commissioners with respect to their opinions, I merely said I was prepared to carry into effect their main recommendation as to the abolition of the offices; but that it was impossible to accede to some of the minor details, which I conceived it would be possible to arrange in a more satisfactory manner. Feeling perfectly exempt from the possibility of any reflection attaching to me on the subject, I certainly do not consider myself at all affected by the observations of my Noble Friend. But I protest strongly against the grave conclusion which my Noble Friend has drawn, that I am responsible for the Report. The commissioners, alone, are responsible for its words, as well as its matter. I have also been charged with having used the term "misgovernment," as applied to the Island of Malta.

The EARL of RIPON. — Not by me.

LORD GLENELG. — No; but by others. I did not mean to apply that word to the Government at home. Whatever may be my opinion as to the course which affairs have taken in Malta, I admit that the wishes of the people of the island did not assume such a shape as to call for much attention from this country till about 1830. Still there were circumstances in the condition of Malta, the continuance of which, up to that period, I can by no means consider creditable to those by whom it could have been prevented. I feel that this is not immediately connected with the subject under consideration; but, as my opinions were alluded to on a former occasion, I deem it, so far, necessary to put myself right with your Lordships; and I am ready, at any time, to recur to the matter. Reverting to the question before the House, the Attorney General, in point of fact, has not been in Malta for nearly two years. He left in August, 1837, and no inconvenience has followed from his absence; — that proves that his presence is not absolutely necessary. When that officer was in England, I thought it right to inform him that the commissioners intended to recommend the abolition of his office; and his impression was, that, unless English law were to be transferred to Malta, the office of Attorney General might be dispensed with. It was perfectly competent for him to present a remonstrance against the change; but he took no such step. The Attorney General returned to Malta, and received from the Governor his full salary, although his office had been recommended to be abolished. He afterwards came to this country, his office was abolished, and he claimed compensation. I confess I do not concur in the principle, which is now laid down, for the first time, that when an office is to be abolished, the person holding it ought, himself, first to be consulted as to its extinction. The Irish Revenue Commission, to which I have already alluded, and which recommended very general abolition of offices in the various departments of Stamps, Customs, and Excise, examined the different officers as to the nature and extent of their duties; but never as to the propriety of abolishing their offices. So much to the contrary, that they, for the first time, heard of its being intended to abolish their offices when that course had actually been determined on. Although the Chief Justice of Malta was informed that there was an intention to abolish his office, and though there did not exist any objection to hear what reasons he could urge against that measure, yet the examination of the Chief Justice was limited to the nature and extent of his duties, and did not at all go to the question of the abolition of his office. An occasion certainly did arise, which led to a variety of questions being put to the Chief Justice, and as much information was elicited from him as if the examination had taken place at a later period.

There is another case to which I wish to call the attention of the House; and hat is, the removal of Judge Burton from he Cape, when his office was abolished; and I beg it to be observed, that there was this difference between the positions in which the Chief Justice of Malta and the Judge at the Cape were placed, — the one (Sir John Stoddart) held his office during pleasure, and Judge Burton was appointed, by patent, during good behaviour. It is true that, even though the former held only during pleasure, the idea of his dismissal otherwise than for misconduct never, for a moment, was entertained. It being considered by the Government that three judges at the Cape would do the business quite as well as four, the office held by Judge Burton was abolished, and arrangements were made for appointing him to a seat on the bench in Australia. I believe that it is intended to make an offer of the same kind to Sir John Stoddart. But it is quite certain that Judge Burton's office was abolished without consulting him, and his removal was a matter against which he strenuously remonstrated. My Noble Friend has dwelt at some length upon the importance of introducing into Malta a system of law founded as much as possible upon English law. It will be in the recollection of the House, that Sir Thomas Maitland made arrangements for that purpose, and courts were established in Malta which proceeded upon maxims and principles of English jurisprudence.

It was shown by Sir John Stoddart, or at least strenuously contended by him, that for the effectual carrying out of this design, the presence of an English lawyer was of the very highest importance. He stated, and with perfect justice, that Sir Thomas Maitland had done much to elevate the character of the judges in Malta. They had been previously remunerated principally by fees, and they held their situations during pleasure: he abolished fees, and he established the independence of the judges: thus were their venalty and consequent degradation put an end to. In addition to this, Sir Thomas Maitland appointed a President of the Council; but then he was a Maltese lawyer. The further reforms effected were the abolition of torture, of sanctuaries, an order for the vivâ voce examination of witnesses, the establishment of savings banks, — the independence of the judges I have already mentioned, — and to these reforms I have only to add the abolition of the personal immunities enjoyed by the priests. But all these changes might have been accomplished without the aid of any very profound lawyer. Any educated gentleman knew enough of the principles of British jurisprudence to understand the value of such reforms, and it required no practical acquaintance with the law to work them out. After all, however, the great question is,—By what law should Malta be governed? My Noble Friend must agree with me,— as, doubtless, the House generally will agree, — that the great principles upon which justice is administered in this country, should be made to enter as much as possible into the whole fabric of Maltese law; but Sir John Stoddart contended that the English law itself, in its present state, should forthwith be made the basis of a new code for the government of the Maltese. My Noble Friend would, surely, not approve of that? My Noble Friend will agree with me, that, however advantageous it might prove for generations yet unborn, yet for the present race such a design must be regarded as perfectly hopeless. The code of France, now adopted by many nations of the Continent, was resorted to for Malta, and the project of Sir John Stoddart was rejected; the trial by jury was introduced; a law for that purpose was prepared by Sir John Stoddart, which it became necessary to follow up with half a dozen others to explain and amend it. A commission was then appointed, on which there were two Italian lawyers, together with Sir John Stoddart,—and the disputes between them were extended to a most extraordinary length. The first of these disputes arose out of the question mooted, — as to the language in which the code was to be drawn up? The consequence of all this was, that another commission was appointed, composed exclusively of Maltese lawyers: but, on the whole, I am enabled to say, that the general result has been highly satisfactory; and I feel a full confidence that the administration of justice may proceed in Malta in a manner very advantageous to the population of that island, without the expense of keeping two English lawyers there at great salaries. I think I am also entitled to add, that the legal appointments fully justify themselves.

The LORD CHANCELLOR. — I feel bound to trouble your Lordships with a few observations before this matter is disposed of. A charge has been brought against me, as I understand, of having been a party to, if not the author of, some censure against my Noble Friend's (the Earl of Ripon's) colonial administration. I can assure my Noble Friend, that as to all the acts of my life, there is no charge of which I am so entirely innocent. It rests entirely upon some communications which I had with the Maltese commissioners when they came over here. I will call my Noble Friend's attention to the circumstances that occurred; and it will be seen that never was there such a jumping at a conclusion as in the charge now brought against me. The result of much consideration convinced me that all the recommendations of the commissioners could not be acted upon without serious inconvenience. Various conferences took place between the commissioners and myself; and, having discussed the difficulties that suggested themselves in the matter, permission was requested to withdraw the original Report, with a view to make such amendments as, upon reconsideration, should appear desirable. That original Report my Noble Friend has never seen, and the renewed Report I have not yet seen. I was directed to take the Report of the commissioners into consideration, and I did so; some parts of it I approved of—other parts I did not approve of. This was all I had to do with the matter; and this is the only ground upon which I can be supposed to be the author of anything that may seem to reflect upon the colonial administration of my Noble Friend. With respect to the abolition of the offices of Chief Justice and Attorney General, I beg to say, that I do not shrink from any part of the responsibility which attaches to advising that step. I am decidedly of opinion that those offices should not be continued. Now, let your Lordships see what are the services which have been rendered. On looking over the Report, I find it stated what is the nature of those offices—what are the services rendered—and what the remuneration which the parties, who have filled these offices, have received. The Chief Justice holds five judicial offices of very high sounding titles. He is "President of the Board of Appeal," "Senior Member of the Supreme Court," "First Commissioner of the Court of Special Commissioners," "Judge of the Vice Admiralty Court," and "Member of the Court of Piracy." The Court of Special Commissioners is the only criminal jurisdiction, and in that the average number of indictments per annum is four; as Judge of the Vice Admiralty Court, he had no cases to try for six years; as a Member of the Court of Piracy, he had no cases for five years;—so that, with the exception of a few indictments, the business of the last three out of the five judicial situations amounts to nothing. The other two are not exactly of that character. As President of the Court of Appeal, and Senior Member of the Supreme Court, it appears that, in the course of one year, the Chief Justice sat 115 times—not days, because such sittings were only three hours each, which, according to the usual estimate of labour, is only half a day. The result is, that those two offices together, which comprehend the whole of the the duties of the Chief Justice of Malta, require but 57½ days of judicial labour. It cannot be said, certainly, that that amount constitutes a sinecure; but when we found that learned judge receiving, for that amount of labour, 1600*l.* a-year, whilst the best paid native judges received but 400*l.*, it was felt that the inhabitants of Malta ought not to be called upon to pay so large a sum without some equivalent and adequate advantage. The Attorney General had, also, 800*l.* a-year,—a large salary, considering the duties he had to perform. They were of three classes; namely, to assist the Governor and council in making ordinances and framing proclamations; to advise the Government of Malta upon any questions of law that might arise; and, as Attorney General, to represent the Government of Malta in all proceedings in the courts in which it was necessary for the Government to appear. Well; the number of law ordinances, proclamations, and everything else which came under the eye of the Attorney General, including things which were quite matters of course, was twenty-four in six years. The two other classes of duties he could not perform;—he could not advise upon matters of law, being ignorant of the law; and he could not appear as the advocate of the Government in cases in which they were concerned, as those cases were conducted in a language which he did not speak. I say nothing against the individuals. It is not upon that ground that I have formed the opinion which I have expressed upon the subject of these offices. The Report also states that the Attorney General was absent from the island for eight months. So, well he might be, for he would have had nothing to do had he been there all the time. His office, then, was an absolute sinecure; the Chief Justice had very little to do in his; and why should the people of Malta be called upon to pay 2400*l.* for what is now more efficiently done for 1000*l.* less? I merely rose for the purpose of exculpating myself from the charge of having censured the Colonial Office; and having, as I hope, done that effectually, I will merely observe, in conclusion, that in my opinion the abolition of the offices could not have been avoided.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I cannot see how, as declared by my Noble Friend

Lord Glenelg), the Treasury letter containing Mr. Cumberland's dismissal can be said to cast no personal censure upon that gentleman, when it distinctly states that the cause of his dismissal was his gross inefficiency and notorious incompetency to discharge the duties of his office. Can there be a more cruel censure upon any man? If the Government are bound to abolish offices on public grounds, they are likewise bound to make compensation. I, as the Noble Duke opposite well knows, acted upon that principle in 1832 and 1833, — taking care at the same time not to abolish offices without having first examined into the nature of the duties to be performed. I said that I would not do individual injustice, that economy might come of it, — because I hold that course to be the worst possible kind of economy, and ruinous to the cause of economy itself. Now, I not only think, in this case, that the individuals have not been well used, but that the commissioners have not been well used; for they did no such thing as simply to recommend the Government to abolish places; they recommended them to abolish certain places, — giving compensation to, or superannuating, the holders of those places. The case of Mr. Cumberland is one of the most grievous I ever knew. It is a Treasury defamation upon the grossest misstatement of facts, — a false, defamatory libel upon that gallant and unfortunate gentleman, — and if it had been said or printed by any private individual, it would have rendered that individual liable to an action for slander. Cases of compensation, I am well aware, are very painful to the Treasury, who have at the same time to protect the individual and the public revenue. But I really think that they sometimes contrive to neglect both those duties together, — to be cruel and harsh to the individual, and not to further the best interests of the country or of the revenue itself by so doing; and I will give an instance of it. Several offices, fourteen or fifteen in number, some of them with emoluments amounting to 9000*l.* and to 10,000*l.*, were abolished by me in 1832. One of those offices, that of Clerk of the Crown, — the particular one to which I allude, — was held by Lord Bathurst, at a salary of 2500*l.* It was an absolute sinecure. The duties were performed by a deputy, a member of the bar, at a salary of 700*l.* a-year. All the labour and responsibility of the situation, which were very considerable, fell upon him. Well; when the sinecure was abolished, one might have supposed that some addition would have been made to his salary of 700*l.*, — that it would have been made at least 800*l.* No such thing. On the contrary, it was reduced to 500*l.*: the consequence of which was, that everybody said to me, "In future I think you will be more cautious how you abolish offices, since you see how the Treasury metes out compensation; henceforth your first care will be to ascertain what will be the nature and amount of the compensation."

So much for the personal part of the subject. Now, with regard to the offices themselves. The charge of my Noble Friend is not that the commissioners reported that these offices ought to be abolished, but that they did not inquire and inform themselves upon what they knew nothing about, — namely, the nature of the offices, the nature and amount of the duties to be performed, and the sort of persons best fitted to perform those duties. I was astonished to hear my Noble Friend behind me state that that is not usually done. I have never known offices recommended to be abolished, where the holders of those offices had not been, as a matter of course, previously examined, until the present instance. The Chief Justice was not examined as to the amount of labour, the number of days he sat, or the nature of the duties he had to perform. The injustice of that non-examination is evident. The Noble and Learned Lord has said, for instance, that, according to the commissioners' Report, the Chief Justice sat only 115 days in the year; whereas, had they made the usual examination, they would have found that that number of sittings occurred in 1837, a year when the cholera was prevalent; and that in any other year the number would have amounted to 188. Now, I have been looking at a very drastic measure — the Report of a committee of the other House, of which the late Mr. Bankes was chairman, for abolishing sinecures; and in that instance, every man holding any place under Government, from the highest to the lowest, was examined. But, however the case, here, may be as to the Chief Justice, there certainly is no pretence of having examined the Attorney General of Malta, for the first that that learned gentleman heard of the abolition of his office was when he was over here. Then, as to the complaint of the number of days on which the Chief Justice sat. Why, in Scotland the judges sit for only five months and a half in each year, and only five days a-week, — of course not working on Sunday, and keeping Monday holy also, as is done by many men who labour much harder than they:

and this does not amount to 115 days in the year, three hours a-day, — the time the Chief Justice sat at Malta. The Judge, too, of the High Court of Admiralty in England does not sit twenty-eight days in the course of the year. But as to the Vice-Admiralty Court of Malta, that is no sinecure, for it is a well-employed court either in peace or war. It is a most vulgar and most fallacious test of the importance of judges, to say they sit only a certain number of days. Then, too, the Chief Justice is a judge of appeal in all civil cases; and though there may be few appeals, yet the office is necessary, to control and keep in order the courts below. It is necessary, first, to keep them attentive to their duties; and, secondly, to keep them honest, and prevent them from becoming corrupt. In my opinion, the Chief Justice of Malta is a most important office; and doubly important, when it is considered that English law is now taken as the basis of Maltese law, and that for the last twenty-five years more and more English law has been introduced into the Maltese courts, — there having been twenty or thirty ordinances to that effect.

With respect, too, to trial by jury, it is a very ordinary matter here; but take any foreign lawyer, how well soever he may be versed in his own laws, — not such men as the commissioners who went to Malta, — whether from France, Germany, or Italy, into the court of the Lord Chief Justice in Westminster Hall, to witness the trial of a person by jury, and in the first five minutes, — although we, from being accustomed to the proceeding, and familiarised with it, might not be struck, — there would yet be forcibly impressed on the mind of the foreigner, the impression, "what an anomalous system it is!" But here lies the 'gist of the question; for the commissioners say there is no difference between the functions of a judge with a jury, and the functions of a judge without a jury. Good God! no difference? Why, there is the most material difference. Could these men have ever seen a jury trial? This is the result of sending speculative men to judge of practical questions. Trial by jury, however, is not yet fully introduced into Malta, as it at present exists only in criminal cases affecting the life of men, or where the punishment is to work at the galleys for life — not being at all introduced into civil cases. But there will be, at some future time, trial by jury in civil cases; and if the office of English Chief Justice be abolished, how can it be conducted? Let your Lordships look at Scotland. It has been introduced there in civil cases for the last twenty-five years, and yet is not a perfect system at the present moment. I must say that I have much more confidence in the professional skill, habits, and learning of an English lawyer taken from Westminster Hall, than in any six Maltese lawyers, be they who they may. But, then, it may be said, "You may purchase this too dear;" to which I will reply, "Justice never can be bought too dear." I will deny, too, that, because the law is partly Maltese, an English lawyer is not therefore required; for if one half of the law were English, an English lawyer would certainly know it much better than a Maltese; and as to the other half, as the Maltese law is grounded on the Justinian Code, an English lawyer, having a knowledge of general principles and general jurisprudence, would be perfectly competent for all he would be called on to do. There is much, too, in a judge being considered beyond the reach of temptation — beyond suspicion; and I may say, that no judges can be found more pure than English judges. Could the trash which has been lately brought before your Lordships, as resulting from the law of libel in Malta, have taken place, if an English lawyer had been there? And yet my Noble Friend behind me says, "It is not a matter of speculation, but of experience; for this change has been tried six months, and there has been no appeal." Tried for six months! And that is to be considered a sufficient trial! I can easily account for a governor not very much liking a chief justice. The governor, from his military habits, if he be a military man, — or, indeed, whether he be or be not a military man, — is apt to come into collision with a chief justice. Of this there are many instances in Europe, and out of it. The Maltese judges are more pliant than an English judge; for I will venture to say that, from the 1st day of January to the 31st of December, not one of those Maltese judges would, in act or word, come in any way into collision with the Governor. I mention this, not out of any want of good feeling to the present Governor, who is an old friend of mine whom I much respect, but to show that there are circumstances which will make him an easy convert to the opinions of the commissioners, that the office of Chief Justice should be abolished; an opinion which, I repeat, is not strengthened by any knowledge of the nature of the duties of that, or those other offices, the abolition of which they recommended. The responsibility, doubtless, rests with the Government. It has, however, become, of late, the fashion to appoint commissions, and this divides the responsibility; for the Government will say that this or that was "recommended by the commissioners." They, however, should consider who the commissioners are, and weigh well the grounds of their recommendation. Let them, in the present instance, consult the Noble and Learned Lord on the woolsack, who will give them good law; and let them trust to their own wisdom; and they will come to a better decision than by following the Report of these commissioners. All practical experience is against abolishing the office of Chief Justice; and I should think, also, that of Attorney General; but into that point I will not enter, — I will rely on the statements and arguments of my Noble Friend opposite.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.— At this late hour, and even after the lengthened discussion which the subject has already undergone, there are one or two points on which I feel it necessary to offer a few remarks. Had I been able to address your Lordships at an earlier hour in the evening, I should have considered it necessary to have gone into some details, in justice to the course taken by the Government, and also in justice to the commissioners, who have been so severely dealt with by the Noble and Learned Lord. Notwithstanding the observations of the Noble and Learned Lord as to the Report of those commissioners, and their competency to the task assigned to them, it is only just to them to state, that the results of that Report have given very general satisfaction throughout the island. The Noble and Learned Lord has laid great stress on the case of Mr. Cumberland. Now, I know how difficult it is to deal with questions which are of a personal nature. I have a great regard for Mr. Cumberland; I have known him well, though it is now many years since we met. In the case of that gentleman, I speak of him only in his official character; and, in fairness to the commissioners, I must say that, in representing him as incompetent for the situation of collector of land revenue, they stated only what was notorious to every one in the island. The reason why that portion of the Report was omitted, was a feeling of delicacy to Mr. Cumberland himself. The passage left out, by desire of the Treasury, stated that it was notorious to all his subordinates that he was altogether incompetent to the discharge of the duties of his office; and that, in fact, they were performed by another person, who received a small amount of salary for so doing. In stating this, it does not follow that Mr. Cumberland may not have been quite efficient in discharging the duties of another office; but it is no injustice to him to say, that he was not fit for those of the one which he did hold. Where, then, is the injustice done to that gentleman, in his being removed from that appointment? I cannot consider him as so "unfortunate," as he has been described, in having been allowed to receive, for six years, the emoluments of an office for which he was unfit. As to the judicial changes recommended by the commissioners, I must say, that nothing of personal feeling was mixed up with them, nor was it ever intended that they should be considered as casting any stigma on the gentlemen whose removal was recommended. The question was, whether the number of judges was greater than was necessary for the discharge of the duties they had to perform? The only way to look at that point was, to ascertain the number of days they sat, and the average time, each day, in a given time. But the Noble and Learned Lord (Lord Brougham) has complained that the commissioners took the average of the sittings in the year 1837, in which, by reason of the prevalence of the cholera, the sittings were necessarily much diminished, as compared with those of other years. Now, the commissioners state that the average returns from other years will show no material difference from their first Return. The removal of Mr. Langslow cannot be considered as any imputation on his character. He held the office of Attorney General, in which, from his want of knowledge of the language, he could not plead, but was obliged to act by a deputy, who was versed in the Maltese tongue. Now, I maintain that the Maltese judges will be found sufficient for the discharge of the judicial duties of the island. The chief of these is Dr. Buonanita, — a gentleman in every way qualified to preside in the court to which he is appointed. I am surprised that the Noble Earl should consider the removal of Sir John Stoddart and Mr. Langslow as in any way reflecting upon the character of those gentlemen. It certainly does not lessen them in my estimation; for I have been, since, in communication with both of them, with a view to seeing whether their services might not be rendered available in some other appointments? The removal of those functionaries, whose services are not absolutely necessary, may be defended on the ground of the state of the revenue of Malta. While your Lordships are now discussing whether a Chief Justice should or should not be continued, with a salary of 1600*l.* a-year, the state of the revenue of that island is absolutely below its expenditure: it is insufficient to the organisation and maintenance of an efficient police. The prisoners are obliged to work; and, in short, the greatest distress prevails amongst the lower classes, who are taxed to an amount more than they can well bear. The Maltese people are opposed to a system which gives 1600*l.* a-year to the Chief Justice, whilst the Professor, at their University, has only 30*l.* a-year. Every effort should be made to raise the character of the population; and, among other obvious means of giving satisfaction to them, has been found this of doing away with these offices, and their extravagant salaries, amongst which are those which have been held by the gentlemen to whom allusion has been made. I agree, indeed, with the Noble and Learned Lord (Lord Brougham), that it requires more time to test the good working of this system. Sir Henry Bouverie is a very high authority, however, on this subject; and, with his authority on behalf of this system, I, for one, am not disposed, at present, to recommend any relaxation. I shall be always ready to avail myself of any opportunity for employing those gentlemen in the public service; and, with regard to Mr. Cumberland, I shall be glad to take under consideration his unhappy situation. There the question must rest.

LORD BROUGHAM. — With regard to one observation which has fallen from the Noble Marquess, — I would have cut off the two judges now appointed, and allowed the English judge to remain. I think that a military man for a governor is the very worst you can have.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I cannot help thinking that the Noble Earl has allowed his feelings to run away with him. He has really argued as if these offices were created, not for the benefit and advantage of the state, but for the benefit and advantage of those who are placed in them. My Noble and Learned Friend has argued the question on much bolder grounds. I only rise, however, for the purpose of saying one word which relates rather to the department that I hold, — and that is, as to the compensation awarded on the present occasion. These gentlemen think the Treasury is very hard on this occasion, for persons who talk of liberality and generosity. My Noble Friends will recollect that there is neither liberality nor parsimony in this case, — for, if there were, it would be liberality or parsimony with the public money; and these are qualities generally considered as personal qualities, and not to be applied to the use which a man makes of the money of other people. When the Noble Earl talks of the liberality with which the Treasury ought to act, he seems to forget a little instrument which is rather important on this occasion, — namely, the 4th and 5th of William IV. c. 4., which passed when my Noble Friend was, himself, in office, and which, he knows very well, was prepared and matured by a Right Honourable Gentleman, from whom, now, unfortunately, I am separated in politics; and he will recollect that this Act of William IV. settles the principle and proportions in which compensation is to be given; and it also settles the number of years of service, after which, and in certain proportions, compensation is to be given; — that, for ten years' service, one third of the salary is to be allowed, — which was the compensation given to the Chief Justice for serving twelve years and a half, — being as large a compensation as could be allowed. Under that Act, the Attorney General is not entitled to compensation at all; he has not held his office for more than five, or six, or seven years: and I apprehend that the arrangement which the Treasury have made with that learned gentleman, to give him his salary for one year, and in the mean time to offer him some employment, will be much more agreeable to his feelings than receiving remuneration for performing no service at all. My Noble Friend has adverted to another case — as he has described it, a very melancholy one. It is, unfortunately, a sort of case which is by no means rare; there are many others of the same description. I do not wish, I am sure, to advert to that letter to the Treasury which has been read; but the gentleman himself has not, in my opinion, been very prudent in publishing it. My Noble Friend leaves to your Lordships the impression, that no more than 100*l.* has been received by this gentleman. I am unwilling to mention this case; I wish it had not been mentioned at all: but, seeing that it is a case liable to move and excite a great deal of compassion, I think it should be known that that sum is not the only compensation which Mr. Cumberland has received.

The EARL of RIPON. — It appears to be thought that the appointment of Mr. Cumberland was an injudicious act. I can only say there has been no complaint of the mode in which his duty was performed in Malta. It is said that the gentleman in question was inefficient, and that the labours of his office were performed by deputy. Who has said that? The deputy;—and the whole case rests on his evidence. It seems to me a most marvellous thing, that the commissioners never gave Mr. Cumberland an opportunity of stating what was the nature of his office, and how he performed the duties of it. Mr. Cumberland decided every point on his own judgment; and the deputy, who made the statement alluded to, is the man who has benefited by the steps founded on it.

The motion was then agreed to.

BELFAST WATERWORKS (No. 1.) BILL.

Petition, presented by Mr. E. TENNENT, of the Belfast Charitable Society, against. — To lie on the table.

Motion made by Mr. O'CONNELL, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Mr. E. TENNENT. — I rise to oppose the second reading of this Bill, as a measure which is totally uncalled for by the inhabitants of Belfast, who are, in truth, unanimously opposed to it, and who conceive that it will be exceedingly oppressive. I call upon the Honourable Member for Dublin to show me a single petition in favour of the Bill from the entire town of Belfast, or a single inhabitant of that town who supports it; whilst, on the other hand, there have been meetings of the inhabitants, who have, with one unanimous voice, declared that they will not have this Bill, — that it will tend to injure, most seriously, the course of public charity, and conduce to the discomfort of the town itself. The present stage of the Bill is nothing more than its introduction,—for, from February to May, the parties did not proceed one step with it,—and we are now, within a few weeks of the end of the Session, called upon to commence and concur in a vexatious opposition to this Bill. Besides, this Bill has the appearance of fraud on the face of it. It has been represented as a third class Bill; upon that representation it was printed; and yet, from beginning to end, it is filled with the most extravagant powers, which evidently make it a second class Bill. It should, therefore, be referred back to the committee. Upon the ground, then, of informality, as well as of the injustice of the Bill itself, I move that it be read a second time this day three months.

Mr. DUNBAR. — I second the motion.

COLONEL VERNER. — As my name is connected with this Bill, I wish to make one observation. I shall not attempt to answer the Honourable Member for Belfast, because I do not conceive that this is the proper time for doing so; but, if the House will allow the Bill to be read a second time, and then sent to a committee, I undertake to satisfy the minds of that committee as to the merits of the Bill. Let me remind the House that this is not a Bill of a party or political nature. The fact of my being united with the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin, in bringing it in, is a sufficient proof of that. I only ask the House to allow the Bill to go before a committee, and be there tried upon its merits.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I trust the House will allow this Bill to be read a second time. The town of Belfast is not, at present, sufficiently supplied with water. The population of Belfast is increasing faster than that of any other town in Ireland; — it is increasing to the extent of 2000 souls per annum. The poor people are obliged to purchase water by the can, from itinerant vendors, — as not more than three fourths of the town — that is, the wealthiest part of it — are supplied with pipes. The report of the surveyors appointed by the charitable company alluded to by the Honourable Member, states that that company is able to supply 112 gallons only a-minute, whereas the town requires upwards of 500 gallons a-minute; and that the water works, at present, produce only 1500*l.* a-year, while the voluntary supply provided by the inhabitants costs 2500*l.* The case is so strong, in all its points, that I cannot see wherein lies the objection to this Bill. The company to be established under it do not require any rate or forced levying, but merely the power of selling water. If there be any fair objections to the Bill, why, let them be considered before the committee.

Mr. DUNBAR. — The Honourable Member for Dublin has said that the poor people of Belfast are obliged to purchase water from itinerant vendors. Now, they are supplied with water at a much lower rate than they can possibly be by the proposed company, whose charges will be one third higher. Under the present Act, by which the town is supplied, the rates cannot be raised above a certain sum, and their net produce is paid to a charitable institution — one of the most valuable institutions in the town, — which will be destroyed by this Bill, — and which, I trust, the House will not put to the expense of opposing the Bill before a committee. The people of Belfast are unanimously opposed to this measure; and my Honourable Colleague and I have several petitions against it, which we shall present in case it shall not, now, be thrown out.

The House divided: — Ayes 107; Noes 53; — Majority 54.

ECCLESIASTICAL DUTIES AND REVENUES BILL.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—I rise to give notice that I shall, to-morrow, move for leave to bring in a Bill for the continuance of the existing Ecclesiastical Appointments Suspension Act for one year longer. With regard to the Ecclesitical Duties and Revenues Bill, which stood for discussion yesterday, two Honourable Gentlemen on the other side of the House have expressed a desire that it should be postponed. I am quite aware that there are many reasons why it should not be proceeded with at this period of the Session. I know it would be very difficult to obtain a sufficient attendance of the Spiritual Lords in the other House of Parliament—or, at least, such an attendance as would be desirable in proceeding to legislate upon the subject of this Bill. It has been stated, but without authority, that some propositions are to be made, and some modifications proposed, in reference to this measure, calculated to obtain for it a more general consent. I am certainly desirous that the Bill should have as general a consent on the part of Parliament, and on the part of the church, as can be secured for it; and I am, therefore, not unwilling to postpone it; but I should be reluctant indeed to do so, if it were considered that, thereby, I was at all giving up the principle of the Bill, or the essential objects to be effected by it. I think it is highly necessary that some measure applying certain revenues of the church to the spiritual instruction of the people in those populous districts where such instruction is much needed, should be carried into effect by a parliamentary enactment. Therefore, Sir, in postponing the Ecclesiastical Duties and Revenues Bill, it is my intention, at the same time, to introduce the measure of which I have just given notice, to carry into effect the suspension of certain cathedral dignities, which have several times been suspended by Act of Parliament,—a course which, if repeated year by year without any prospect of coming to a determination upon the subject, is, I am aware, open to objection. What I propose is, that the Bill, of which I have given notice, shall provide for the suspension of the same appointments as it is proposed, ultimately, to do away with; and that those appointments which are to be filled up, shall be filled up in the same order as is provided in the Ecclesiastical Duties and Revenues Bill. I shall, therefore, postpone the Ecclesiastical Duties and Revenues Bill for a fortnight, with the view of seeing whether the Suspension Bill, which I propose to introduce, is likely to meet with the assent of Parliament and of the church. If that assent is likely to be obtained, then I shall give up the Ecclesiastical Duties and Revenues Bill for the present Session; but if, on the contrary, the Suspension Bill shall be opposed, then I shall think it necessary to press the former Bill, in order to show that I am not disposed to abandon the objects of that Bill, the manner in which it is intended to carry those objects into effect, or the principles upon which it is founded. I now propose that the Ecclesiastical Duties and Revenues Bill be postponed for a fortnight.

Agreed to; committee on Thursday, the 11th of July.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.—CANADA.—MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

SIR ROBERT PEEL.—I think I cannot take a better opportunity than the present, of suggesting that, as we are now arrived at almost the last day in June on which the House will sit, it would be very convenient if the Noble Lord would announce, not now, but on some early day, after he has given the subject full consideration, what are the Bills with which he intends, and what those with which he does not intend, to proceed—during the present Session? That is a course which is generally adopted at a much earlier period of the Session than has now arrived; and I must say that it is one which would most materially facilitate the business of the House. I beg, also, to express a hope that the Noble Lord will, shortly, name the day on which he proposes to proceed with the second reading of the Canada Bill; because I give this public notice to the Noble Lord, and to the House generally, that I shall feel it to be my duty to object to the second reading of that Bill. I do not intend to contest the principle of the measure itself; but I do intend to object to the propriety of deciding, at this period of the Session, upon the general principle of a union of the two provinces of Canada, if it be not intended to proceed to actual legislation when that principle shall be affirmed. If Sir J. Colborne intimates to us that he has forwarded all the information which can be obtained, — and if the Noble Lord opposite tells me distinctly that it is, bonâ fide, his intention to legislate in the present Session, — I am so little disinclined to the principle of the union, that I shall be prepared to assent to the second reading of the Bill. But if we are not to proceed to legislation in the present Session, I cannot give my sanction to the second reading of the Bill, because it will be impossible to discuss the subject of a legislative union of the two provinces, without entering upon many other, and most important, considerations; and because, in my opinion, the discussion of those important considerations ought to be followed by immediate legislation; for if that discussion take place, and if, the report of our proceedings having gone out to Canada, we do nothing, for seven or eight months after, in the way of legislation, the objects of the Government and of the Parliament may be misunderstood and misrepresented, and the measure for effecting a union may, as the consequence, be prejudiced in the minds of the people of the colony. Not objecting to the principle of a legislative union, I should not directly oppose the second reading of the Bill; but I should feel it my duty to make some motion, such as "the previous question," or "that the House proceed to the other Orders of the Day," in order to afford the House an opportunity of expressing an opinion as to the policy of pledging the House in the present Session to the abstract principle of a union, if we are not to proceed to actual legislation for another year. I also intend to pursue the same course with respect to other Bills. If it be the intention of Government, with respect to any other measures now before the House, to take the second reading in the present Session, and to postpone their further progress to another year, then, as a general principle, I shall pursue the same course with respect to those Bills, as I have intimated my intention to adopt with respect to the Canada Bill, — that is, I shall invite the House to refuse its assent to the principle of any measure which it may not be intended to carry into a law during the present Session.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—I shall certainly take an early opportunity of stating what Bills I intend to proceed with during the present Session, and what Bills I propose to abandon. Several Bills have already been abandoned, respecting which it will, of course, be unnecessary to make any declaration. The Right Honourable Gentleman has suggested that I should take time for consideration before I make any announcement as to the measures which the Government will proceed with in the present Session; and I shall certainly do so, — for I recollect that I was, last year, accused of abandoning a Bill which I might have carried. I may seize this opportunity of announcing, for the information of Honourable Members connected with Scotland, as questions have frequently been put to me on the subject, that there are three Bills with respect to Scotland, which shall be proceeded with in the present Session, — namely, the Judges' Salaries Bill, the Prisons Bill, and the Bankrupts' Estates Bill; but it is not intended to press any other of the Bills relating to Scotland in the present Session. With respect to the Canada Bills, I fear some misapprehension may exist, after the statement of the Right Honourable Gentleman, if that statement be not explained. There are two Bills which the Government have obtained leave to introduce with respect to the affairs of Canada. There is one of the Bills, as I have already stated, with which I do not intend to proceed this Session. The other, respecting the powers which have been conferred by Act of Parliament upon the Governor and Special Council, I do intend to proceed with in the present Session. I hope, therefore, that the Right Honourable Gentleman's statement did not refer to the last-mentioned Bill; because, after what passed last year, with respect to the judges in Canada, I shall think it necessary to press that Bill. I will not, now, enter into the question, whether it is politic or impolitic to ask the House to consent to the second reading of the Bill for effecting a union of the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada in the present Session; I shall reserve my opinions upon that point till the subject is regularly before the House. With regard to the Orders of the Day, I feel it right to say that I have been informed that it is the wish of the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite (Mr. Shaw), and other Irish Members, that the Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Bill should not be brought forward to-morrow. I confess I have not heard any good reason for postponing it; and it may be as well for the Right Honourable Gentleman to state, now, why he is unwilling that that Bill should be proceeded with to-morrow?

SIR R. PEEL. — Let us dispose of Canada first. I am quite aware that the Noble Lord introduced two Bills relative to Canada; and that, with respect to one of those Bills, it is the intention of the Government to proceed to effective legislation in the present Session. With respect, however, to the Bill for effecting a union of the two provinces, I understood the Noble Lord to state that it was not his intention to proceed to actual legislation in the present Session; and that he would only call upon the House to pronounce an opinion upon the principle of a union. My objection does not apply to the first of those Bills; and my present impression is, that the principle of that Bill will not be opposed, and that it will be allowed to be read a second time, — of course, reserving myself as to the details of the measure, and not pledging myself that some of the minor provisions of the Bill will not be opposed. It is the second of the Canada Bills which I object to, — not on account of the principle of the measure, but because I contend that it is neither wise nor politic to call upon the House to affirm the abstract principle of a union in the present Session, when we are not to proceed to actual legislation till some after and indefinite period. That is the ground on which I shall resist the Bill for effecting a union of the two Canadian provinces; and, perhaps, the Noble Lord, for the convenience of the House, will state when he intends to bring forward that measure?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I shall state, to-morrow, when it will be proceeded with.

Mr. SHAW. — The reason why I do not wish the Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Bill to be proceeded with to-morrow, is, that the Noble Lord has intimated that he intends to proceed, in the first place, with the Controverted Elections Bill. Now, I think the Corporations Bill, when it is to come on, ought to come on at an early period of the evening. Besides, it has been understood that the Noble Lord did not intend to proceed with that Bill in the present Session. Since it appears, however, that that is an erroneous impression, I think some night ought to be fixed upon which it can be brought on before any other business.

Mr. W. S. O'BRIEN. — I do hope the Noble Lord will not consent to the further postponement of the Bill; and I would suggest that the Noble Lord should commence the business of to-morrow evening with the Irish Corporation Bill.

SIR D. ROCHE. — I am quite of opinion with my Honourable Friend, that the better course would be, to take the Corporation Bill first.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — As there has been a very full attendance of Members this week, I do not think there is any necessity for postponing the Bill beyond to-morrow, although I cannot agree with my Honourable Friend behind me, that it should take precedence of the Controverted Elections Bill. It will not require much time to settle the remaining points in question upon that Bill. I do not see how the business can be arranged so as to suit all parties; and it certainly is not fair for Honourable Members to object to my proposal, because they happen to have an engagement for dinner.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — I think that, as the Bill is one of great importance, there should be some distinct understanding as to the day on which it is to come on. There are 280 clauses in the Bill; and although it has already been frequently before the House, there may be many Honourable Members who would require time to make themselves masters of their details. For my own part, I shall be so occupied with the Election Petitions Bill, that I shall be quite unable to give the matter any consideration to-morrow; and I cannot but express a hope that four or five days' notice will be given. I would suggest that the Bill should be fixed for Thursday next; and, in that case, I venture to say that there will be no disposition to enter into any preliminary discussion.

Mr. HUME. — Sir, this question presses very much with respect to the people of Ireland; and therefore I hope the Noble Lord will take it to-morrow without fail. Ireland expects something, but nothing has yet been done for her.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — The Honourable Member is thinking, I see, of Kilkenny. With respect to the clauses, it is not to be supposed that we could get through all the 280 to-morrow. There is one point, especially, in the Bill, which has been frequently a matter of difference in the House, — that of the franchise; and having taken the discussion on that question, I shall postpone the consideration of the other clauses until some future day.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION BILL.

Mr. KELLY. — Sir, I wish to know whether it is the intention of Government to proceed with the Summary Jurisdiction Bill during the present Session?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Yes.

LEGISLATION IN THE COLONIES.

DOCTOR LUSHINGTON. — Sir, I beg to ask the Right Honourable Gentleman the Under Secretary for Colonial Affairs, whether any authentic information has reached his Office from the Legislature of Tobago, communicating the information that they have passed two laws, — the one for the establishment of regulations with regard to contracts, and the other referring to the subject of vagrancy, — in conformity with the Orders in Council which have been sent out there?

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — I have great satisfaction in stating, that information has been received from Tobago, that the Legislature of that colony has passed laws on the subject of vagrancy and contracts in exact conformity with the Orders in Council. Also, in the Island of St. Vincent, a law on the subject of contracts, in exact conformity with the Order in Council, has been passed by the Legislature.

FACTORY BILL.

LORD ASHLEY. — I wish to ask the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department, what course he intends to pursue with respect to the Factory Bill? In consequence of the numerous delays which have taken place from February to July, all the parties interested have left London, and I shall be obliged to write to them that they may be in town on that day.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Sir, I have certainly stated, in the face of the House, that the Factory Bill would take precedence of the other Orders on Monday next; and I have only to repeat that notification.

HOSTILITIES IN THE EAST.

Mr. HUME. — I beg to ask the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Foreign Department, whether, after the news which has been received to-day from the East, of hostilities having commenced there, he would have any objection to lay before the House the treaty or convention made on the 20th of April, 1833, between the Pacha of Egypt and the Porte?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — The Government has received no information that hostilities have actually commenced, although the communications received afford considerable grounds for apprehension. There has been no formal treaty or convention, but merely an arrangement, entered into between the Sultan and the Pacha of Egypt, by which the Sultan undertook to nominate Mehemet Ali governor of certain Pachalicks, the execution of which was not guaranteed by any written document, and which has merely been fulfilled, hitherto, by the annual appointment of Pachas. With regard to the publication of the despatches received by the Government at the time, I see no objection to a selection from them being produced; and I will look through them, with a view to satisfying the wish of the Honourable Member.

SUPPLY — EDUCATION.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I beg to ask the Right Honourable Baronet opposite, whether he intends to take the sense of the House upon the Report of the Committee of Supply on the vote of money for the purposes of education?

SIR R. PEEL. — Sir, I intended to have given a reply to this question yesterday, had it not been for the accidental circumstance of a House not being formed. I will now state that, as I believe the House considers the subject to have been exhausted in point of debate, — and as the question upon the Report will be identically the same with that which has been decided in committee, — and as I have ascertained that every Member of the House has expressed his opinion upon the subject, except twenty-four, — I deem it unnecessary to trouble the House by another division. I do not, therefore, propose t take the sense of the House on the Report; and I have no objection to its being received now, if the Noble Lord should think fit to bring it forward.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Then, Sir, I move that the Report be now received.

Mr. F. BARING having brought up the Report, the resolution was read a first time.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT. — Sir, I wish, with the permission of the House, to say a few words, — not on the question actually before the House, but on a subject connected with education. The Noble Lord is, no doubt, aware, from the Reports of the Charity Commissioners, what immense funds applicable to the purposes of education there are, arising out of the foundations of the grammar schools all over England; that, in fact, there is scarcely a village or town without its endowed grammar school, with extensive foundations, almost wholly useless and inoperative. I would mention the case of a town in the district in which I reside, where the master of the grammar school has a salary and emoluments amounting to near 400*l.* per annum; but where, in consequence of its being a grammar school (in accordance with a decision of the Lord Chancellor), Latin only is taught. Instead of this gentleman having a number of pupils from the town, he has only one, who stutters so abominably that nobody can understand him, and two or three sons of neighbouring gentry. In Birmingham, on the other hand, in consequence of an order having been obtained from the Lord Chancellor, enabling the trustees of the grammar school to apply a portion of the funds to the purposes of general education, the whole funds are not devoted to one master, but 2000*l.* or 3000*l.* a-year are applied to the payment of numerous masters, who instruct the pupils in the different branches of general education. In reference to the general condition of these grammar schools, I would suggest to the Noble Lord to bring in a Bill to enable the trustees to extend the education given in these schools from the present system to a more general one, subject to the fiat of the Lord Chancellor, or any visitors who may be appointed. The result of the introduction of such a measure would be advantageous in the extreme; for, instead of gentlemen, as now, receiving large incomes with nothing to do, the means would be afforded for tradesmen's sons to receive their education gratuitously, — and for every single scholar now educated from the trust funds, there would be hundreds.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Sir, I was, in the course of last year, in communication with the Lord Chancellor on this subject, when a Bill was before the House of Lords which had been introduced by Lord Brougham. That Noble Lord has since turned his attention further to the subject, and has prepared another Bill, which will, in due time, receive the consideration of the Lord Chancellor and the House of Peers. In the mean time, I can assure the Honourable Baronet that the subject will not be lost sight of.

Mr. C. BULLER. — Sir, in my opinion, the country is much indebted to the Honourable Baronet for having called the attention of the House to the fact of such large sums — to an amount almost sufficient for the education of the whole people — being now rendered utterly useless, from their being misapplied. I can state, from the information of a gentleman, one of the Charity Commissioners, who has gone over three parishes in Lincolnshire, inquiring into the funds given specifically for educational purposes, and the funds given for general charitable purposes, that of the latter there is frittered away in shillings and half-crowns, in a manner calculated only to encourage pauperism, enough money to provide, in conjunction with the funds specifically devoted to the purpose, for the education of the whole population of the parishes in question. A similar state of things has been proved, by the inquiries of the commissioners, to exist throughout the kingdom; and surely it ought to be one of the first duties of those who have been so strenuous in their opposition to the present vote, to turn their attention to the state of those charities, with a view to the funds being applied to the better attainment of the object for which they were originally intended.

Mr. BROTHERTON. — I think the suggestion of the Honourable Baronet most important. In addition to what has already fallen from Honourable Members on this subject, I can state that there is a grammar school at Manchester, the funds of which amount to 6000*l.* a-year; but where, up to a late period, there have not been more than 200 scholars, and where, at present, even, in consequence of some new regulations, there are not more than 300. The funds, if properly applied, would be sufficient for the education of a great part of the poor of Manchester.

Mr. T. EGERTON.—Sir, the Honourable Member for Salford labours under a very great mistake; he has omitted to state the fact, that the funds of the charity in question were not to be confined to the people of Manchester alone, but were intended to benefit the whole people. The funds have been, for many years, appropriated under an order of a Master in Chancery, according to a scheme approved of by the Lord Chancellor; and there are now two schools in accordance with the design of the testator,—one, a school for classical education; the other, a school open to the whole world, and to which any person may send his child. The Honourable Member is, himself, in Chancery at this moment, in reference to the trusteeship of the charity in question; and it really is rather unfair, while the trustees are acting under the order of a Master in Chancery, that he should come forward and make statements contrary to the facts.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — Why, Sir, the Honourable Member for Salford need not have gone so far north for an instance of the misapplication of charity funds. The Honourable Member opposite has disputed the facts of the Manchester case; but will he dispute the facts — the villainous facts — of the Great Berkhampstead case; where, according to the Charity Commissioners, there are funds to the extent of 2000*l.* or 3000*l.* a-year for the purpose of education, but not a single scholar? In fact, there is actually a prohibition to have scholars. All the Honourable Member for Salford, whose facts are disputed as regards Manchester, has to do, is, to substitute Berkhampstead for Manchester, and then his observations would apply.

Mr. ALSTON. — Sir, I can add the instance of Willoughby, in Lincolnshire, where there is a master to instruct the children, whose son is the usher to the school, and who has a fine house and emoluments, worth altogether 600*l.* a-year, — but where not a single child belonging to the town or neighbourhood receives a particle of education.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — Sir, I do not rise to prolong this discussion; but I cannot help thinking that it is a most improper course, on occasions of this kind, to bring forward, without notice, cases which cannot either be substantiated or denied, and which are calculated to lead to much unpleasant debate. With reference to what has fallen from the Noble Lord, I must be allowed to express a hope that there is no scheme contemplated of "Commissioners of Education," or of any tribunal of education. There seems to be too great a disposition to fritter away the resources of the country in such schemes. I must, also, object to the ground which seems to have been assumed by the Honourable Member for Liskeard, — that wherever small sums, throughout the country, have been dedicated to purposes of general charity, it is right in the state to take those sums, and merge them into some general fund for the maintenance of some specific object. The Honourable Gentleman's favourite object is education, — he would have such sums applied to that object. The Poor Law Commissioners, on the other hand, call for them in aid of the poor rates. When that claim was set up, I maintained that such sums ought to be applied to the use of the general poor — those who were not entitled to claim from the poor rates; and I certainly shall, on all occasions, object to any such sums being thrown into the poor rates, and managed by the Poor Law Commissioners, because, at present, they afford some mitigation of a law which is, in many respects, oppressive. With regard to the grammar schools, let it not be forgotten that they were established for the sole objects of classical education. The masters now employed have been appointed as classical masters; and to ask them, now, to teach little boys reading and writing, would be the most unreasonable thing in the world. I hope the House will never attempt to break into the original foundations; though, at the same time, I would be far from opposing a proposition to add to the original foundations for the purposes of general education.

SIR R. INGLIS. — Sir, I would object to any attempt to divert, to purposes contrary to those of the original testators, the funds of the grammar schools. I trust that no motives of expediency — (a word which, as applied to political questions, I am most reluctant to use) — will induce this House to interfere with the right of the testator after death, or of an individual in his lifetime, to dispose of his property in whatever way he may think fit.

SIR E. WILMOT. — I wish to explain that the Honourable Baronet has totally mistaken me, if he thinks that I desire to see the charity funds diverted entirely from the original intentions of the testators. But those funds have materially increased in most cases; — in some, where the original income was 50*l.*, it has now increased to 5000*l.* Harrow, Rugby, and Birmingham are all free schools; and, in consequence of the largeness of their funds, they have extended their system of education from classical to general education.

SIR R. PEEL. — Sir, I hope the House will remember that it is not fair to enter into such a discussion as this, without notice, — and that, too, when a Bill on the subject is likely to be before the House. There is one circumstance, however, to which I have long desired to draw the attention of the Learned Attorney General. It is, that, as to some of these schools, the trusts are not legally constituted. The expense of 60*l.* or 70*l.* for an application to the Lord Chancellor to legalise the trusts, in many cases, acts as a prohibition, where the funds are small. If, in cases where there is no dispute, some summary form could be resorted to by which the trustees could be legally constituted, it would be greatly advantageous. I know of two or three schools in the country where there are no trustees, and where the funds are too small to bear the costs of an application to the Lord Chancellor.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Sir, I perfectly agree with the Right Honourable Baronet, in thinking that the point to which he has referred is one as to which an improvement might be made; and I will consult my Honourable and Learned Friend the Attorney General as to how it can be best effected. The subject of the charities dedicated to the purpose of education is one of the largest, the most important, and most difficult questions, to which the attention of the House could be given: it is one on which I would always be much disposed to hear the opinions of others: especially, I shall always be glad to hear the opinion of the Right Honourable and Learned Member for Ripon, who, besides his great knowledge of the subject, has attended, at my request, on the Charity Commission. There is a great difficulty involved in the question, — not only as to the persons in whom the authority should be placed, but also as to how far the will of the founders should be observed, or how departed from, in accordance with the changed opinions and circumstances of the times. On the one hand, it is difficult to resolve, absolutely, to break through the will of the founder, and do, at once, that which now seems most beneficial; nor, on the other hand, would it be always wise to follow, literally and slavishly, as the Honourable Baronet the Member for Oxford University seems disposed to do, the will of the founder, however inadequate it might be, now, to attain the declared object. Indeed, I scarcely think the Honourable Baronet, himself, would wish to carry out his principle in all cases; or, what would become of those wills by which large sums were left to certain colleges of the University of Oxford, with the express directions that masses shoulbe said for the should of the dead donor? Yet, these bequests are as well worthy of being observed — (unless altered in accordance with the opinions and different wants of the time) — as any others.

SIR ROBERT INGLIS. — If my Noble Friend is prepared to bring in a Bill to repeal an Act introduced some three centuries ago by a certain Lord Russell, by which the saying of masses for the dead was declared to be unlawful, — then, and not till then, I will be prepared to adhere, in the cases referred to by the Noble Lord, to the precise terms of the bequests of the testators.

Resolution reported: —

That a sum, not exceeding 30,000*l.*, be granted to her Majesty, for public education in Great Britain, in the year 1839.

Resolution agreed to.

SALE OF BEER BILL.

The following petitions on this subject were severally presented, and ordered to lie on the table; namely, —

For placing retailers of beer upon the same footing with licensed victuallers, — from Hertford; Southwark; Birmingham (two petitions); Middlesex; metropolis; Portsmouth (two petitions); Southwark and Lambeth; Rochdale; Huddersfield; Brixton; Tower Hamlets, &c.; and Reading.

For amendment, — from Greenwich; Brixton, Southwark, and Lambeth; Coventry; Bristol; Bolton; Tamworth;

London; New Shoreham; Horncastle; Liverpool; and St. Helen's.

Against, — from Reading; Bristol; Wyberton; Bury; Wrangle; Bicker; Heckington; Abingdon; Cambridge; Ely; Suffolk; Leak; Sibsey; Butterwick; Stockport; and Thomas Legge.

Order for committee read; motion made, and question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair."

Mr. HUME. — Sir, I rise for the purpose of opposing the further progress of the measure. I object to the constant meddling with this question, that has gone on since the introduction of the Bill of the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite. When the Honourable Gentleman who introduced this Bill was called on to make out a case in support of it, he was obliged to confess that the opposition to it had been mainly aroused by his own circulars distributed through the country on the subject, in which he denounced the beer-shops as productive of immorality. I have moved for and obtained Returns on the subject, which show that a greater degree of regularity has prevailed in these beer-shops than in the houses of the licensed victuallers. Those Returns relate to the number of charges of theft, robbery, and other offences, made during a given period against the beer-shops and public houses respectively; and it appears from them that the beer-shop keepers are the really innocent parties, and the licensed vicuallers those who are guilty in a tenfold degree. It appears that, in 1835, there were 29 convictions for adulterating beer, — of which 20 were convictions of licensed victuallers, and 9, only, of beer-shop keepers. In 1836, the convictions were 146, — 144 of licensed victuallers, and but 2 of beer-shop keepers. In 1837, the convictions were 48; or of licensed victuallers 47, and of beer-shop keepers only 1. So much for the different degrees of offence with regard to the adulteration of beer. The Returns also present an account of similar offences in London from 1830, when the Bill passed. In 1830, there were 123 licensed victuallers summoned; of whom 109 were convicted, and 14 dismissed. In the same year, 4 beer-shop keepers only were summoned, and the cases were all dismissed. In 1831, 155 licensed victuallers were summoned; of whom 143 were convicted, and 12 dismissed. In the same year, 10 beer-shop keepers, only, were convicted. I will pass over the intermediate years, which present the same general results, and give the Return of the last three years. In 1839, 357 licensed victuallers were summoned; of whom 333 were convicted, and 24 dismissed. In the same year, 194 beer-shop keepers were summoned, — nearly half of them having, in some trifling degree, kept open beyond the hours. In 1837, 546 licensed victuallers were summoned, and 519 convicted, — the remaining 27 cases being dismissed. In the same year, 241 beer-sellers were summoned, and 217 convicted, — 24 cases being dismissed. In 1838, 655 licensed victuallers were summoned, 603 convicted, and 52 dismissed. In the same year, there were 349 beer-shop keepers summoned, and 320 convicted, — 29 being dismissed. The majority of these convictions, however, were for the most trifling offences. The result of the whole is, that 2519 licensed victuallers have been convicted before the magistrates, and 1008 beer-shop keepers only. According to these facts, the Honourable Gentleman has certainly not made out his case against the existing law. Why should this perpetual meddling continue? There is no security for the large amount of property invested in these beer-shops. I cannot see, also, why the beer-shops and the public houses should not be put on the same footing as to hours. Why should the beer-shops be closed, and the gin-shops be allowed to remain open? For every one man made violent by drinking beer, there are ten made so by spirits. I therefore propose to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said committee," instead thereof.

Mr. A. SANFORD. — Sir, I think that Honourable Members, who merely draw their deductions from Returns, cannot form so accurate an opinion of the working of the law, as those who have the opportunity of witnessing its actual operation on the morals of the people. The necessity for some restriction on the sale of beer and spirits was seen by the Legislature as early as the year 1494, when a right of restriction was given to the magistrates. In 1552, the licensing system was established; and, since that period, still more stringent regulations have been adopted. If necessary at that time, how much more so are they in the present day, with a population so vastly increased? I think the Honourable Member for Droitwich is fully justified in bringing forward the present measure; and I therefore trust the House will concur in the motion, "That the Speaker do now leave the chair."

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON. — Sir, I never listened to a more monstrous proposition than that of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, for stopping the progress of this Bill. The Returns alluded to by the Honourable Gentleman furnish no criterion of the real state of things throughout the country, — being merely confined to London. The number of convictions of beer-shop keepers is considerably greater than has been described. In proof of this, I would refer to the town of Liverpool, with respect to which place we have the Returns made out in detail. In that town, there were, in 1831, 80 convictions of public-houses, and 160 beer-houses; in 1832, 82 public-houses, 81 beer-houses; in 1833, 88 public houses, 77 beer-houses; in 1834, 67 public houses, 179 beer-houses; in 1835, 193 public houses, 312 beer-houses; in 1836, 83 public houses, 135 beer-houses; in 1837, 37 public houses, 72 beer-houses; and all this in the single town of Liverpool. With regard to the respectability of the beer-shop keepers, I would only say that I am satisfied that, if inquiry were made of the clergy, the magistrates, or resident gentry, it would be found that the great demoralisation that prevails throughout so many districts, is mainly to be attributed to the existence of these beer-shops. I trust that the House will reject, by an immense majority, the amendment of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, — for no greater evil has ever been inflicted on the country than the establishment of these beer-shops; and my Honourable Friend the Member for Droitwich is entitled to the thanks of the country for having brought forward this Bill.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Sir, I am not prepared to support the amendment of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, by which we should refuse to go into the consideration of the Bill. The arguments of my Honourable Friend should rather have been directed against the second reading of the Bill, than adduced in its present stage, — and, above all, after the understanding that was come to when it was last before the House. When the Bill was read a second time, I took that opportunity of stating, that, on going into committee, I should endeavour to induce the House to assimilate and equalise as much as possible the laws respecting licensed victuallers and beer-shop keepers. If I fail in my attempt to do this, I shall join with my Honourable Friend in voting against the Bill on the Report on the third reading. What is the state of the public opinion on this subject? It appears, by the Returns on the table, that 77 petitions have been presented for the total repeal of the Beer Act, and these were signed by 6420 persons; against the repeal, simply, 9 petitions have been presented, signed by 20,757 persons. But, for carrying into effect the principles for which I contend, — namely, for equalising the law between the licensed victuallers and beer-shop keepers, — I find that, independent of the numerous petitions presented this evening, petitions have been presented signed by 248,000. I trust, therefore, that Honourable Gentlemen will allow the House to go into committee with this object. In taking this view of the subject, I entirely repudiate the doctrines of the Noble Lord; for, if they be correct, the House ought not to be satisfied with the Bill of the Honourable Member for Droitwich, but should insist on the total repeal of the Act of 1830. It is a most mistaken notion to suppose that there is but little capital employed in this trade; on the contrary, I have Returns before me which show that the amount invested in it, in many places, is very great. With respect to the amount of capital invested in beer-shops, the House will hardly believe that so much as 4000*l.* has been expended on one establishment. I have another Return of 360 beer-houses, the total rental of which amounts to 8256*l.* a-year, and the capital invested to 74,210*l.* I will now give the Noble Lord (Lord Dungannon) some further information. There is one beer-shop at Mile End, the lease of which cost 1500*l.*, and the fixtures 1325*l.* In another, there is capital invested to the amount of 600*l.*

LORD DUNGANNON. — I was alluding to the agricultural districts.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — The Noble Lord entered into the whole case, and I cannot, now, allow him to back out of his argument. Another thing to be considered, in discussing this question, is, the number of breweries the beer-shops have called into action. Before the passing of the Beer Bill, the number of brewers of strong beer in this country was 27,161. In the year 1830, immediately after the passing of that Act, they increased to 36,281; in the next year, to 42,966; and, in the following year, to 43,087. I hope the Gentlemen interested in land will not let these facts pass unnoticed. I hold in my hand another Return to which I beg the particular attention of the House. There is nothing more usually said, than that in public houses there are large investments of capital, and that beer-shops are poor. Now, I have called for a Return from the Board of Excise, containing a valuation of all the public houses and beer-shops. By this Return, it appears that there are 55,513 public houses and 36,054 beer-shops. Of the former, 18,379 are of a less annual value than 10*l.* a-year. Of the beer-shops there are, of value under 5*l.*, 1858; and above 5*l.*, 34,196. To this should be added, that the licence is included in the valuation of the public houses, while there is no such item in the value of the beer-shops. These Returns present a very different result from the exaggerated statements of the opponents of the beer-shops.

I am prepared to say that, on the general principle, the trade in beer ought to be perfectly free; and any restrictions, of course, break in upon that principle, saving such only as are matters of police. It has been admitted that some inconvenience has occasionally arisen, in small places, from the beer-shops; but this fact is rather to be attributed to the deficient police that exists in these places; and the deputation of the trade that waited on me, told me that they would willingly submit to any regulations on the subject that might be deemed necessary or expedient. I have now shown to demonstration, that the contrast which has been drawn between the position of one class and that of another is perfectly delusive: and now comes that very important question with respect to the increase of crime; and here I must be permitted to say that the assertions of the Honourable Gentleman on this head are just as gratuitous and unfounded as his other allegations. In the first place, the Honourable Gentleman has failed to prove that crime has increased; and in the second, that if it has increased, that increase is attributable to the beer-shops; — and failing to prove these two points, the Honourable Gentleman's observations become wholly inapplicable to the subject. Now, with respect to the increase of crime, tables have been prepared at the Home Office, the accuracy of which there is no reason to doubt. But before I state the general conclusions which I deduce from those tables, let me state to the House that the increase in the number of cases cannot be taken as indisputable proof of an increase of crime, — simply because a better system of police affords greater facilities for the detection of offenders. You have, now, in almost every town in the country, an improved system of police; and if this fact be taken into consideration, it will be clear that this greater number of commitments cannot be viewed as evidence of the increase of crime. Besides, since the year 1834, there have been introduced into the criminal Returns three or four large classes of offences never included before, — such as riots, common assaults, and breaches of the peace, — thus showing an apparent, but certainly not an actual, increase in the total number. Thus, it by no means follows that there has been a general increase of crime, even if the Returns show a greater number of convictions, after the passing of the Beer Act, than appears to have taken place, previously, in equal periods of time. But what are the facts as they appear upon these tables? I will take four years before the passing of the Act, and four years afterwards. In the period from 1826 to 1829 inclusive, the average ratio of increase of crime had been 7½ per cent. in England and Wales. What was the ratio of increase in the four years after the passing of the Act? Why, 2½ per cent. only. What become, then, of the allegations that there has been a vast resulting increase of crime? It is, however, said, that although the total amount of crime may not have increased, there has been an augmentation in the agricultural districts; and to listen to the opponents of the Beer Act, one would imagine that the offences of sheep-stealing and poaching had never been heard of until the opening of beer-shops. Now, it appears from the same Return to which I have referred, that in twenty of the largest agricultural counties, there has been, since the passing of the Beer Act, a great diminution in the number of convictions for cattle-stealing and sheep-stealing, and also for cutting and maiming cattle, and that the number of convictions for offences against the game laws has decreased 45 per cent. This is the evidence of a statistical Return, showing the state of crime in the country; yet it is in defiance of facts like these, that the prevalence of crime is attributed to the Beer Act. I think it is unnecessary for me to trespass upon the time of the House by producing further evidence. I do not mean to deny that these offences exist; — I know very well that, under any system, crime will always be more or less connected with the consumption of intoxicating liquors. It is in houses of public entertainment that people congregate; and it is in places where people congregate that criminal designs are concocted, and criminal confederations are held. But can you trace all this particularly to the beer-shops? I say it is impossible. It is well known that, before these beer-houses were instituted, there was a general outcry against the public houses, as being the source of crime; and this outcry is transferred to the beer-shops, and it is said that outrage and crime are concocted in them. Now, for my own part, — but, at the same time, without lending myself, in the least degree, to the casting of imputations upon any class of persons whatever, — I feel disposed, in common with the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, to ask the question, which of the two descriptions of houses may be reasonably considered the most efficacious agent for crime — that in which ardent spirits are sold, or that established for the sale of beer only? Certain it is, that it is the argument of all writers, whether on Medical Science or on Statistics, that ardent spirits are the most powerful promoters of crime. Moralists, also, are of that opinion; and, indeed, such is the general feeling. One of the greatest moral instructors whom this country has ever produced, — namely, Hogarth, — has furnished an admirable illustration of this notion, in his two celebrated pictures of "Beer Street," and "Gin Lane." I would entreat the House to approach this subject with the most serious deliberation. If there be one thing more calculated, than another, to lessen the House in the opinion of the country, it is vacillation and a want of consistency in its legislation. The interest now in question was created under a well-considered and thoroughly debated measure, and after full inquiry, — and the very points, at present, more particularly raised, were urged then; evidence was taken on the subject, — and that evidence supported the passing of the measure, and negatived the assertions which were then, and are now, made. The measure was passed, and it was one of the boldest and best financial reforms which ever took place in this country, — and the Government which carried it through merited the best thanks of the country. The question was again discussed in 1834. A committee sat on the subject — evidence was taken — and the House legislated retrictively upon it, — but not to the effect which the Honourable Member now proposes, and still less to the effect of destroying the trade. If, after all this, its provisions are to be rescinded, how can the House expect that any reliance will be placed upon its own proceedings? or that people will be induced to embark their capital upon the faith of any legislative enactment? I shall vote for going into committee, for the purpose of proposing my amendments; and if I do not succeed in inducing the committee to adopt them, I shall certainly oppose the third reading of the Bill. I do trust the House will not impair its character with the country by the injustice and inconsistency of destroying an interest which it has only just raised.

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON. — I think it necessary to state, by way of explanation, that I never alluded to the capital invested in the beer trade, nor did I state that crime was on the increase. I said that beer-houses were the resort of those who concocted crime, — and in that assertion I am borne out by experience.

LORD ELIOT. — I shall vote for going into committee; but I think the most effectual way of remedying the evils complained of, would be, to place these beer-houses under the control of an improved system of police. I cannot help protesting against the principle which appears so generally put forward on this question — of making property a test of respectability. It reminds me of the theory of one of the witnesses on Thurtell's trial, who tested the respectability of one of the accomplices by his capability of keeping a gig.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I must say I think the Returns referred to by the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer are most satisfactory. It ought, also, to be remembered, that whenever beer-sellers exceed the hour prescribed by the Act for keeping their houses open, they fall under a description of offence from which licensed victuallers are exempt; and that therefore the number of convictions of these different classes of individuals does not offer any criterion, for instituting a fair comparison of the mischiefs arising from the two sorts of establishments.

MAJOR WOOD. — I am anxious to correct an error which the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has fallen into. The number of licensed victuallers, in London, is 4300; and of beer-sellers, 1561. The disproportion in numbers being so great, how can the statements of the Right Honourable Gentleman, as to the relative proportion of convictions in each class, be applicable to the case?

LORD WORSLEY. — The Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said that offences against the Game Act have diminished, since the Beer Act, 45 per cent. Now, I am sorry to be obliged to contradict the Right Honourable Gentleman on this point; for I have recently heard very many complaints of the prevalence of this species of offences. With respect to the beer-shops, I must say that the farmers exclaim loudly against them, and declare that their labourers and servants become debauched and drunkards by frequenting them. Perhaps this Bill may remedy some of the existing evils to a small extent; but I am of opinion, that until you get a good and efficient constabulary force established, you will do no good. I may add, that, in consequence of the establishment of these beer-shops, publicans, whose houses were formerly conducted in an orderly and creditable manner, are now obliged, in self-defence, to receive that class of persons who are said to frequent beer-shops.

Mr. PAKINGTON.—Sir, I shall detain the House but a short time in replying to some of the objections which have been urged against the present measure. In the first place, it has been observed by the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, that no case for it has been made out. That statement I deny; and I ask the House whether the large number of petitions praying for an alteration of the Beer Act, do not constitute a justification of the introduction of the present Bill? The number of petitioners amounts to between 100,000 and 200,000; and the petitions come from thirty-one counties, signed almost unanimously by the magistrates, and from thirty populous towns. Allusion has been made to the error of supposing that the capital embarked in the new beer trade is little or none. All I can say is, that I never gave utterance to such an opinion, though I do believe that the amount of the capital has been greatly exaggerated; and I know that it is very unequally distributed. There is a large number of beer-shops, for instance, where little or no capital has been embarked, and where a few shillings would cover all the outlay. I have been accused of attacking beer-shops, and passing by the spirit-houses. I can conscientiously assure the House that there is no man more ready than I to put down the spirit-houses, and all the dreadful vices connected with them; but is it an argument worth attention, that, because the spirit-houses exist, therefore no attempt should be made to remedy the evils flowing from the present law with regard to beer-shops? But it is denied that beer-shops lead to the commission of crime. On this subject I would direct the attention of Honourable Members to the confessions of men dying on the scaffold.

I really do not understand why the statements of men made under such circumstances should be treated with derision. I can inform the House that, since the second reading of the Bill, a man was executed at Chelmsford for an atrocious murder; and he made a confession, in which he traced the origin of his miserable fate to the bad habits he had acquired in beer-shops. I have also received reports from chaplains of gaols, and documents of the strongest character from clergymen in various parts of the country, all proving the pernicious effects of the beer-shops under the existing law. Under these circumstances, I think I have made out a sufficient case to justify this House in proceeding with the measure.

Mr. MARK PHILIPS.—I beg, now, to say what I expressed last Session,—that, if we had been permitted to have a select committee to inquire into all the allegations on both sides, we might, now, have had a great deal of valuable evidence on this subject, and we should have possessed proper information and grounds whereon to legislate, before we were called upon to support or oppose this Bill. With regard to the lower class of beer-houses in the country, I am satisfied that some enactment is necessary, and I am ready to go into committee on this Bill. I hope the Honourable Member for Kilkenny will not oppose the Honourable Member for Droitwich, on this occasion, by pressing his motion.

Mr. HUME.—In accordance with the suggestion of my Honourable Friends near me, and with what appears to be the sense of the House, I beg leave to withdraw my amendment,—but on the understanding, that if the Bill cannot be shaped to meet the views I have expressed, we shall be at liberty to vote for rejecting it entirely.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

The House then resolved itself into a committee on the Bill.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.—As the motion which the Noble Lord opposite, the Member for Liverpool, is about to bring forward, will involve an alteration at the very outset of the Bill, I beg to suggest that this will be the most convenient time for him to propose it.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON.—I agree with the Right Honourable Gentleman that that would be the better course, and I will therefore, at once, put my amendment. Before doing so, however, I beg leave to direct the attention of the House to a petition I had the honour to present from Liverpool, representing the evils of the beer-houses, and signed by the clergy, merchants, bankers, and most respectable inhabitants of that town. That petition, I may add, was also signed by sixteen Roman Catholic priests; and I am sure the House will agree with me, that there are no persons better calculated to judge of the situation of the lower orders. I believe I may say that the feeling against these beer-houses has extended itself to every class in the community, and I need not take up the time of the committee by entering at any length upon the mass of evidence that has been obtained of their demoralising effects. Mr. Thomas, the constable of Manchester, has given it as his opinion, that the beer-shops are the source of a great deal of crime, and that they hold out encouragement and facilities for a large consumption of illicit spirits; and we have it likewise in evidence, that many of these houses are kept by the worst characters, as well as being the resort of them. I need only refer to the various presentments of the grand juries of Essex, Dorset, Liverpool, Surrey, Hants, the Western circuit, and others, — all uniting in one common opinion, that the demoralising effects resulting from the consumption of beer on the premises still continue. My Right Honourable Friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was exceedingly pathetic on the subject of the different consequences produced by the consumption of beer and ardent spirits; and he charged all those who desire to put down beer-houses, with a tendency, if not a design, to encourage the use of the latter. This I deny; and I would ask, because evil may exist in the one case, is that a reason why you should not correct the evils of the other? In the first place, the owners of public houses, for the purpose of maintaining a competition with the beer-shop keepers, are tempted to spread out every attraction in their power; and they have erected those splendid gin-shops which meet the eye in every populous quarter. Moreover, I say that the consumption of spirits is positively encouraged by the present system of beer-houses, for it is notorious that they are the receptacles of illicitly distilled spirits. My Right Honourable Friend also evinced a disposition to discourage the Gentlemen connected with the landed interest from taking an active part in this question, by alarming them on the score of a decreased consumption of barley, in case the attempts to put down these beer-shops should succeed; and he has endeavoured to quench their better feelings by an appeal to their pecuniary interest. I cannot say I think that was a very worthy appeal, and I am certain it was one which can never operate upon the minds of those Gentlemen so as to influence them in the discharge of their public duties. I will, now, only add, that I believe it is the opinion of every magistrate in the country, that the only cure for the evils of these beer-houses is to make them shops for the sale of beer, only, and to prohibit its consumption upon the premises. This would answer every legitimate purpose of supplying the poor man with a wholesome beverage at a moderate price. I do not wish to trouble the House further; — I believe that I only represent the feeling of the greatest part of those gentlemen who are best and most practically acquainted with the operation of the law in this respect; — and I beg, now, Sir, to move the introduction of the following clause: — "That from and after the commencement of the Act, it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of Excise, or other persons duly authorised, to grant a licence for the sale of beer, ale, porter, cider, and perry, under the authority of the said recited Act (the former Beer Act), to any person applying for the same; but that such licence shall not authorise the sale of beer, &c. to be drunk or consumed in the house of the person specified in the licence."

Clause, for the present, postponed.

Clause 1. "Persons applying for license to produce certificate, signed by the overseer of the parish, that the house or premises are rated to the relief of the poor at the sum of , at the least."

On this clause being put, —

Mr. PAKINGTON said: — I move that the blank be filled up with "ten pounds."

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I object to this clause; and the substitution I shall propose, if the committee agree to my amendments, is this, — "That no licence to sell beer or cider by retail, to be drank or consumed on the premises, under the said recited Act or this Act, shall be granted to any person who shall not be the real resident holder and occupier of the dwelling house in which he shall apply to be licensed, nor shall any such licence be granted in respect of any dwelling house which shall not, with the premises occupied therewith, be rated to the poor on a rent or annual value of fifteen pounds per annum, at the least, if situated in the cities of London or Westminster, or within any parish or place within the bills of mortality, or of ten pounds, at the least, if situate in any city or town corporate, the population of which, according to the last parliamentary census, shall exceed five thousand, or situated within one mile, by the nearest public street or path, from the place used at the last election as the place of election or polling place of any town having the like population, and returning a Member or Members of Parliament, or of five pounds per annum if situated elsewhere; and every licence granted contrary hereto shall be null and void."

Mr. WARBURTON. — I must decidedly oppose the 10*l.* rating, as being contrary to the principles of free trade.

Mr. W. MILES. — I am bound to say, after what I have heard on this subject, that, looking at the amount of capital embarked in this beer trade, it would be by no means just or fair to overturn that trade, notwithstanding the licensed victuallers had ample reason to complain that their property was deteriorated when the Beer Bill was passed. I would suggest to my Honourable Friend to give way to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, after having heard the details into which the Right Honourable Gentleman entered. I have some doubt as to the expediency of so low a rating, for some parts of the country, as the Right Honourable Gentleman has fixed; but I think he has good grounds for his clauses generally, for no doubt the Right Honourable Gentleman has some data with which I am unacquainted, to guide him in this matter. I am, at present, however, disposed to think that a rating between 5*l.* and 10*l.* would be expedient in some of the rural districts — say 6*l.* or 7*l.*

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — I have always been, and shall be, anxious to protect the licensed victuallers; but I cannot support them to the detriment of any other class. I trust the House will stick to the 5*l.*, which, in my opinion, is high enough.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I must say, with respect to the proposal of an alteration in the rating, that I have considered the matter dispassionately; and I do not think I should act justly if I consented to any compromise of the proposition which I have submitted to the House.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL. — I am of opinion that any legislative measure on this subject ought to have been introduced by the Government; and I think the propositions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if they were adopted, would be a great point gained.

Mr. SLANEY. — The country owes a deep debt of gratitude to the Honourable Gentleman who brought forward this Bill; but, on the whole, I think it would be wise to adopt the recommendations of the Government. If the Honourable Member will do so, a great practical point will be gained.

Mr. PAKINGTON. — I have been all along deeply impressed with the necessity for legislation respecting the beer-shops; and having taken up the subject at an early part of the Session, and from the most disinterested motives, I must say I cannot abandon the measure which I have brought forward,—at least, till the House shall have, by a division, expressed its opinion upon it. I cannot consent to adopt the non-consumption clause which has been proposed by the Noble Lord near me; neither can I agree to the scale of 5*l.*, 10*l.*, and 15*l.*, which has been recommended by the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The non-consumption clause would certainly diminish the number of beer-shops, — but it would take away the best class, and leave the worst remaining. I shall, therefore, if the clause be pressed to a division, vote against it. By the scale proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, 15*l.* is to be the rate for the metropolis; and I must say, I think that proposal is unfair,— for the beer-shops in the metropolis are the least objectionable of all, and yet they are to be rated highest. If I cannot secure the principle that no House shall be licensed as a house of entertainment, unless it be of the annual value of 10*l.*, I would rather abandon the Bill altogether.

SIR R. H. INGLIS. — The committee is placed in an extraordinary position by the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Right Honourable Gentleman has brought in what he calls clauses, in a way for which, I believe, there is no precedent. The Bill of my Honourable Friend consists of a few clauses; and what my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has introduced under the humble name of "clauses," is, in fact, a Bill three times as long as that of my Honourable Friend; and it really seems rather unfair to my Honourable Friend to take that course. I hope my Honourable Friend will not abandon his original determination.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.—I must be allowed to say one word before the division. I certainly gave due notice to the Honourable Gentleman, when he brought in this Bill, that I was not unprepared to make alterations in the present beer laws; and I told the Honourable Gentlemen what were the points on which I differed from him. I also had all my clauses printed, that it might not be said that I opposed the Bill without being ready to furnish a substitute. If the proposition of the Honourable Gentleman were adopted, it would crush beer-houses in many places altogether, while it would open the door to the illegal sale of beer.

SIR C. BURRELL.—I am quite certain that the capital so much talked about, does not, in many cases, belong, bonâ fide, to the beer-sellers themselves.

Mr. PARROTT.—For my own part, I think the Beer Act one of the best measures that has been adopted in my time; and Honourable Members who support this Bill seem to look rather at the few evils which are said to have arisen under the present system, than at the many benefits it confers on the labouring population.

The committee then divided upon the question, "That the blank be filled up with the word 'ten:'"—Ayes 76; Noes 103;—Majority 27.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.—If I were, now, to abandon the clauses which I stated I should move by way of amendment to this Bill, it might be said that I had been guilty of a breach of faith; but I assure the Honourable Member for Droitwich that I gave my notice with all good faith and sincerity. Had I been opposed to the principle of the Bill, I should not have consented to the second reading. But the question now is, — What course ought we to pursue in order to save trouble to the House? I would suggest that, as the clauses which I have given notice of my intention to propose, as amendments to the Bill, are somewhat long, and cannot very well be discussed, now, perhaps, the best course would be, to move to substitute them for the clauses in the Bill of the Honourable Member opposite; and then for the committee to report progress, and ask leave to sit again, taking the discussion upon them on a future day. I would propose, therefore, if it meet with the approval of the House, that the remaining clauses of the Bill should be put and negatived, for the purpose of introducing my clauses; and then I would move, Sir, that you report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. CAYLEY. — After what has occurred, I would recommend the Honourable Member for Droitwich to wash his hands of the Bill altogether, and to surrender its future management into the care of the Right Honourable Gentleman. I am favourable to the principle of this Bill, though I opposed the Honourable Member as to the qualification; because, I know that, in many counties, the effect of a 10*l.* qualification would be, to disfranchise every house from being competent to hold a beer licence.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I think the Right Honourable Gentleman has proposed the only course that remains to be taken, under the circumstances. But, so far from thinking that the Honourable Member for Droitwich has exercised an improper discretion in the course which he has adopted, I believe that he has done just that which any Member could, alone, do in a similar case. My Honourable friend conceived that a 10*l.* qualification was necessary; some Honourable Gentlemen thought differently; and a division on the point was most properly taken. The Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, of course, cannot now go into a discussion of his clauses, — inasmuch as many Honourable Gentlemen, who take an interest in this subject, object to them, and will require time for consideration before they are called upon to pronounce a decided opinion.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I would propose that we should, in the first place, proceed to a rate upon the proposition of the Noble Lord the Member for Liverpool, because that clause would interfere with the principle of the Right Honourable Gentleman's clauses.

Mr. W. MILES. — I shall certainly move, at the proper time, that a 7*l.* qualification be adopted.

Clause 1. was then again put, and negatived: all the remaining clauses of the Bill were severally put, and negatived.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON. — The object of the clause I have to submit, is, to restore the law as to the sale of beer to the same condition in which it was after the first change that was made in it, — that is, that the Commissioners of Excise shall have the power to grant licences to sell beer, but that it shall not be consumed on the premises. With regard to an objection that has been made as to the amount of money vested in these beer-houses, I would provide for those vested interests in this way, — that all persons now holding licences to sell beer to be consumed on the premises, shall, during good behaviour, continue to hold such licences during their life, and that the privilege should also continue during the lifetime of their widows after them, but that no new licence shall be granted. I beg, now, to submit my clause.

Clause ("Commissioners of Excise may grant licences, but not to authorise the persons obtaining the same to sell beer, ale, porter, cider, or perry to be drunk or consumed in the houses or premises specified in the licences respectively") brought up, and read.

Question put, "That the clause be read a second time."

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — This question has been already so fully argued by the Honourable Gentleman the Member for Droitwich, that I shall not trouble the committee further than to state, in a few words, the reason why I conceive that the adoption of this clause would unavoidably lead to a system of extensive fraud. The result would be, that persons would resort to a variety of devices in order to evade the law; and with that view the beer would be sold in gardens, and under fictitious names, and the whole country would be exposed to the consequences of such fraudulent practices.

Digitized by Google

Mr. HUME. — I quite agree with the observations of the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Those who acted honestly, and obeyed the law as proposed under the clause of the Noble Lord opposite, would be entirely ruined and the system would hold out strong inducements to fraud.

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON. — I must express my entire coucurrence in the principle of this clause which my Noble Friend has proposed. It would leave the poor man all the real advantages of the present law, while it would remove all the great objections to which that law is now open. The labourers would be still enabled to obtain their beer at a cheap rate, and there would not be that inducement for them to congregate at the beer-house, and spend their earnings, to the injury of their wives and families. I do not participate in the fears which are entertained by the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the clause would give rise to an extensive system of fraud. I think it would be no difficult matter to provide against the possibility of fraud. I am quite sure that this clause, if adopted by the House, will be approved of by many persons of practical experience in the working of the present law throughout the country; and it has been shown, by what has taken place at their meetings, that the magistracy in almost every county are anxious for this alteration in the law.

Mr. GOULBURN. — It was my fortune, or my misfortune, to introduce this present Beer Bill. Before that time, licences were granted to sell beer by retail, under the control of the magistrates. It was found that, in those cases where the beer was not allowed to be sold on premises, the prohibition gave rise to vexatious and improper informations in many cases, and abuses of the law in others; and if I wanted any additional argument to confirm the opinion I have before expressed on this subject, it has been furnished, to-night, by the Honourable Member for Droitwich, who has entered so fully into the question, that it would be unnecessary for me to add another word.

Mr. G. PALMER. — Every day's experience since the passing of this Bill has tended to confirm more strongly my opinion of the ill effects of allowing beer to be sold and drunk on the premises. At those beer-houses the labourers will congregate; they neglect their families, and become demoralised. I shall therefore support the Noble Lord's clause.

MAJOR WOOD. — I think it is not fair to the important interests concerned, to introduce such a change in the law as that proposed by my Noble Friend the Member for Liverpool, in the shape of a clause, and by way of amendment. If the consumption of beer on the premises is to be put an end to, it should be done by a specific and a separate Bill, so that those interested might have due notice, and not be taken by surprise. I think it is the duty of the Government to consider all the laws which affect the licensed victuallers and the innkeepers, and to consolidate them all into one Act; and not, by introducing new clauses, which go materially to affect the licensed victuallers, into a Bill relating to the sale of beer only, but which the original proposer has been induced to withdraw, — to make the law more complicated than it now is.

Mr. T. ATTWOOD. — I hope the Noble Lord will not persevere with the clause. There are several millions of labouring men and their families whose comforts would be seriously interfered with if it were adopted. It should be the object of the Legislature to increase the comforts and enjoyments of the poor, and not to infringe upon them by unnecessary and impolitic prohibitions. It has been said, that to do away with the beer-shops would be to improve the morals of the labouring classes; but I dissent from that opinion altogether. I believe, if you were to do away with the beer-houses, you would increase immorality. So far from crime originating in beer-houses, I believe that the whole amount of crime which appears in the calendars of this country may be traced to bad legislation. You will find that, in every case, the increase of crime has been co-existent with the increase of human misery and degradation. It is misery, not beer-shops, which is the parent of crime.

[Cries of "Question, question!" and, "Divide!"]

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON. — I regret that I cannot accede to the Honourable Gentleman's request that I should withdraw this clause. I agree with the Honourable Member, that the labourer will be affected by it, if adopted; but, I must add, not in the way the Honourable Member supposes. I believe that the labourer, and more especially the family of the labourer, would have their comforts increased by such an alteration of the law as I propose.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I am, at all times, the advocate for giving to the poor man every comfort and enjoyment that it is possible to confer on him; but I am, also, desirous that the wife and family of the labourer should participate with him in such enjoyment and comfort. I shall therefore vote in favour of the clause.

SIR H. VERNEY. — Instead of taking up the time of the House by discussing measures of this description, it would be far more to the benefit of the country if the Government were to bring forward a Bill for establishing an efficient system of rural police throughout the country. I believe the beer-houses in many places are little better than brothels; and my opinion is, that if an effective police system were established, and active police officers sent round to examine their houses, all those evils which are now so loudly complained of might be removed.

The committee then divided: — Ayes 85; Noes 146; — Majority against the clause 61.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I will now, Sir, propose the clauses of which I have given notice.

Clauses brought up, read, and agreed to.

LORD DUNGANNON. — Is it the intention of the Right Honourable Gentleman to proceed with the Bill during the present Session?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I propose to pass it through Parliament this Session, if possible.

House resumed; Chairman reported progress; Bill reported; further consideration of Report on Monday next; Bill, as amended, to be printed.

SUGAR DUTIES BILL.

Reported; to be read a third time tomorrow.

ELECTORS' REMOVAL BILL.

On the motion of Mr. GIBSON, the Order of the Day for the third reading, read.

Upon the question, "That the Bill be now read a third time," being put from the chair, —

Mr. BAGGE said: — I rise, to move that this Bill be read a third time on this day three months. I object to it because it goes to destroy those clauses of the Reform Bill which fixed the 10*l.* qualification; for it proposes, that if a man be once registered, he may leave the house for which he is so registered, and come back at the election, and vote for the borough. I have no objection to allow the man to vote, provided he be an inhabitant ratepayer at the time of voting; but I cannot consent to the alteration which this Bill would introduce. I therefore, Sir, move, as an amendment, to leave out from the word "now" to the end of the question, in order to add the words "this day three months."

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I second the amendment. I have read the Bill. I have taken some pains to understand it, with the view of giving an impartial vote upon it. I am quite willing to admit that there may be some hardship in the case of a person, removing from one tenement to another of greater value, in the same parish, thereby losing his vote. I quite agree, that it is hard that he should be disqualified from voting because he does not hold precisely the same house for which he is registered. But I am opposed to a measure, the object of which is, not merely to correct that evil, but to create a fictitious and improper qualification.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question."

Mr. EWART. — This is a Bill which must be of equal advantage to both sides of the House. No Honourable Member, who is in the habit of attending the proceedings at election committees, can have failed to see the necessity for some such measure. In the Carlow case, interminable disputes have arisen out of these removals.

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON. — Sir, I rise to order. The committee on the Carlow election have not yet given in its Report; any allusion, therefore, to its proceedings, is contrary to the Orders of the House.

The SPEAKER. — Certainly, no Honourable Member is at liberty to refer to the proceedings of any committee, before it shall have reported to the House.

Mr. EWART. — I am sure, Sir, that no Honourable Member can have attended to the proceedings of the various election committees which have sat in the course of the last few years, without feeling strongly the objections to which the existing system of registration is liable. We know that disputes are of constant occurrence in those committees; which disputes are decided only after great expense has been incurred by both parties in bringing forward witnesses to prove whether, perhaps, the key was taken out of the door? or whether some article of furniture was not left in the house?

[Cries of "Divide!" and, "Question!"]

I believe that neither party would obtain an advantage over the other by the Bill now before the House; but that it would confer a great benefit both on the elector and the elected.

Mr. BLACKSTONE. — When this Bill

was first introduced, I was inclined to support it; but, upon a more close examination, I find that it contains one proviso, which, unless it be removed, will compel me to vote against the third reading. As the Bill now stands, a voter might leave the house for which he was registered, and go to another twenty miles off, or he might even cross the sea, and come back at the election and give his vote. If the Honourable Member had consented to introduce an enactment, limiting the right to vote to those persons who should still be rated for the borough at the time of the election, I would have supported his Bill; but, without such a proviso, I shall feel it my duty to oppose its further progress.

Mr. WARBURTON. — The Honourable Member who has just sat down has stated the only objection which can possibly be taken to the Bill. But that objection is as nothing, compared with the great expense to which candidates are put in the cases of disputed returns. If the proviso, suggested by the Honourable Member (Mr. Blackstone), were introduced, you would still have the same difficulty which is experienced under the present law. The question would branch out into infinite ramifications. Questions would arise as to the nature of the rating; counsel would be employed on both sides; and the same expense, delay, and inconvenience, which we now complain of, would result. Therefore, for one, I entirely approve of the Bill in the shape in which it is now brought in.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON.—There is no species of bribery which is more common than that of paying the expenses of out-voters in coming to the poll. I consider this Bill to be a departure from the principle of the Reform Bill; inasmuch as it would allow persons to vote who possessed no real qualification; and therefore I shall support the amendment.

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON. —I think that one objection which cannot be answered is this: — Suppose a voter were to dispose of his qualification the day after his admission, ought he to be allowed to exercise the franchise, upon that same qualification, a twelvemonth after? Surely such a system cannot be permitted. I agree that, in those cases where parties merely remove from one house to another next door, of equal or superior value, and are known to be rated to the full amount, and to possess the qualification in every other respect, their names should be allowed to remain on the register. But those Honourable Gentlemen who represent large provincial towns well know what a vast number of changes take place in the constituencies, and how many of the voters lose their qualification in the course of every year; and I would appeal to those Honourable Gentlemen, whether we should not thus be opening the door to an endless system of fraud and abuse? and whether we should not, in fact, occasion even greater expenses to the candidates than they are now subjected to, by passing this Bill in its present shape?

Mr. ORMSBY GORE. — What is the principle of the elective franchise in this country? As I understand it, it is this; —that the members elected should be the representatives of those whose interests they are sent here to advocate, — that is, of those who have a bonâ fide interest in the place that returns the Member; but all interest ceases the moment the property which confers the vote ceases to be the property of the voter. I cannot understand on what principle it can be asserted that an individual, residing at the extremity of the kingdom, afer having parted with all right of property in Ipswich, or any other borough, should still retain the right of voting for that borough. Common sense is opposed to it. Now, suppose the case of an elector being entitled to vote at any election occurring within twelve months after he has removed from any town or borough, and that no objection is taken to his name at the next registry for such borough, — what would be the consequence? Why, that the voter, having left the borough, and having no sort of interest therein, might thus continue to vote at each election ad infinitum.

[Cries of "No, no!" and, "Hear, hear!"]

Surely the House will not stultify itself, by assenting to a Bill so repugnant to the principles of the Reform Bill.

Mr. BROTHERTON. — I can state, from experience, that, in a borough constituency of 2000, there will be 200 removals in twelve months; while, very probably, not more than 10 of the 200 will quit the town. A person might be rated to a 10*l.* house, which he might afterwards quit in order to take a 20*l.* house; and yet, at the election, he might not be a rated inhabitant of a 10*l.* tenement, though really occupying a better house, and having a larger interest in the borough. The question really is, — whether the House will agree to disfranchise the 190, because 10, perhaps, quit the borough in the year? As to what the Honourable Gentleman has said about remaining on the register for life, and voting all the time, it is perfectly impossible that any such thing could occur; because the overseers make out the register every year, and the premises would be returned either as vacant, or under the name of the new occupant. I hope the House will pass the Bill, because I believe its operation would be just to both parties.

SIR G. CLERK.—I wish to make a few remarks on the Bill, which I regard as a measure of considerable importance. At any rate, it is deserving of some discussion; and the more so, as it has passed on to its very last stage without any discussion whatever.

[Cries of "No, no!"]

At least, with but a short discussion. As to the probable effects of the Bill, I do not think it would act upon one party more than another; therefore we have to look upon it with regard only to its intrinsic merits, and with reference to the principles of the Reform Act. For myself, I will say, at once, that I am not prepared to maintain, that there is no hardship in the case of persons who, on removing to another tenement in the same borough, of equal value, are deprived of their vote. Parliament, I think, is bound to find some remedy for such an evil. But the Bill goes much further than this,—for it goes to admit the principle that a person who removes to the further end of the kingdom shall be still entitled to vote in the borough he has left. This, as has been well observed, is wholly opposed to the principle of the Reform Act. The Noble Lord (Lord Howick) said, the other night, in reference to that Act, that there was nothing to which he was more opposed than to a system of petty legislation on the subject of that great measure. I hope the Noble Lord will adhere to the sentiment he then expressed. At all events, I am convinced that the Government ought not to let this Bill pass into a law. The Honourable and Learned Attorney General, some short time back, brought in a Bill for the better Registration of Voters, the same nearly that he had brought forward on a former occasion; but, during the discussion, it having fallen out that the Government contemplated a larger measure, which would embrace the whole subject, the Honourable and Learned Gentleman accordingly thought fit to withdraw his Bill. Now, I do say, that when the Attorney General of the Crown was obliged to withdraw his Bill, because it was understood that this Government had in view a more comprehensive measure, it is too bad that this Bill should be allowed to pass. I am aware, however, that there may be circumstances which render this Bill more agreeable to Honourable Gentlemen opposite than if it had proceeded from other hands.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and laughter.]

But there is another point. I object to the Bill, also, because it interferes with the registration of electors in Scotland. There are, at this moment, two Bills before the House relating to that subject, which are totally inconsistent with this measure. The Registration Bill for Scotland takes away the right of voting, except the person shall reside within seven miles of the place for which he claims to vote. This Bill was brought in by the Lord Advocate, the Attorney General, and the Under Secretary of State. It excludes, too, those from voting, who shall have removed from the borough previous to the election. So that this Bill is directly opposed, in principle, to a Bill now before Parliament, and introduced under the immediate auspices of the Government. On these grounds I do hope that the Noble Lord will join with me in voting against the further progress of this measure.

LORD VISCOUNT INGESTRE.—I think this Bill is one which especially calls for a distinct expression of opinion on the part of her Majesty's Government. Honourable Gentlemen opposite appear to misunderstand the feeling on this side of the House with regard to this subject. We do not object to any person voting who has merely removed from one tenement to another in the same borough; but what we do object to is, that a man should have a vote for the borough, when he resides in a distant part of the country. That would be entirely inconsistent with the principle laid down by the Reform Act,—namely, that no person shall be allowed to vote at any election for any borough, who is not a rated inhabitant of that borough at the time of such election. I must be allowed to observe, also, that I think this measure would have exhibited to better advantage the good taste of its author, if it had come from the other side of the House.

The Honourable Member who is the author of this Bill is, I think, well entitled to the name of a "Conservative Radical." For my part, I think this Bill trenches upon the principle of the Reform Act; and, although I have always considered the Reform Act as fraught with danger to the country, — an opinion which I have, as yet, seen no reason to alter, — yet, as it is the law of the land, I will respect it, and therefore I shall oppose this Bill.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — It has been charged against this Bill, that it is one of those petty interferences with the Reform Bill which was adverted to and deprecated, the other night, by the Noble Lord the Secretary at War (Lord Howick). Now, I think that this is one of the most practical Bills that has ever been introduced into the House, because it is directed against an evil pressing equally on both sides of the House, and which all the constituencies in the country most wish to see removed. The Right Honourable Member for Stamford (Sir G. Clerk) has suggested that this Bill is inconsistent with the Registration (Scotland) Bill. But there is no analogy whatever between the registration in Scotland and the registration in this country. In Scotland, the registration is not renewed annually, as it is here. It might, perhaps, have been wise to have made the registration uniform in the three kingdoms; but that not being the case now, this Bill is very properly confined to England and Wales only. The objection is, that this Bill would create out-voters.

Several Honourable Members. — Hear, hear!

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — I am really astonished to hear that objection urged gravely. The Honourable Member for Salford has told us that 10 out of 200 persons annually removing may have left the borough; these, perhaps, may have removed to the suburbs, or to a distant part of the kingdom. But do not Honourable Gentlemen know that there are now, at every election, a great number of voters in boroughs, who, at the time of the election, may be residing at a great distance from the borough? You say that you would allow the party to vote, although he may have removed from the house for which he was registered, provided he be a rated inhabitant. But how would you ascertain whether he was rated at the time of the election, or not? Would you inquire of the parties themselves? And would you not, by such a system, increase those difficulties which the Bill seeks to remedy? The only objection in this Bill is, that a certain number of electors remaining on the registry would, for the current year, — for it is only for that time, — have a vote, while, according to the principle of the Reform Act, they should not be entitled to it. Now, I really think that objection is too minute to require notice. I believe this Bill to be a useful Bill, and one which will remedy an evil that has long been complained of; and therefore I wish to see it carried.

Mr. GOULBURN. — This is not a party question, and ought not to be discussed as such. The proposition is to give to persons who have no qualification, at the time of the election, a right to vote. Now, that is entirely at variance with the principle of the Reform Bill, which was, that no person should vote, who had not, at the time of voting, an interest in the place for which the representative was to be chosen. But while it interferes with this principle as regards boroughs and cities, this Bill does not touch counties. Then, you still say, if a party has lost his qualification, he shall not be allowed to vote. I say, if it be just to admit the principle in boroughs, that persons having no qualification shall be allowed to vote, it is equally proper that you should allow the county voter, who has changed his qualification, to vote in the same way. If the principle be good for boroughs, surely it is proper for counties; but if, on the other hand, the principle be improper, as applied to counties, I cannot conceive how it can be proper, as applied to boroughs.

Mr. M. GIBSON. — I am very glad to hear the Right Honourable Gentleman say that this is no party question; because I hope that the Noble Lord will take that remark as a gentle reproof for having said that the measure would have shown better taste if it had proceeded from the other side of the House. Such a remark could only have been dictated by party, and not public, spirit. As to the appellation of "Conservative Radical," I really do not know what is meant by it; I can only say, that the party who supported me at my election for Ipswich, have, through their leaders, most strongly requested me to bring forward this Bill. I am, therefore, placed in a very difficult position, — not knowing whom to please. The Honourable Member for Shropshire (Mr. O. Gore) has expressed a hope that the House will not stultify itself by passing this Bill. Now, the Honourable Member, as well as others, have spoken of this Bill as if it were an entirely new measure. But, in fact, a similar Bill was introduced, and passed through this House, in a former Parliament, of which, if I am not mistaken, the Honourable Gentleman was a Member; and I earnestly hope that he did not omit the opportunity of registering his vote in opposition to a measure to which he has just now so solemnly declared his objections. The House having entertained the former and similar Bill, I also hope they will not stultify themselves, by refusing to pass this.

The House then divided: — Ayes 137; Noes 122; — Majority 15.

REGISTER OF BIRTHS, &c. BILL.

Lord John Russell moved the further consideration of the Report on this Bill.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I was anxious to make some observations on the subject of registration of births and marriages under the Act which passed two Sessions ago, and I think the present is the opportunity which I should embrace for that purpose. When the Bill to which I allude passed, several objections were urged against it at this side of the House, and I was one among the objectors. It will be remembered, that I then stated that the proposed law would introduce a principle into marriages, which would have the effect of encouraging clandestine and illegal marriages to a greater extent than had been previously known. I am sorry to say my anticipations have been fully verified. In the other House, I find that a very remarkable case of this kind has been brought under notice; and it must have made a great impression on all who listened to it. I have received a great many communications from different parts of the country, stating that, in several instances, parties, whom the clergymen of the establishment had refused to marry, because of their coming within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or relationship, have been married at dissenting chapels under the certificate of the registrar; and all those evil consequences have followed, which such marriages usually entail. I learn, also, from some of the officers of the ecclesiastical courts, that the number of illegal marriages brought before those courts is, now, far greater than it was under the former state of the law. I will not weary the House by repeating the many cases that have been transmitted to me; but I will merely instance one or two, which will show sufficiently the condition of this matter. I will refer to two cases, both of which occurred in my immediate neighbourhood, and almost immediately at the same period. In the first case, a party gave notice of his intention to marry a woman at the parish church, by banns. The rector, on inquiry, found there were objections to the marriage, and told the parties that it could not take place in consequence of the affinity of the parties, — the woman being the man's former wife's sister's daughter. He also informed the registrar of the circumstance, and prevented the marriage taking place before him. Some time afterwards the rector of the parish went out of town; and on his return he found that a fresh application had been made, that they had obtained a certificate from the Registrar of Marriages, and were married at a dissenting chapel. The other case, which occurred in the same neighbourhood, and almost at the same period, was also one in which the parties came within the prohibited degrees. The banns were published; but it being ascertained that the woman was the sister of the man's late wife, the clergyman very properly refused to perform the ceremony. The parties, however, went to the registrar, and were married by his certificate at a dissenting chapel. These marriages, therefore, — as coming within the prohibited degrees of relationship, — are both illegal, and the children that may be born of them will be illegitimate. Then, the present system of registering births is most imperfect, and tends much to interfere with baptisms in the church. In the large parishes in the country this is found to be particularly the case. For instance, in Bury, in Lancashire, in 1836, the year before the Bill came into operation, there were 806 baptisms, while, in 1838, the number was only 579, — showing a diminution of 227. I also complain that, in some instances, in the metropolis, the rule has not been adhered to of appointing persons to offices under the Bill who have kept aloof from political agitation. I will instance a case in the parish of St. Giles, London, where a man was appointed who took a most prominent part at a public meeting against the church. I contend, also, from the documents on the table, that, so far from there being now settled a more complete system of births, deaths, &c., than formerly existed, the fact is directly the contrary, and more particularly so in the metropolis. Thus, in the returns for last year for the metropolis, I find that the number of registered births amounts to 37,731, while the number of deaths amounts to 53,511. Such is the return from the Registrar General's Office; and if this Return be correct, all the parishes in the metropolis must be in a state of gradually decreasing population. I believe, however, that the fact will be found to be, that there is an increasing population by births in most parishes. Taking, again, the proportion of births to baptisms, the latter would seem greatly to exceed the former! In the parish of St. George, Hanover Square, the Registrar General's return gives the number of births during the last year at 878, while the parochial returns give the number of baptisms at 1306. I may be told that children are brought from other parishes to be baptized here, but I am not aware whether this be the case or not. At any rate, it is an extravagant disproportion between the births and baptisms. Again, in the parish of Marylebone, according to the returns, there were 2500 births last year, while in the same time there had been 3700 deaths. According, then, to that return, a large proportion of the parish is dying off every year. The same observation applies to the parishes of Hackney and St. Pancras; and with regard to the two last-named parishes, it appears by the Registrar General's return, that the number of births registered was 725, while the number of baptisms was 981, in the former; and in the latter the births appear as 2100, and the baptisms as 2360: and the same would be the result of an inquiry with regard to all the large parishes. The chief ground upon which the Government introduced the Registry Bill, was, to afford a remedy for the inaccuracies of the registers kept by the parochial clergy. I do not think that the object has been attained. If this new system of civil registration is to go on, it is of the utmost importance that it should be strictly accurate. Up to the present moment, I must say that, so far from having given any additional security, the new system has only added to the embarrassments which existed previous to its adoption.

LORD J. RUSSELL.—I was not aware of the points to which the Right Honourable Gentleman intended to direct the attention of the House, or I should have gone into an examination of the returns to which he has alluded. But I cannot agree with him in thinking that there is any ground for disappointment as to the manner in which the Register Bill has been carried into effect. The Right Honourable Gentleman can scarcely say that the former system was not defective. However meritorious the parties who kept the registry of the baptisms and births may have been, it cannot be denied that the system was extremely defective; besides which, there was no place to which the registries from the various parishes could be transmitted, in order to be kept for reference. As the Bill passed, it left the system voluntary,—so that it could not be expected that it would be as effectual as though the registry were compulsory. The Right Honourable Gentleman has, no doubt, read the report of the Registrar General; and I will also quote from that report, upon the subject of the number of deaths that have been registered since the passing of the Act. It has been calculated that the proportion of deaths is 1 in 45 on the population; and, applying that rule to the year 1838, we find that the registry cannot be very far from correct. According to that calculation, the number of deaths would be, in the year, 340,505. Mr. Finlayson calculates the number at 335,968, while the number on the registry is 335,956,—being a difference of only 12 from Mr. Finlayson's calculation. With respect to the registry of births, there has, no doubt, been some deficiency; but not more so than I had expected, considering that the system of registration established by the Registration Act was entirely new, and varying, in some degree, from the previous habits of the people. But, although the Right Honourable Gentleman has alluded to the faults of the Registrar General, he has omitted to notice the conduct of many of the clergy, in influencing the people to refuse compliance with the law, and distributing among them written and printed notices that it was not necessary that they should comply with the provisions of the Registration Act. This being the case, I think it is not to be wondered at that many persons neglect or refuse to register the birth of their children. At the same time, I am glad to perceive that there is a gradual and general increase of the entries; for I find that the number of births registered for the quarter ending March last, was 113,815, while in the quarter ending in June, it appears that 121,781 births were registered. The average number of births in the year appears to be 480,000, while the number of baptisms, in 1838, was 449,000. I am glad to perceive that the majority of the people are conforming themselves to the law in this respect. Under the old law, there must have been very great inaccuracies in the registration of births, because many persons did not baptize their children at all, on account of their religious feelings being opposed to baptism; while many others did not baptize their children until they were six or seven years of age; so that there must have been a much greater deficiency in the registry of the actual number of births, than can be complained of under the present Registration Act. Then, with respect to the improper marriages to which the Right Honourable Gentleman has alluded, I believe some such cases may have occurred. I have heard of one, besides the two which the Right Honourable Gentleman has mentioned,—making three altogether. I do not say that there may not have been more; but these are all that I have heard of. With regard to one of these, a petition was presented to the other House of Parliament, complaining that the registrar had granted the certificate after the clergyman had refused to marry the parties. But this petition was immediately followed by another from another parish, in which it was complained that, in a case in which the registrar had refused to grant the certificate, the parties afterwards went to the parish church and were married by banns. In a very large population, whether the marriage takes place before a dissenting minister or a clergyman of the church, it may be impossible, in every instance, to prevent abuse. Those abuses might occur from the ignorance of the clergyman as well as from that of the officers; but, as many eyes are turned with jealousy and suspicion on the new Act, it is probable that cases may be found out and brought forward, which, under the old law, would have passed unnoticed. The Right Honourable Gentleman has referred to the appointment of certain persons to the office of registrars. On that subject I cannot speak, for the names of the parties have not come before me. I will not say that there may not be some defects in the Registration Act, which ought to be remedied; but I am not prepared, at present, to propose any remedial measure. I think it is better to wait until we see exactly what those defects are, before we propose any measure for their removal. I believe there are parts of the Act which may be rendered less distasteful to the clergy of the established church, as well as more convenient to the people. But while I admit this, I should be decidedly hostile to any attempt to repeal it; for I think, now, as I did when I brought in the Bill, that a complete civil register, where those accounts may be kept and searches made, is a most important matter to this country; and it is an advantage of which no civilised nation ought to be deprived. The object of Parliament ought not to be to limit or repeal such an Act, but to improve and extend it.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — Does the Noble Lord mean to persevere in the charges made by him against the clergy of the established church?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Perhaps it is a small proportion of the whole body who have shown this hostility to the Registration Act; but I must say that what I have imputed to them has taken place in several instances.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I rather think the Noble Lord is mistaken as to the nature of the exhortations of the clergy to their parishioners. The exhortations, I believe, were, that the people should not suffer the new law to prevent them bringing their children to church to be baptized.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL.—I can confirm the statement of the Noble Lord as to the hostility of the established clergy to this Act. I have been consulted by some persons whom a clergyman refused to marry, in pursuance of a certificate from the superintendent registrar. No indictment has been brought against that clergyman, and I hope none will be necessary; but the clergyman so persisted in his refusal, — and forbearance must, at length, have an end.

SIR R. INGLIS. — Will the Honourable and Learned Gentleman allow me to ask him, whether he considers the Act is imperative in requiring the ministers of every denomination to perform the ceremony of marriage under the certificate of the superintendent registrar?

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — If the Honourable Baronet will consult the Act, he will see that there is an express injunction, that, on the certificate being obtained, and presented to the clergyman, the ceremony of marriage is to be performed. And disobedience to the enactments of an Act of Parliament is an indictable offence, whether as regards a clergyman of the established church, or a dissenting sect.

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON. — The Noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) has brought a charge against the clergy of the established church; and on being asked if he meant to persevere in it, I thought he did not appear to be disposed to stick to his text. I would suggest to the Noble Lord, that when he makes accusations of this nature against the clergy, something more specific should be brought forward than has been advanced to-night. I know one instance of a most meritorious clergyman, who found it necessary, on account of the delusion which prevailed among the people as to the effect of the new law, to remind his parishioners, that no human enactment ought to cause the sacred rites of the church to be neglected.

Mr. BAINES. — So far as I have had an opportunity of testing it, the Registration Act has operated most beneficially — especially in those districts where it is most important that we should have a correct registry, for the purpose of ascertaining the ages of children employed in factories.

SHERIFF COURTS (SCOTLAND).

Mr. WALLACE. — Sir, I have a motion to make, of which I have given notice; but as there appear to be some considerable objections to it, I shall only move it, that it may appear in the votes, after being put and negatived. I therefore move, "That an humble Address be presented to her Majesty, that she will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House a copy of the resolutions which have been prepared by the sheriffs of Scotland for prescribing rules and forms for sheriff courts, in terms of the 1st and 2d Vic. cap. 119., and which have been submitted to the Court of Session, as by law required, on or before the 12th day of March, 1839: — Also, Copy of certain reasons of dissent from the proposals contained in the aforesaid resolutions, which were sent to and received by the sheriffs from the Society of Practitioners before the Law Courts of Perthshire, and signed by James M. Patten, Esquire, the president of the said society."

Question put, and negatived.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON. — I rise to move for a Return, of which I have given notice; it is, "That there be laid before this House, a Return of the number of students in the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth, during the years 1835, 1836, 1837, and 1838; the number, if any, expelled during each or any of those years, specifying the cause of such several expulsions; also, the number who have, during the same period, received testimonials for ordination."

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I am not aware of the object of this motion; but I see there is another on the paper, which appears to be consequent upon it; and if a discussion is likely to arise, I will put it to the Noble Lord whether it ought to be brought on at this late hour? I would suggest that it should be postponed to another evening.

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON. I do not see that my motion is in any ıy connected with that of the Honourle and Learned Member for Dublin,— which, of course, the Right Honourable entleman refers,—or that it is at all supementary to it. I think the information at I call for is necessary; and I consider at I am perfectly justified in making the otion.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXHEQUER. — I object to the motion on ther grounds. It moves for the names f persons of this college who have been xpelled, and the causes of their expulion. I think this is a return which we ave no right to call for.

SIR ROBERT INGLIS. — The College of Maynooth is supported by annual rant; and this circumstance creates a listinction between this college and other nstitutions, which are supported by prirate endowments.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — It is supported partly by private endowment, and partly by a public grant; and I think, if we were to call for a Return, such as that proposed by the present motion, it would be an interference which ought not to be permitted.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

LIEUTENANT COLONEL DURNFORD.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL presented a petition of Lieutenant Colonel Anthony William Durnford, complaining of having been dismissed from the office of Barrack Master at Chatham, and praying for inquiry. — To lie on the table, and to be printed.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE.

LORD BROUGHAM presented a Bill "to amend an Act of the fifth and sixth Years of the Reign of King William the Fourth, intituled, 'An Act to amend the Law touching Letters Patent for Inventions.'" — Read a first time; and to be printed.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — In moving the further consideration of the Bills of Exchange Bill, I beg to call the attention of your Lordships to the amendments which I have proposed. In one of the clauses, as it originally stood, the Bill extended only to Exchequer bills, Bank annuities, Bank stock, and South Sea stock; but I now propose to add the words "or any goods and merchandise, or warrants, or bills of lading." This proposed addition stands upon the same principle with the words originally introduced into the clause, — namely, the principle of giving to the parties whom this Bill is intended to relieve, every facility in the negotiation of their securities. Without these additional words, commercial houses might stand in need of relief, and yet not be able to obtain it; for instance, one house might be enabled to give a large amount of Exchequer bills, another South Sea stock, whilst a third might have in transitu many hogsheads of sugar, and a fourth might have a number of warrants or bills of lading; — now, would it be consistent with justice to deny to the last two houses the advantages given to the two former? If the object be, to have as little usury as possible, would not the denying this relief tend to increase the amount of usury? The desire of your Lordships, and the principle of this Bill, are — to give every facility to commercial houses; but you will not do so, unless you enable them to pledge, at pleasure, every description of floating property which they may possess. The benefit of such kind of advances cannot be sufficiently appreciated, without being cognizant of the pressure from which the city of London and other large towns will be relieved by the present Bill. I can satisfy your Lordships of the importance of these advances, by stating to you, that one of the first houses in this country, which I am able to name, was on the point of giving way in the crisis that occurred three years ago, but was saved by means of advances to an enormous amount from the Bank of England, though made only after much doubt and hesitation; and if that house had fallen, it would have involved in its ruin one half of the houses in Lancashire. In my opinion, your Lordships ought to enlarge the operation of this Bill so as to include every species of security.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—I merely rise to propose a verbal amendment. I would suggest the substitution of the word "or" between the words "goods and merchandise," for the word "and."

The amendments were then agreed to, and the Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

CHURCH DISCIPLINE BILL.

On presenting petitions against, — of clergy of the archdeaconry of Colchester; of clergy of the deanery of Oundle; and of clergy of Wetherby, —

The BISHOP of EXETER said: — I beg to take this opportunity of stating to your Lordships, that, having had the honour of being placed on the Select Committee on the Church Discipline Bill, I attended its first sitting; but the very first vote having negatived the principle which I deemed essential, I have abstained from attending upon it any further, and must therefore disclaim all share of the merit of any amendments made by the committee, on the Bill which has been submitted to them.

SPIRITUAL SERVICES OF PARISHES BILL.

Read a third time, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

SCOTCH CHURCH.

The EARL of ZETLAND presented petitions for the further endowment of, — of the presbytery of North Isles, Orkney: of the minister, elders, and others of the Middle Church congregation of the Middle parish of Paisley: and of inhabitants of Livingstone and Rousay; and Egleshay. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

PRISONS BILL.

The MARQUESS of SALISBURY.— I wish to ask the Noble Viscount opposite, when it is his intention to move the second reading of the Prisons Bill?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — On Thursday week.

EDUCATION (NATIONAL).

The BISHOP of LONDON presented petitions against the plan recommended by the Privy Council, — of the minister, churchwardens, and others of St. James's church, Ratcliffe, in the Tower Hamlets: and of inhabitants of Saint Mary, Woodford; Saint Lawrence Jewry, and Saint Mary Magdalen, Milk Street, London; Turvey; and Weston-Aston on Trent. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SABBATH.

The BISHOP of LONDON. — I beg leave to present a petition from churchwardens and overseers of the parish of St. Clement Danes, Westminster, in favour of some measure for insuring a better observance of the Sabbath, and compelling publicans and keepers of beer-shops to close their houses from twelve o'clock on Saturday nights, to one o'clock on Sundays. I believe that many publicans are not opposed to, but rather desirous of, such an alteration in the law.

LORD BROUGHAM. — So long as any two or three publicans can keep their houses open, all are obliged to do so. What they want is, power to prevent any from opening; and so far from looking on this change as a burden, they would think it a protection, for it would enable them to do safely what they wish to accomplish. There is a difficulty in the case of inns, which could not be conveniently shut up. However, I think that difficulty might be got over.

The BISHOP of LONDON.—I should like to see a stop put to Sunday trading altogether; and, as the question is one filled with legal difficulties, I do hope that the Noble and Learned Lord will consider and bring forward some measure to fect the wishes of the publicans.

LORD BROUGHAM. — From the ɔtes of another place, it appears that ere are great objections, there, to any easure of the kind. If the same good ɔirit existed in the other House as among ɔur Lordships, on this subject, I would illingly take it up. As it is, I will give ıe matter my best consideration.

The MARQUESS of SALISBURY. - I should be glad to know what the oble and Learned Lord intends to do ith respect to his measure on this sub- ect? I see, by accounts of what has assed elsewhere, that they are making a ew Beer Bill.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I cannot know hat they are doing elsewhere; but still, ntil we know what they shall have done n the other place, it may not be conve- ient to go on with the measure, here. I nderstand that there is a strong dis- osition, in a great body elsewhere, in upport of the principle of the Bill. Now, f I cannot get all I wish on this subject, am disposed to take all I can get, and I hink it better to wait to see what may be lone. If those in another place do not lischarge their duty, or if there be bad or hasty legislation, there, that will be a tronger reason for this House being strict n the performance of its duty. Probably I shall move the Beer Bill on Friday next.

The recommitment of the Bill was then, accordingly, fixed for Friday next; and the Lords summoned.

JAMAICA BILL.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — I intended to have moved the Order of the Day for the second reading of the Jamaica Bill; but, as I now understand there is to be a discussion on that stage, I will postpone the second reading till Monday next. I trust, however, that an early day will be fixed for going into committee; as it is desirable that, on so important a subject, the people of Jamaica should not be left in doubt.

The EARL of HAREWOOD. — I would suggest that your Lordships might go into committee on the Bill on Tuesday, if the Noble and Learned Lord, who has a motion for that day, would consent to postpone it.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I have no objection to comply with the request; but I hope that it will be understood, both in this House and in the country, that I do not give up my intention of moving the second reading of my Education Bill. It is better, however, to prevent anything intervening between the discussions on the Jamaica Bill; and I will, therefore, name Thursday for my motion.

JAMAICA.

Order of the Day for the second reading, and the Lords summoned; and for hearing William Burge, Esquire, agent for the Island of Jamaica; and also for hearing counsel for planters, merchants, and others interested in the colony of Jamaica, against the Bill, read. Counsel accordingly called in; and Mr. Burge, for the Island of Jamaica, addressed the House as follows: —

My Lords, I have the honour of appearing at your Lordships' bar as the agent of the Legislature of Jamaica, to defend that Legislature, and the people whom it represents, against the renewed attempt of her Majesty's Ministers, by the Bill now under your Lordships' consideration, to subvert their constitution.

My Lords, I say that this Bill does subvert the constitution of Jamaica, because it virtually suspends the functions of the Assembly, the popular branch of its Legislature; because, although it professes to leave the Assembly in the nominal exercise of those functions, yet it renders their exercise utterly incompatible with the existence of that body as a free and independent branch of the Legislature. My Lords, it does, then, subvert the constitution of Jamaica, and it does deprive the people of that colony of a form of government which they have enjoyed for nearly two centuries, and to which they consider themselves entitled as British subjects.

My Lords, the punishment which this Bill inflicts on the people of Jamaica, is, indeed, a heavy and severe punishment. They must have committed some heinous crime which merited it. The Bill before your Lordships — it might be expected — distinctly specifies in its preamble the nature of that crime, and her Majesty's Ministers are prepared to substantiate that crime by full and satisfactory proof. But, my Lords, there is no crime charged by the preamble against the people of Jamaica, because no crime has been committed by them. There is, indeed, a pretext assigned, in the preamble, as the ground upon which your Lordships are called upon to pass the Bill, — but it is a pretext which, under any circumstances, would not justify the punishment which this Bill inflicts: still less can it justify this Bill, when that pretext has been created by the conduct of her Majesty's Ministers themselves.

My Lords, the perseverance which her Majesty's Ministers have evinced in determining to supersede the Assembly of Jamaica, I should have been disposed to have attributed to that appetite for change in established institutions, which has been the disease of the last few years; but then, indeed, I found I could not attribute the change which this Bill would effect, to that appetite, because that was an appetite for a change professing to correct existing institutions, because they were supposed to be not sufficiently popular, and in their place to substitute institutions more popular. But the change to be made, now, is of a totally opposite character, and exhibits, indeed, an inconsistency, certainly not of so rare occurrence as on that account to excite surprise, whatever other strong feelings it may excite on account of the extent to which that inconsistency is carried.

My Lords, the proposed change would supersede a popular Assembly, and, in its stead, create a new and despotic form of government. I know not, therefore, to what cause it is to be attributed, unless, indeed, I am to suppose that either her Majesty's Ministers, themselves, are, or they suppose your Lordships to be, imperfectly acquainted with that constitution which it is the object of this Bill to destroy.

My Lords, I pray your Lordships' indulgence for a few moments, while I tell your Lordships what is the constitution which Jamaica possesses. I will tell you, my Lords, what that constitution is in the emphatic words of Mr. Burke, in speaking of the other colonial Governments in North America. Jamaica possesses "a constitution which, with the exception of the commercial restraints, has every characteristic of a free government. She has the express image of the British constitution — she has the substance — she has the right of taxing herself through her representatives in her Assembly — she has, in effect, the sole internal government of the colony." My Lords, Jamaica could have no other constitution consistently with the law and constitution of Great Britain, because those who were the inhabitants of that colony, when it was acquired by Great Britain, were not conquered Spaniards, — for none were then remaining in the colony, — but they were Englishmen. They carried to Jamaica the right of Englishmen, — the rights, too, of the British constitution, — the right, therefore, to a form of government which was based and founded upon the first principles of the British constitution.

My Lords, the original settlers of Jamaica, when they ceased to have a voice in making the laws of England, of necessity must possess, in the country where they had settled, a voice in making those laws by which they were to be governed, and in imposing those taxes and burdens which were necessary for the support of their civil government.

But, my Lords, the constitution of Jamaica, and its form of government, did not rest, alone, upon this title, high and paramount as it is. It is expressly recognised and confirmed by the proclamation which was issued by Charles II. in 1661, shortly after his restoration; and by that proclamation it is expressly declared, that "All children of any of the natural-born subjects of England to be born in Jamaica shall, from their respective births, be reputed to be, and shall be, free denizens of England, and shall have the same privileges, to all intents and purposes, as the free-born subjects of England."

My Lords, the Governor who was appointed shortly after that proclamation was issued, carried with him instructions to convène an Assembly. An Assembly was convened, which, within a few years after this period, consisted of thirty-two members. At present it consists of forty-five members.

My Lords, it was the fate of that Assembly, a few years afterwards, to encounter, from the Ministry of that day, an attack, similar, in many respects, to that which is made on their constitution by the Bill now before your Lordships. A scheme was formed by the Ministers of Charles II. to govern Jamaica nominally by the Assembly, but, in reality, by means of laws previously framed in England, and sent out to the Governor to be presented to the Assembly, and their concurrence to be given, without any deliberation on the subject of those laws. In short, my Lords, the scheme was to introduce into the colony of Jamaica, Poyning's Law. My Lords, that scheme seems to have formed the model for the measure which is before your Lordships. In one respect, that scheme had a merit which the present does not possess, — it had the merit of avowing its purpose, of really doing that which it professed to do; hereas the peculiar character of the heme now before your Lordships is, at it does what it professes to abstain om doing — it does indirectly, that which does not do directly. By the circuitous eans of a Governor, with the aid of his uncil, it makes the Assembly a nominal irty in enacting, as laws, instructions or rections which the Colonial Office may, om time to time, transmit to the Go-ernor.

My Lords, I may venture to say that, all events, the Ministers of Charles II., proposing that scheme, acted in per-ct consistency with their professed prin-ples. They composed a Government ot professing liberal principles, and pro-osing arbitrary measures. Their Go-ernment contented itself with being nown only by its arbitrary acts. It did ot endeavour to obtain the aid of the rinciples which it professed, to carry easures directly opposed to those prin-iples.

My Lords, Lord Carlisle was the Go-ernor intrusted by that Ministry to exe-ute this scheme of calling upon the amaica Assembly to pass the laws which he Government, from time to time, sent ut. He was furnished with a body of aws; — he arrived in Jamaica in 1678. Ie proposed those laws to the Assembly f Jamaica. They were Englishmen, my ords; they knew the rights to which hey were entitled; — they had the ho-iesty to resist all the various means which ere resorted to for the purpose of pro-uring their compliance. They refused o pass any of those laws. The Governor esorted to measures of violence; he re-noved some, arrested and imprisoned ther judges and members of the council.)ne of them, whose name is well known n the history of Jamaica, was brought rom thence to this country as a prisoner. My Lords, the people of Jamaica did, in hose days, what is now considered a rime; — they appealed to their Sovereign gainst the arbitrary conduct of that So-ereign's Ministers. My Lords, their ate did not depend upon the will of the Ministers; — it was not left to the feel-ngs of wounded pride, or of disappoint-ment at a party defeat, to dispose of the nherent rights of the people of this co-lony. Their resistance to that arbitrary scheme, and their right to retain the free constitution which they had acquired, became the subject of grave and solemn deliberation before the Privy Council, at which the Chief Justice of England as-sisted. The result was, my Lords, that that scheme was abandoned. A new com-mission was sent to the Governor, Lord Carlisle. Under that commission, in 1680, the established constitution of Jamaica was again recognised; and it was declared that the Acts passed by the three branches of its Legislature should at once obtain the full force and effect of laws, and their operation should not be subject to be suspended until the Sovereign's pleasure was known. They were subject, of course, to disallowance by the Sovereign; but, until that disallowance were given, they remained in full force and effect.

My Lords, under the constitution of Jamaica, its Legislature consists of the Sovereign, represented by the Governor, a Council composed of twelve persons, and an Assembly consisting of forty-five persons, returned by the freeholders of the different districts. These are the three branches by whom those laws were to be passed, to which that effect was given, both by the original proclamation of Charles II. in 1661, and by the subsequent commission which was granted in 1680.

My Lords, there arrived another memorable period in the history of Jamaica, in the year 1728. There had been an attempt, for some few years preceding, to obtain from the Assembly of Jamaica a permanent revenue. The Assembly refused to grant their supplies, except from year to year, unless they were secure of their appropriation to the service of the island. In the year 1728, that contest between the Crown and the Assembly of Jamaica was terminated by the Crown giving up, on its part, the title to the quit rents of the colony; and, on the other, receiving a permanent revenue of 8000*l.* per annum: but the special purposes to which that sum was appropriated, were named in the very Act by which it was granted. That law continues in force; and it contains an express provision that all the "laws, statutes, usages, and customs of England, shall continue the common laws of his Majesty's Island of Jamaica for ever."

My Lords, there is one other period to which I must advert, because it terminated in an important law, — not, indeed, applicable to Jamaica exclusively, but to all our colonial possessions. I mean, my Lords, the Act which was passed in 1778, to restore to the colonies that confidence in the justice and the protection of the parent state which had been, unfortunately, forfeited by the unnatural contest in which Great Britain had been previously engaged with her colonies in America. That Act, the 18th of Geo. III. chap. 12., expressly enacts and declares, that neither the Crown nor the Parliament of England would, at any time thereafter, impose any burden, tax, or duty upon the people of the colony, but left it to themselves, by their representatives, to do so. The only duties which the Imperial Parliament retained to itself the right of imposing, were those in respect of commerce; but the proceeds of those duties, so imposed, were only applicable to the purposes of the colony.

My Lords, those attempts to violate the fundamental principles of the constitution of Jamaica, which immediately preceded the year 1728, were attempts on the part of the executive Government alone. It says much for the Parliament of that day, whatever it may say for the Parliament of the present, that no House of Commons presented materials which could hold out an expectation that the Government would obtain its sanction to the adoption of those measures which violated the constitution of the colony.

My Lords, there have been, certainly, occasions in which Governors, sometimes from bad feeling, at other times from ignorance or inexperience, have made attempts to deprive the Assembly of some of those privileges which were essential to the efficient discharge, by that body, of their legislative functions.

My Lords, I shall call your Lordships' attention, in a very few words, to some of those attempts; because it seems to me they may furnish a very useful lesson as to the course which should be adopted by Governors and Secretaries of State upon similar occasions, and because they also show that the course which the Assembly of Jamaica adopted in 1838, and which is made the pretext for depriving them of the free exercise of their legislative functions, is precisely the course which the Assembly adopted on former occasions, when there had been an interference with their rights; and which course, so far from calling upon the Government for condemnation, did not even interpose an obstacle to their rendering to the Assembly full and complete reparation.

My Lords, in 1764, a very distinguished person, who was then Governor of the island,—Mr. Littleton,—attempted to deprive the Assembly of Jamaica of a privilege belonging to that body, and essential to the effective exercise of its functions. In his character of Chancellor, he discharged two persons who had been committed by the House of Assembly for a breach of their privileges. The House of Assembly, upon ascertaining that fact, came to a resolution by which they declared, that that act of the Governor was a breach of their privileges; and that, until a reparation had been made, they would not proceed to transact any further business. Such was the language of the resolution of the House of Assembly in 1765.

My Lords, Mr. Littleton prorogued the Assembly — dissolved the Assembly — convened another Assembly — prorogued it — and dissolved it; — and in that state did the colony of Jamaica continue till the 24th of June, 1766, — a period of two years, — when Mr. Littleton was recalled, and Mr. Elliston was appointed the Governor. One of the first acts which he was directed to perform upon his assuming the administration, was to convene the Assembly, to acknowledge the breach of privilege committed by his predecessor, and to express, on behalf of his Sovereign, the condemnation of the breach of privilege. The Governor, under those directions, in the presence of the Council and the Assembly, called before him the Registrar of the Court of Chancery, and erased from its records that proceeding of Mr. Littleton, by which, in his character of Chancellor, he had discharged those persons who had been committed by the House of Assembly.

My Lords, in the following year the Government made an application to the Assembly to be reimbursed those advances which the Treasury had made, in consequence of the suspension of the sitting of the Assembly for two years. The Assembly refused to accede to that application. "The intermission," said the Assembly, "which has taken place in our sittings, has been occasioned by the conduct of your Governor. We can be called on to discharge those burdens only which we have consented to impose on ourselves, and which are applicable to the purposes of the island. We have not authorised him to draw on the Treasury; we cannot sanction Mr. Littleton's conduct; it would afford an example the most dangerous. A Governor might, with impunity, invade the rights and privileges of the Assembly, if the Assembly provided for those sums which had been advanced without their authority, whilst his conduct had deprived them of the exercise of their legislative functions." In the subsequent Session the Government renewed the application; the Assembly persevered in their refusal; and the Government abandoned the claim.

My Lords, another instance occurred in the year 1808, at the commencement of the government of the Duke of Manchester. The Assembly claimed, as an essential part of their constitution, the right to examine witnesses at their bar, or before their committees. A gallant officer, Major General Carmichael, who was then the commander-in-chief of the forces in the island, considered that it was not proper for him to appear before a committee. The Duke of Manchester expressed his concurrence in this view. The House of Assembly came to a resolution nearly in the language of the resolution of 1838, that the refusal of that officer to appear, and the conduct of the Governor in sanctioning that refusal, was a breach of the privileges of the House, and that they would proceed to no business until reparation had been afforded them. My Lords, the Governor, the Duke of Manchester, prorogued the Assembly, and referred to the Government here. My Lords, the subject was much discussed by the Government. Their decision was, that the interference, on the part of the Duke of Manchester, and the refusal, on the part of General Carmichael, were not warranted by the principles of the constitution which the people of Jamaica possessed; and the Duke of Manchester was directed to convene the Assembly, and make adequate reparation. He did so. That reparation was made; and it was met in the spirit in which every attempt towards conciliation by the Government in this country has been met by the people of Jamaica. It was met more than half way; they called General Carmichael before them, to assert their right, but forebore examining him at all.

My Lords, an instance occurred in 1836, in which another attempt was made to interfere with one of their rights, — with the freedom of debate. The Marquess of Sligo, then the Governor, took upon himself to send down a message to the Assembly on the subject of a Bill which was then pending between the Assembly and the Council. The Assembly expressed their determination, in the same language as they used in 1838, to abstain from any business whatever, until reparation had been made to them. This took place on the 2d of February, 1836. The Marquess of Sligo persisted in asserting that he had been guilty of no breach of the privileges of the House, — that he was right. He prorogued the Assembly; the Assembly again met; he continued to maintain his former assertion; the Assembly renewed their resolution. An appeal was then made to the Government; and Lord Glenelg appears to have received, on the 19th of March, a statement of this proceeding on the part of the Marquess of Sligo; and, on the 31st of the same month, he addressed a despatch to the Marquess, in which he distinctly stated to him that he had been guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House, and called upon him to make reparation. He did make that reparation frankly; it was met by the Assembly; they, at once, expressed themselves perfectly satisfied with it, and then proceeded with their functions. "We are perfectly satisfied," they say, "with the reparation which your Excellency has offered for the breach of our privileges which led to the late prorogation of the Assembly."

Now, my Lords, what is the neeessary effect of these attempts, on the part of the Government, to interfere with the rights and privileges of the Assembly of Jamaica, and the success which attended the resistance of that body? My Lords, it has taught the Assembly of Jamaica to be jealous of their rights and privileges. It has also taught them to maintain those rights and privileges with uncompromising firmness. My Lords, I ask your Lordships to bear this in recollection, when you examine the proceedings which took place in 1838, and the resolutions which they then adopted, and which are made the pretext for those measures by which their constitution is to be subverted.

My Lords, such is the history of the constitution of Jamaica. Under that constitution, this great colony has prospered. It comprises, as your Lordships are aware, at least one half of the population of all your West Indian possessions. It gives you in imports into this country 4,000,000*l.*; it receives from you in exports from hence nearly 3,000,000*l.* Well did it merit the description which it received from that great naval hero, Lord Rodney, — "It is the brightest jewel in the British diadem." Against the constitution of that colony her Majesty's Ministers have directed their attack. My Lords, the measure which they first adopted to effect this purpose, openly and undisguisedly suspended the functions of the Assembly for the term of five years, and transferred those functions to the Governor in council. It thus united the whole Legislative and Executive Council in the same body. It gave to the Governor the power to raise and to dispose of the revenue of that colony, and to disburse its expenditure, to the amount of 500,000*l.* He was, indeed, to be aided by two or three salaried commissioners, sent from this country under the appellation of councillors, nominated by the Crown. This part of the arrangement did not, nor was it necessary that it should, appear upon the face of the Bill, inasmuch as the Crown, by virtue of its own prerogative, would appoint those persons. That appointment being thus made, the Bill amply provided the means by which those same three commissioners, having sat in judgment upon the merits of their own services, might, in conjunction with the Governor, levy the taxes by which they might pay themselves the salary they had found their services had merited.

My Lords, I am grieved to say that this measure was introduced into Parliament without any previous intimation to the Assembly. As early as the 10th of December in the last year, the Government became acquainted with the resolutions which were considered to have offered a ground upon which the measure could be sustained. My Lords, it was the desire of the person who has now the honour of appearing at your bar, to obtain, in his character of agent, from the Government, some intimation of the course which was intended to be pursued by them in consequence of those resolutions, before they came to any decision upon it. My Lords, the agent was apprised of this Bill, which was to suspend the constitution of his constituents, a few hours before it was introduced into the other House of Parliament, and the very day after the packet had sailed, and when, of course, fourteen days must elapse before he would have an opportunity of conveying any intimation of it to his constituents in Jamaica. My Lords, one evil has resulted from that course. As the persons with whom that agent corresponds, — the Committee of Correspondence, — are the Members of the Council, and all the Members of the Assembly, an opportunity was lost to the Government of knowing the views and sentiments which were entertained by the Assembly upon the particular measure which the Government were about to introduce, and the opportunity was lost of enabling their representative to state to you what the course was which they would take upon all the ulterior measures which the Government might think proper to adopt.

My Lords, that measure was opposed by the great body of the Jamaica proprietors in this country. There were some, unquestionably, who supported that measure; but, my Lords, it is no disrespect to them to say, that neither in numbers nor in the value of their interests did they bear any proportion to those who had a clear, decided conviction, that this measure was injurious to all classes of the community in Jamaica, and who, for that reason, opposed it.

My Lords, when this measure was originally proposed, the real reason for its adoption, as it was avowed everywhere but in the preamble of the Bill, was, that the existence of Legislative Assemblies was incompatible with the recent emancipation of the negro population. Short-sighted men! Did they, indeed, flatter themselves that such a reason could long stand the test of public feeling or of public judgment? Could they expect, my Lords, that the people of England would endure, after the noble sacrifice which had been made to effect the great measure of emancipation, to be told that, although they had granted to the negro population the rights of freemen, they could not safely give them the political rights to which, as freemen, they were entitled? My Lords, would the people of England endure that it should be held out to the States of America, as the doctrine of England, that if they emancipate their three millions of slaves, they must abolish their representative form of government? My Lords, the people of Jamaica, themselves, never harboured the design; the great body of Jamaica proprietors in this country repudiated the design of withholding from the emancipated population any of the political rights to which freemen are entitled.

My Lords, when, in the discharge of my duty, I was heard elsewhere against this measure, I disclaimed any such design. I disclaimed, too, any apprehension on the part of the Assembly of Jamaica, that the interests of the other classes of the community could be prejudiced by admitting the emancipated population to the exercise of those franchises which other freemen enjoyed under the law. My Lords, the original reason for proposing this measure had been avowed with so little reserve, that the Emancipation Society actually menaced an opposition to this Bill; for they considered it directly injurious to the rights of the emancipated population. My Lords, when that opposition was menaced, — and when, my Lords, I had ceased to be in a position to be heard in defence of the Assembly and people of Jamaica, — this reason was abandoned; the only pretext which was assigned in the Bill was abandoned. A new motive was suggested for this measure; it was said, "Annihilate the Assemblies, because you cannot intrust them with legislation for the emancipated population."

My Lords, what can be the information which they possess respecting the constitution of Jamaica, who could either raise or attend to this senseless cry? My Lords, the Assembly cannot legislate; the Assembly is only a single branch of the Legislature of the colony; and if the legislation of the Assembly is not that which

s adapted to the new state of society, — if here be in it that which there is any pre-ext for saying savours of injustice or op-›ression towards the emancipated popula-ation,—there are two checks in the colony ›n that legislation,—two authorities which :an be interposed to correct or prevent it, — and there is, ultimately, the watchful ›ye of the Colonial Minister in Downing Street, who, by his advice, recommends the Sovereign to disallow any laws which ought not to be passed.

My Lords, nothing more completely proves how hollow and unfounded was this pretext, than the fact, that there are sixteen colonies having Legislative Assemblies, and that, in several, there are wanting laws upon many subjects which are deemed essential. But if the objection were just, that legislation could not take place with due regard to the emancipated population, in consequence of the previous relation in which the different classes of society stood towards each other, this Bill ought to have extended to all other colonies. Parliament should have been called upon to sanction a principle applicable to all, and this Bill would not be confined to Jamaica alone.

My Lords, it was the fate of that measure, in consequence of a very unequivocal expression of the opinion of the House of Commons, to be abandoned by her Majesty's Ministers. My Lords, after the abandonment of that Bill, which, upon the face of it, professed to do that which constituted the objection to it, and that which influenced its abandonment, — namely, that it suppressed the Assembly, and suppressed a new and despotic form of government, — it does pass all comprehension that there should have been entertained by Parliament this new Bill, which effects the same purposes, — not, indeed, openly, — not, indeed, in terms, but in substance and in effect. My Lords, I defy the wit of man to point out in what respect the present Bill differs from that which the Government abandoned, except that there is wanting in it the honesty and candour to avow the purpose which it means to accomplish — the wrong which it means to inflict upon the people of Jamaica.

My Lords, before I call your Lordships' attention to the particular characteristics of this second Bill, I beg to state to your Lordships the proceedings which took place upon the abandonment of the former Bill. My Lords, the great body of Jamaica proprietors in this country, who had offered their opposition to that measure, and had resolved to oppose it in every stage of its progress through Parliament, were again assembled; and, in that hour of success, they repelled, by their resolutions, the insinuation which had been made, and the calumny which had been circulated,—that they were looking to a triumph, in the possibility that bad legislation might be retained, and good legislation prevented, — that they had no feeling, and no consideration, but for their own personal interests, — and that, to the real effect of this Bill, which was a disfranchisement of the negro population, as well as of the other classes of the community, they were indifferent. My Lords, they adopted the following resolutions on the 10th of May: —

Resolved, — 1st. That this meeting, anxious to protect the rights of the emancipated population of Jamaica, no less than those of the other classes of the community, disapprove of the late Bill, which would have deprived the emancipated population of those elective franchises which, from the small value of the qualification, and the facility of its acquisition, might be, and are, so completely within their reach. And they all disapprove of that Bill, because, among other things, it would inevitably have excited the distrust of the emancipated population towards the other classes of the community, by the disparagement and degradation to which it would have subjected those classes, and thus obstruct the beneficial working, and endanger the successful issue, of the great measure of emancipation.

2d. That this meeting feel very anxious that the Legislature of Jamaica should be guided by that spirit which will best secure the successful issue of the great measure of emancipation, but maintain the principle, that the people of Jamaica are free inhabitants of a free country, and equally entitled to enjoy every benefit of the British constitution, and thus most effectually realise the reasonable expectations of the people of this country.

3d. That this meeting declare their confident belief that the desire to avoid every act of oppression towards the emancipated population, and to preclude every step which might create a distinction to their prejudice, is entertained by, and will influence, the Assembly and inhabitants of Jamaica.

4th. That this meeting will cordially and earnestly co-operate in promoting and encouraging, amongst their fellow colonists in Jamaica, the foregoing principles, and in cultivating amongst them those feelings of confidence and conciliation which best maintain the relation between a colony and the parent state, and can alone insure the mutual prosperity and happiness of both countries.

My Lords, these resolutions were communicated to her Majesty's Ministers. On the 14th of May, at the earliest possible moment after the reappointment of the Government, I sought an interview with the Colonial Secretary. I earnestly implored the Government to avail itself of the opportunity afforded by the sailing of the Jamaica packet on the succeeding day, and, without any further attempt to obtain the interposition of Parliament, to appeal, in a spirit of frankness and conciliation, to the Assembly of Jamaica, to rely upon the co-operation which the resolutions imported the Government would receive from the great body of proprietors here, which they had promised to give, and which they would give, by the packet, and to leave the Assembly to resume its legislative functions; and to confide in the expectation entertained by those who waited as a deputation upon the Ministers, that the Assembly would at once resume them, as they had done upon former and similar occasions. My Lords, that application was renewed,—but renewed without effect. It was determined by the Government to adopt parliamentary legislation.

My Lords, I deeply regret this determination. There were numerous considerations to have restrained the Government from taking it, and to have induced them to adopt that course which we recommended.

My Lords, in adopting that course, they would have had an abundant justification, in the sense which had been expressed by the House of Commons, upon the question of parliamentary interposition. They would have had an abundant justification, in the clearly-expressed opinion of a large body of Jamaica proprietors, that such a course would, alone, promote the interests of all classes of the community, and in the well-grounded assurance which the Jamaica proprietors gave the Government, that they had co-operated, and would co-operate, with their fellow colonists, in inducing them to meet, in a spirit of conciliation, a final and amicable adjustment of the misunderstanding between the Government and the Assembly.

My Lords, that earnest representation, on the part of the Jamaica proprietors, had no effect upon the Government. They introduced the Bill which now lies on your Lordships' table. My Lords, I have described this Bill as rendering the exercise of the functions of the Assembly of Jamaica wholly incompatible with the existence of that body as a free and independent branch of the Legislature. My Lords, there can be no difficulty in proving the correctness of this description. It gives, as your Lordships are aware, to the Governor, with the advice and consent of the Council, the power of enacting laws and ordinances on three specified subjects, if Acts of the Governor, Council, and Assembly, upon all or either of those subjects, have not previously been passed. Now, my Lords, those subjects are, in themselves, of great importance, both with respect to the details of the measures which ought to be adopted, and require the application of great local practical experience. Upon these details there may be much difference of opinion amongst persons equally desirous of attaining the same object. Upon these three subjects, then, the Assembly must proceed to legislate, with the knowledge that, if the Council should suggest any amendments in which the Assembly did not and could not concur, or if the Governor should not concur in the enactments which the Assembly and the Council might make, the power of legislation by the Assembly, upon those subjects, must cease, and become transferred to the Governor, who, with the advice of the Council, is to take, as models, certain Orders in Council for the Crown colonies, which have been passed in relation to those subjects—Orders in Council, my Lords, in all probability prepared by some learned gentleman in the Colonial Office, who has no notion whatever of Jamaica, except that which he might have derived from looking at the map on the walls of his office.

Now, my Lords, I ask, whether it ever before occurred to the mind of any statesman, to present to the British Parliament, for its sanction, a measure which armed each of the three branches of a Legislature with the power of destroying the entire Legislature, by destroying the third branch? My Lords, I suppose that the life, and soul, and essence of every branch of the Legislature is its free will; but where is the free will that the Assembly can possess or exercise, if they proceed to legislate, either after a previous communication with the Council, or with the Governor, to ascertain the particulars to which these two branches will assent? or if, after having expressed their own opinion by an enactment, to which the Council makes an amendment, they must surrender that opinion by yielding to the amendment made by the Council, in order to prevent that event arising, which is to enable the Governor to say, "There is no Act passed by the Governor, Council, and Assembly, because the Council has not concurred in the Bill passed by the Assembly, or I have not given my assent to that which has been passed by the Assembly, and assented to by the Council; I therefore enter upon the exercise of that despotic power which is delegated to me by this Act?" My Lords, I believe it to be unexampled in legislation, that you should arm a person with that power,—furnish him with a temptation to create the very occasion in which he is to acquire sole and exclusive power to himself, and destroy the concurrent power possessed by another branch of the Legislature.

My Lords, I have supposed each of the two branches of the Legislature, the Governor and Council, to be acting bonâ fide, — to be seeking for no opportunity to supersede the Assembly; although, my Lords, that is a supposition which I am bold, indeed, to entertain, after having heard the language of her Majesty's Government, that the time has arrived for putting an end to the Assembly; and notwithstanding I see a law passed to goad them to a crisis which will enable the Government to come down to Parliament, and say, "The Assembly will not proceed to legislate; and I call upon you, now, to put an end to the Assembly, and to create a new form of government." Here are forty-five practical men, having an intimate local knowledge of the colony; they enter into the consideration of each of the three subjects mentioned in the Bill, — namely, vagrancy, the relation between masters and servants, and the illegal occupation of land; they examine the provisions of the Orders in Council; they make a law adapted to the circumstances of the colony. The Council suggest an amendment, — that Council, your Lordships observe, being in communication with the Governor, knowing the views and instructions of the Colonial Office, and acting very frequently in compliance with the suggestion which the Governor gives them under the instructions he has received. Well, my Lords, the Assembly honestly believe that the amendment which the Council, at the instance of the Governor, or at the instance of the Government in Downing Street, have made, is not adapted to the circumstances of the colony, and that it would defeat the object they all have equally in view. The Assembly considers that it cannot make itself a party to an amendment of which it disapproves; the Council may maintain, with equal confidence, the correctness of their opinion, and the expediency of their amendment, although some of them — my Lord Bishop of Jamaica, or the Chief Justice of Jamaica, and others, the more immediate functionaries of the Crown — may not have the same practical knowledge of the country as the forty-five gentlemen in the Assembly. Still, they may adhere honestly to their opinion; they may refuse to withdraw the amendment; and the consequence would be, as your Lordships know, that the Bill would remain with the Council. The Bill has come up to the Council, but not being concurred in by the Council, it is not presented to the Governor for his assent; and the occasion then arises in which the Governor himself is to assume legislation, by passing a law upon the subject of that Bill.

He is then invested with that power. How, my Lords, are the Assembly to prevent it? They can only prevent it by surrendering their own judgment, and by acquiescing in an amendment which their conscience tells them may be injurious to the interests of those who send them as Members into the Assembly. My Lords, can this be called a free Legislature? Can you say the Assembly is left to the exercise of its legislative functions, when the exercise of them must be subject to the will — subject to the opinion and judgment — which the Council, acting perfectly bonâ fide, may have pronounced upon the matter?

But, my Lords, let me carry the case still further. This Bill will, in effect, introduce Poyning's Law, the object of the Ministry of Charles II. in 1687; circuitously, indeed, — but it will introduce it into Jamaica as completely and effectually as the commission of 1678 enabled Lord Carlisle to enforce that law. For what will the Governor do? The Council and the Assembly have both passed an Act; but the Governor has in his pocket his instructions from Downing Street, — instructions which tell that Governor not to give his assent to this or that Act, unless it has such and such provisions in it. Who is making the law, then, my Lords? The same authority which was to make it under the system of Poyning's Law, and under the system introduced into Jamaica by Lord Carlisle's commission; the Government in this country, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and those to whom he surrenders his judgment, — all those persons in this country, be they the Emancipation Society, or be they any other persons who choose to come to Downing Street with their crude and rash legislation. The Governor must make that the model for the Bills which come up from Council and the Assembly; and to those only which are in accordance with that model is he to give his assent. Without imputing anything wrong to the Governor, but admitting him to be actuated only by the desire of strictly discharging his duty in conformity with the instructions he has received, this Bill arms the Government with the power of legislating, through his intervention, — a power which this Bill durst not give the Government, after the fate of the former Bill.

My Lords, the effect of this Bill is, then, I say, at once to leave the Assembly deprived of that, without which no branch of the Legislature would desire to have an existence. It is to leave them with a responsibility for acts of legislation over which, in truth, they have no control, no power; because, whatever control or whatever power they might be disposed to exercise, as the result of their own judgment, they must, in order to continue their legislation, surrender to the views of the Council or the Governor.

My Lords, this Bill, by allowing a branch of the Legislature to hold its existence, under such conditions and restrictions, possesses a character which makes it more injurious and oppressive even than that which the Government abandoned. To destroy an existing branch of the Legislature, openly and avowedly, is a less evil than to make it the instrument of its own destruction. My Lords, that is the effect of the present Bill; and your Lordships must see, from its enactments, that it leaves the Assembly in a condition so degraded, that if they continued to act — or rather professed to act — as a legislative body, there is no unfounded calumny by which that body has been attacked, equal to the reproach they would deserve to incur.

My Lords, the second clause of this Bill has all the objections which are applicable to the first clause; but it has objections, also, peculiar to itself, — objections, my Lords, which do not diminish the weight of the unanswerable objections which exist against the first clause; but, my Lords, they are objections in addition to those which oppose the first clause. My Lords, I believe it is the first time in the history of its legislation, that Parliament has been called upon to give a power to a body to revive and re-enact temporary laws which, for anything that appears upon the face of the Bill, Parliament knows nothing of. My Lords, is the Act to speak for itself? or is there to be a running commentary upon it by the Secretary of State for the Colonies? Because your Lordships, if you give effect to this clause, are empowering the Governor, with the advice and consent of the Council, to re-enact temporary laws, the nature of which you cannot know in the only way in which Parliament ought to know it, — namely, by a specification of those temporary laws in the Bill.

But, my Lords, there is another singular feature in this power to revive and re-enact temporary laws. Primâ facie, a temporary law is one which has passed pro re natâ. It is a law of experiment; it is intended to see how it will act. After that experience it may be found not necessary to re-enact it; it may be an unwise law, or it may require an amendment. But to re-enact a temporary law — your Lordships not knowing from this Bill how that temporary law will act — is in opposition to the presumption that, being a temporary law, it is not a law to be re-enacted, or to be re-enacted in its original state.

But, my Lords, there is another and a further objection to this second clause. Several of these temporary Acts are Money Bills. My Lords, by the 18th of George III. chapter 12., the King and Parliament of Great Britain, in the solemn language of that Act, renounced for themselves the power of imposing, by declaring that they would not impose, any duty, tax, or assessment, whatever, in any of the colonies; that power was left to the people of the colonies by their representatives in their Assemblies; yet, having renounced that power, — having declared Parliament would not exercise it, but leave it to the Assemblies, — Parliament is now about to resume that, by transferring its exercise to the Governor in council. My Lords, is not this clause, then, a direct infringement of the statute of the 18th of George III. cap. 12.? If Parliament do not retain that power, itself, I humbly ask upon what authority can Parliament delegate it to the Governor? What, my Lords, re-enact temporary Money Bills! The Assembly enjoys, and, from its first establishment, has enjoyed, the exclusive privilege of originating every Money Bill, and of exercising a complete, uncontrolled, and uncontrollable discretion as to the money which they will raise, and as to the purposes to which they will apply that money when it is raised. They will neither allow the Governor nor the Council to touch one of the Bills which the House has originated for either of these purposes. They maintain this to be their constitutional privilege. What, then, my Lords, are you doing by this Bill? The only person who is to exercise a discretion is the Governor, with the advice of his Council. My Lords, the Assembly may consider that the tax which was imposed in 1837, and which expired in 1838, in the altered circumstances of the colony, is not proper, — that the revenue may be raised by some other means; they may consider that it is not just to their constituents to burden them with a tax, which is either grievous in its amount, or improper as to the subject, or unequal: they, therefore, do not, in the exercise of their discretion, re-enact that tax. But what does this Bill enable the Governor to do? To re-enact it; — he has the absolute power of re-enacting it; — it is competent for him, with the advice and consent of the Council, to re-enact or revive either of those taxes.

But, my Lords, there is another extraordinary feature in this clause, and in the power which is given to the Governor of re-enacting these temporary Money Bills. Two thirds of the Money Bills of Jamaica contain specific appropriations to various persons of the sums which are raised under them; and, my Lords, the specific purposes of the expired Bill have been answered, — the creditors named therein have been paid. You are not going to re-enact the appropriation to pay the persons twice over. "No!" you say. Well, then, are you to leave the money which is to be raised under this Act unappropriated altogether? For what purpose do you arm the Governor in council with the power to raise the revenue, but leave him, as he will be left, to make an appropriation of that which he raises? The first clause of this Bill very speciously exhibits a most tender and scrupulous respect for the Act 18th of George III. cap. 12., in the concluding part of that clause where power is given to the Governor to make ordinances on the three subjects of vagrancy, masters and servants, and unoccupied lands. The Governor is not to impose any burden, tax, or duty, but merely a penalty for the non-observance of those ordinances. Now, my Lords, whether that provision be introduced for the purpose of showing that there really was a desire, or of inducing others to believe that there was a desire, on the part of the Government, to avoid any violation of the 18th of George III., or not, this is clear, — that no possible occasion arose under the first clause for imposing any burden, and there was, therefore, no necessity for referring to this Act.

But, my Lords, I thank her Majesty's Ministers for inserting that proviso in the first clause, because it carries with it the condemnation of the second clause, — for the second clause is in direct violation of the 18th of George III. cap. 12.

My Lords, if, then, no appropriation has been made by the Governor, — and no appropriation can be made by him, because this clause only authorises him to re-enact the former law, — this specimen of legislation has this other singularity, — that it gives the Governor power to raise the revenue, but does not give him power to appropriate it.

My Lords, such is the general character and effect of these two clauses; and now, my Lords, I ask, what is the pretext upon which Parliament is called upon to inflict that which I call a punishment upon the people of Jamaica? My Lords, the preamble tells your Lordships that the Assembly, on the 2d of November, addressed the Governor, and declared their determination to abstain from any legislative functions, except such as might be necessary to keep inviolate the faith of the island with the public creditor, — in other words, to provide the supplies, — and that, in consequence of that determination, there had been a cessation of the proceedings of the House. Now, my Lords, the terms in which the determination of the House was expressed upon that occasion, are to be found in the West India Papers: and it is not such a determination as the preamble represents it to be; the preamble omits a very important part of it, — an omission to the prejudice, certainly not of those by whom this measure is proposed, but to the prejudice of the Assembly. My Lords, the original Bill, as it was in the other House, had mistaken the day upon which the House met, — they proceeded to correct that date, — they referred to the Address for the purpose of doing so; but it is singular that they should not have seen that there was not only an error of date to correct, but another error of a more substantial kind. The determination was not, as the preamble states it, an absolute, unqualified abdication of the legislative functions of the Assembly, — it was not an absolute refusal to proceed to business at all, but a refusal to proceed to any other business in these terms, "except such as may be necessary to preserve inviolate the faith of the island with the public creditor, until they shall be left in the free exercise of their inherent rights as British subjects;" — and in the resolution which they adopted, and to which they adhered, their language is, "That they abstain from the exercise of any legislative functions, excepting such as may be necessary to preserve inviolate the faith of the island with the public creditor, until her Most Gracious Majesty's pleasure shall be made known, whether her subjects of Jamaica — now, happily, all in a state of freedom — are henceforth to be treated as subjects, with the power of making laws, as hitherto, for their own government, or whether they are to be treated as a conquered colony, and governed by parliamentary legislation," &c.

My Lords, the foundation of these proceedings is the Act of the British Parliament, intituled, "An Act for the better Government of Prisons in the West Indies." Now, my Lords, that Act, and the circumstances connected with it, I will very shortly bring under your Lordships' notice. Your Lordships are aware that, on the 5th of June, 1838, the Assembly of the colony was especially convened for the purpose of abolishing the apprenticeship. Upon that occasion, your Lordships are aware that the Assembly were placed in this position:—The organ of her Majesty's Government, her Majesty's representative, distinctly told the Assembly that it was impossible to continue the apprenticeship. "I pronounce it," he says, "physically impossible to maintain the apprenticeship with any hope of successful agriculture."

My Lords, the Assembly answer that Address in these words:—"Jamaica does indeed require repose; and we anxiously hope, that, should we determine to remove an unnatural servitude, we shall be left in the exercise of our constitutional privileges without interference."

My Lords, on the 16th of June, the Secretary of State for the Colonies received Sir Lionel Smith's despatch, inclosing to him that Address of the Assembly, and informing him that he might with confidence reckon upon the abolition of the apprenticeship. A Bill, in fact, had passed through the House of Assembly, and he detained the packet for the purpose of transmitting it to London. Now, my Lords, after that solemn appeal on the part of the Assembly of Jamaica to her Majesty's Government, and after the sacrifice they had made of two years of that apprenticeship, which formed a part of the compensation for the abolition of slavery,—the 16th of June was the day selected for the introduction into Parliament, of a Bill of complete internal legislation,—a Bill "for better Government of Prisons in the West Indies."

My Lords, that Bill was introduced without the slightest previous intimation to the agent of the colony. He heard of that Bill by mere accident. He earnestly remonstrated against the progress of that Bill. He pointed out to her Majesty's Ministers the manner in which it affected the internal legislation of the colony. He put upon the table of this House, as he did upon the table of the other House of Parliament, his protest against the unconstitutional character of that Bill. My Lords, it was passed through both Houses of Parliament, without any regard to that protest,—without any regard, on the part of her Majesty's Government, to the representations which had been made on the subject,—and with the forewarning given them, that the introduction of that Bill into Jamaica would produce those very consequences which have resulted from it—that the Assembly would deem it an interference with that constitution, which I have shown your Lordships they have possessed for nearly two centuries, and which, in all the attempts that have been made, has been respected by those who represented the executive Government in this country.

My Lords, on the 13th of August, the Act is transmitted to the colony, and on the 25th of September it is received by the Governor and is immediately proclaimed. Now, my Lords, I will take leave to say, that that is the first instance in the history of Jamaica in which a law was proclaimed in that colony. They have been governed by Acts of their Legislature. If there have been occasions in which there has been an interposition by Parliament in passing an Act, an opportunity has been afforded to the colonial Legislature of making the provisions of that Act its own law, by enacting them.

I have said, my Lords, that the Prisons Bill was a Bill exclusively of internal legislation. My Lords, the supreme superintending power of the Imperial Parliament over each and every part of the empire, is not denied. But it is not incompatible with that supremacy, that each and every part of the empire, to whom the constitution of this country has given a municipal form of government, has given a local Legislature, should retain legislation upon subjects and upon persons solely and exclusively in the colony. My Lords, the doctrine of the great statesmen who have considered this subject, would sanction me in putting it even upon higher grounds. The language of Mr. Fox upon the affairs of Ireland in 1782, of Mr. Pitt and Mr. Windham on the Bill of Sir Philip Francis for regulating the condition of the slaves in the West Indies, would justify me in maintaining this distinction between the supreme superintending power of the Imperial Parliament and the exclusive exercise by the colony of internal legislation, when that legislation was to affect only subjects and persons and property exclusively in the colony.

My Lords, that distinction has been respected by the usage of Parliament. The Bill introduced by Mr. Wilberforce, in the year 1815, to establish the registration of the slaves in the different colonies, was regarded by the people in the colony, and the proprietors in this country, as a direct interference with the right of internal legislation. Mr. Wilberforce, and those to whom he referred for advice upon the subject, abstained from further proceeding with that Bill. It was simply read and printed. But the course which was adopted upon that occasion, by the Assembly of Jamaica, when it was perceived what was the feeling which prevailed amongst their own friends and the numerous class of persons, here, who were entitled to their respect and attention, — that course was to pass a Registry Act, embracing all the details which were deemed necessary for the purpose contemplated by Mr. Wilberforce.

My Lords, another instance occurred in the year 1819. An Act was, in that year, passed by the Imperial Parliament, which required that deeds affecting slaves should contain the names of the slaves, according to the registration of them in the colony. Now, it is important that your Lordships should observe that this Act confines legislation to persons and subjects exclusively within Great Britain. It does not extend to deeds in whatever place they are executed, but applies exclusively to such deeds as are executed in the United Kingdom. It left untouched, it does not profess to apply to, such deeds as are executed in the colony.

My Lords, the abolition of the slave trade, in 1807, stood upon perfectly distinct grounds. It was a subject of trade. This was the ground on which Mr. Pitt said, "the abolition must be by the authority of Parliament; in short, it is a subject upon which no colonial Legislature is competent to legislate."

The abolition of slavery, in 1833, by the authority of the Imperial Parliament, proceeded upon a compact with those who were interested in slaves in the colony, — they, on the one hand, receiving, in consideration of the abolition, a compensation; the Parliament, on behalf of Great Britain, on the other hand, paying that compensation. It was a case, therefore, of compact. But, my Lords, even that Act of Parliament left to the colonial Legislature, in the first instance, the power of enacting all the details, for the purpose of carrying out that measure.

My Lords, another instance occurred, — and it is a valuable instance for the purpose of marking the principles upon which the Parliament have proceeded, and of showing what the usage of Parliament has been. In the year 1836, the Government introduced a measure for altering the courts of judicature in all the West Indian Islands, except Jamaica. That was a measure exclusively for legislation by the Imperial Parliament, because no single Legislature in the colony could make provision for the exercise of the judicial power which that judicature was to exercise in another colony; but even in that Act, there is a scrupulous regard for the rights of those Legislatures. Nothing was done by the Imperial Parliament beyond what was absolutely essential for the purpose of doing that which could not be done by the colonial Legislature itself.

My Lords, there are, then, the opinions of statesmen, and the usage and practice of Parliament. My Lords, this would be authority enough. But there is one authority which I must take leave to detail to your Lordships, because it is an authority emanating from the very Government — from the Secretary of State, himself — who introduced the Prisons Bill.

My Lords, in consequence of that prorogation of the Assembly, which took place by reason of the breach of privilege committed by the Marquess of Sligo, in 1836, an Act in aid of the abolition law had expired. Parliament passed an Act, not to revive an expired Act, — not to revive an expired Act without giving its name or its object, — but to revive this specific Act; and in what language did Parliament revive it? Not absolutely, not unconditionally; but the Act was not to come into operation until a sufficient time had elapsed to enable the Assembly to re-enact it. Now your Lordships will bear in recollection what I stated respecting the peculiar character of the Act for the Abolition of Slavery. That put an end to slavery, — that created the apprenticeship, — that was a compact between the two parties, the details of which were left to the colonial Legislature. If those details were not completed, Parliament resumed its authority during the apprenticeship to enact them. My Lords, the authority to which I am about to refer is a despatch of Lord Glenelg, of the 31st of March, 1836; it contains sound and unexceptionable doctrines, respecting the course of proceeding that should be adopted by Parliament whenever it is called upon to interpose by its legislation on subjects in the colony; and that Noble Lord distinctly puts the ground upon which the Act in Aid was passed here, — namely, that, it was an emanation of the Act for the Abolition of Slavery, — that it was, in fact, the completing one of those details which had been left to the colonial Legislature to perform, but which, if it did not perform, the Parliament, by the same right by which it abolished slavery, would resume the power of performing.

My Lords, I will now read Lord Glenelg's despatch on this subject.

It has not been (he says) without extreme reluctance that his Majesty's confidential advisers have thus invoked the interference of Parliament in the internal affairs of the colony. They acknowledge and respect the general principle, that to the colonial Legislature belongs exclusively the enactment of laws of which the operation is to be confined within the limits of the island; but they have yielded to the irresistible force of those reasons which, on this particular occasion, have required a departure from that established rule.

The "particular occasion" is that which is assumed to have arisen, now. His Lordship proceeds to state, —

It is my duty briefly to advert to a few of the more considerable among those motives which have dictated —

(not a general matter-of-course legislation of Parliament, but which have) — — dictated the exception. First, the Act of Parliament for the Abolition of Slavery was passed on one of those unfrequent and momentous exigencies in which, although the colonies are the immediate scene of action, the interests of the empire at large are directly involved, and in which, therefore, the right of interference, though usually dormant, is unavoidably called into activity. On such an occasion, Parliament might, with indisputable propriety, have pursued the general principles which it established into the most minute of the details by which those principles were to be rendered effective. The motive for transferring to the Colonial Assemblies, the office of introducing those subordinate rules, are explained in the 16th section of the British statute. It is there stated, that "such regulations could not, without great inconvenience, have been otherwise made." The delegation of this power involved the right to resume it, if it should at any time appear that the General Assemblies failed to give complete execution to the design of the supreme Legislature.

That is one reason.

2d. The Abolition of Slavery, and the subordinate measures required to render it effectual, present a course of events altogether peculiar and anomalous; that great Act was nothing less than a national compact, of which Parliament was at once the author and the guarantee, binding the people of the United Kingdom to the payment of a grant of unequalled magnitude; it also bound the emancipated slaves to contribute compulsory labour for several successive years; while it imposed upon the Assemblies the obligation of reconciling, by proper laws, the duties of the negro population as apprenticed labourers with their rights as freemen. On the part of the British Treasury, as on that of the emancipated slaves, the agreement has been carried into complete execution. It follows, Parliament is, therefore, at once entitled and bound to enforce, by its power, the performance of any part of the duty of the Assembly of Jamaica towards the apprenticed labourers, which that body may themselves have failed to fulfil.

His Lordship limits the interference upon this occasion to that particular subject, the subject of apprenticeship. Now, I beg your Lordships' attention to this reason: —

3d. It cannot be forgotten, that the Act of Parliament authorised, and that the first Act of Jamaica effected, a complete exclusion of the apprenticed labourers from the exercise, during their apprenticeship, of their elective franchise.

Now, at the very time this Prisons Bill is introduced, there is an end of the apprenticeship — there is an end of the exclusion of the emancipated population from the enjoyment of their elective franchise — they become entitled to enjoy it; and, of course, this reasoning, founded upon their exclusion from it, fails as to the Bill which is brought in after that exclusion has taken place. It goes on to say, —

It would not be difficult to accumulate other arguments, in justification of the apparent encroachment which the Bill pending before Parliament, when passed into a law, will make upon the general principle of non-interference. But enough has probably been stated for my immediate purpose, which is to show that this general principle is rather confirmed than impaired by this peculiar exception to it, because the exception rests upon grounds which it would be impossible to allege, but on an occasion as remarkable and extraordinary as that of the transition of a whole people from slavery to freedom. Having so far entered into an explanation of the motives which have influenced the conduct of his Majesty's Government, it is my duty to add, that the measure which has been adopted does not proceed on any imputation of misconduct against the General Assembly of Jamaica.

Under the influence of these considerations, the Bill has been studiously framed in such a manner as to leave the constitutional powers of the General Assembly of Jamaica unimpaired. It is proposed to advance so far as the exigency of the case strictly requires, but not in the slightest degree to exceed those limits. How far the proceedings of the Assembly of Jamaica may, or may not, have been open to animadversion, is a question which, as it is not necessary, so perhaps it might not be fitting, that I should discuss.

These, my Lords, are the sentiments — the just and proper sentiments — entertained and expressed by her Majesty's Government in 1836, and communicated to the Assembly, — for I read the despatch from the votes of that House. How can the introduction of the Prisons Act be reconciled with those sentiments? The occasion, the persons, — in short, the whole relation, which constituted the peculiar apology, or, according to the language of the Noble Lord, which created the exception — the confirmation of the general rule — had ceased. I ask your Lordships to bear in recollection the sentiments conveyed by the despatch, when you look at the conduct of the Jamaica Assembly in 1838, and consider what must have been the feeling naturally excited in that body, when, with this despatch upon their table, they see the Prisons Act sent to them, without a word of explanation, without any effort to correct or remove the impression under which the Government were distinctly apprised the Assembly would regard it. Not one syllable is addressed to the Assembly of Jamaica. No such despatch as that of 1836, with relation to a Bill which, from its peculiar connection with the abolition of slavery and the creation of the apprenticeship, might seem not to have required this detailed apology.

My Lords, the people and the Assembly of Jamaica, when they saw the Prisons Bill come before them, unaccompanied by any explanation, could not fail to regard that measure as a wanton and uncalled-for interference with the right of internal legislation.

My Lords, what is the Act itself? It is, as regards any effective purpose, perfectly impotent; the Assembly, alone, can make it of any effect. Of course, it does not proceed to levy taxes for the purpose of defraying the expense to which it will subject the colony. But what will your Lordships say, when, at the very time when this Prisons Act was passed, there existed an Act of the Jamaica Legislature, which is upon your Lordships' table? It will be found among the printed papers — an Act of 1834, which the Marquess of Sligo, on three occasions, speaks of as a most beneficial Act; the beneficial character of which Act is proved by this convincing fact, — that when the Governor, under the authority of the English Prisons Act, proceeded, with the advice of his Council, to make regulations for the gaols, the regulations which he adopted were, with scarcely any variation, the enactments contained in this Act of the Jamaica Legislature, and which Act is still in full force.

My Lords, if you are told that there was a necessity for this interposition of Parliament in respect of Jamaica, I answer, the Jamaica Act in existence contained regulations so beneficial as to have been adopted by the present Governor in council, under the authority of the British Act of Parliament.

My Lords, was there any disinclination on the part of the Assembly to take up the subject of prison discipline, or to take the necessary means for erecting gaols? My Lords, the whole course of their proceedings, from 1832, when her Majesty's present Secretary of State for the Colonies was Governor, to the period of 1838, when they separated, after having put an end to the apprenticeship, clearly and indisputably demonstrates a perfect readiness on the part of the Assembly to enter upon this subject.

The Assembly, not merely in language, but in acts, evinced that readiness. They passed that law of 1834, which was extolled by Lord Sligo, and the enactments of which were adopted by Sir Lionel Smith. My Lords, the Assembly did not content themselves with passing laws for prisons, but they raised money to defray the expenses which would be incurred in erecting them. In consequence of a recommendation from Lord Sligo, they passed an Act, by which the sum of 42,000*l.* was raised for this purpose. But this is not the whole of the case which I have to present to your Lordships on this part of the subject. The conduct of the Government, and all the communications made by the Governor to the Assembly, were calculated to induce a belief that it was not expected on the part of the Government that there could be any further measure on the subject of prisons until the year 1840, when that Prisons Act would expire. My Lords, the then Secretary of State for the Colonies expressly says, in one of his despatches to the Governor, that it will be in 1840 (the Act was passed to continue until the 31st of December, 1840,) that you will have to bring under the consideration of the Assembly the subject of the prisons.

My Lords, towards the latter end of 1837, there arrived in Jamaica a gentleman of the name of Pringle, who had been sent expressly on a mission to the West India colonies, for the purpose of ascertaining the state of the gaols, and of suggesting measures for their government and improvement. In his Report on Prisons, page 11., he makes the following statement: —

> The houses of correction at St. Ann's, Vere, Savanna la Mer, and Montego Bay are not fit for prisons. The two latter have indeed been condemned, and funds voted by the vestry for new buildings. The plans for intended prisons at these two places were shown to me; and as my opinion was desired, I suggested the postponement of the expenditure of so much money, until the plans approved for the construction of new prisons in England could be forwarded, or until some general system was adopted.

Therefore, so late as the end of the year 1837, your Lordships perceive the Government officer in the colony distinctly telling the people that the expedient course was to suspend the expenditure of money until his report had been made, and until some general scheme had been devised. My Lords, the Assembly was allowed to meet again in the early part of the succeeding year, without any communication having been made to them of Captain Pringle's Report. They, however, proceeded to appoint a committee. The chairman of that committee was a person of the name of Jordon, a gentleman of colour, of considerable talent and great respectability. He stated, in his place in the House, that he had anxiously devoted his time and attention to this subject; that he had framed a Prisons Bill; and that, in truth, nothing but the arrival of the Prisons Act, in the autumn of 1838, put an end to the progress of his labour. He saw, then, that it was quite impracticable for him to proceed, after that measure had been passed.

My Lords, thus, then, the whole conduct of the Jamaica Assembly, in relation to its legislation for prisons, as far as it had taken place, was unexceptionable; and as regarded their inclination and readiness to proceed further, there is abundance of proof, if the desire of the Government is to be inferred from their conduct and communications, and from the conduct of the commissioners sent out by them, that immediate legislation on the subject of prisons was not contemplated, was not desired, by the Government. Indeed, one of the communications expressly states that nothing was to be done until condensed and prepared plans had been submitted to the Assembly.

Now, my Lords, I ask, why was the Assembly allowed to meet without receiving any explanation of the causes which had induced the Government to introduce the Prisons Act, or any excuse for its introduction, without any one topic being addressed to them for the purpose of satisfying them that the introduction of the Prisons Act rested on peculiar grounds? Why was not a course adopted similar to that which, with so much propriety and judgment, was adopted in 1836, when the then Secretary of State sent out his apology, and the apology of the Government, even for the introduction of a Bill to revive a former Act which had been passed by the Assembly, on the subject of the apprenticeship, and expressly disclaimed the principle of interference except in such a particular case, and on such a particular ground, as that which he there assigned?

Your Lordships will not forget that the Government had been apprised of the impression which that Act would produce in Jamaica. But, my Lords, what excuse can be given for the conduct which the Government pursued towards the Assembly, when they became acquainted with what had passed in November? Your Lordships will scarcely believe it possible that to this hour the Assembly has been left without any explanation, without any answer to the appeal which they made to their Sovereign—an appeal made under circumstances which well warranted it.

My Lords, to this hour the Assembly of Jamaica remain uninformed of the principles upon which they are to hold their constitution. No answer has been given to their appeal; but the Governor—acting, of course, under instructions which he had received from the Government here—has kept them continually in prorogation.

My Lords, the moment the Government became apprised of these resolutions, and of this appeal, they should have instructed the Governor to have met the Assembly, and to have conveyed to them, from the Government, sentiments corresponding with those which are so justly and eloquently expressed in the despatch of the 31st of March, 1836. The Assembly should have been afforded an opportunity, after they had been distinctly apprised of the grounds on which the Prisons Act was introduced, and that the Government disclaimed any intention of interfering with their right of internal legislation, of resuming the exercise of their legislative functions. My Lords, it is with great pain I say that the absence of any such communication compels me to form this conclusion,—that if it were not the settled design of her Majesty's Government to bring on this crisis in Jamaica—to goad the people of Jamaica into that very position of which they might hereafter take advantage,—the conduct of the Government has been precisely that which would lead the Assembly—the people of Jamaica, ay, and any and every person who looked at that conduct—to believe it was their settled design:

My Lords, if it be a proposition fit to be submitted to Parliament, that legislation, by Assemblies in the colonies, ought not to be retained, but that it may, with greater benefit, be exercised in Downing Street,—then, I say, the Ministry should honestly call upon Parliament to adopt that proposition. If it be a principle that can be sustained, that your fellow subjects in your colonies may be put out of the pale of the British constitution and of a representative Government, let the Ministry boldly call on Parliament to sanction it. But so long as you leave the colonies in possession of their legislative rights, deal with the Assembly in a spirit of candour, and justice, and conciliation. Let not your policy be such as to provoke em into conduct, of which, hereafter, ou may take advantage, by saying they id suspended their functions, and call on Parliament to destroy that branch of e Legislature, and create a new form of overnment.

My Lords, the effect, then, of the conuct of the Government has been, to leave e Assembly in a situation in which they ve just grounds of complaint. An adntage has been taken of that situation; sense has been affixed to the language their resolutions which, in older and tter times, no Minister ever dreamed of fixing to it, even where the cessation their business of legislation had conued for a much longer period.

My Lords, I would humbly ask your ordships whether the assertion, by the ssembly, of their impression — (even if at impression were erroneous) — that eir right of internal legislation had een invaded by the Prisons Act, — whener their appeal, under the influence of at impression, to their Sovereign, can onstitute, in your Lordships' judgment, ground upon which you can inflict upon he people of Jamaica the penalty of aving their Assembly superseded altoether, or the exercise of their functions ermitted to be retained under restricions which make the existence of the ssembly a perfect mockery — a perfect nsult to those who may continue Memers of it? My Lords, I put the case pon that ground. I say that the conuct of the Assembly, in the expression of heir opinion, would not justify the severe easure to which her Majesty's Governent have resorted. But if the conduct f the Government have been such as to ead to an inference that it originated in design to irritate and to provoke the ssembly into a position which might fford a pretext for the infliction of this unishment, your Lordships will indigantly reject the measure which is deigned as that punishment.

My Lords, if the question be, whether his Bill is justified by the conduct of the Assembly of Jamaica, I fearlessly appeal o your Lordships' justice. I am sure our Lordships' decision must be, that o case of misconduct has been estalished — no pretext exists; there is nohing in the language of the resolutions f the Assembly which will justify your Lordships in passing this Bill.

But, my Lords, are you required to egislate, by this Bill, upon the ground hat some inconvenience or injury may be sustained without that legislation, in the event of the Assembly not resuming their legislative functions? My Lords, it is, indeed, an extraordinary proposition, that the Parliament should, at the sacrifice of the rights of the people of Jamaica, relieve the Government from an inconvenience which the Government had, by its own conduct, created, and by which inconvenience it inflicted a great wrong.

My Lords, I say that, if there be inconvenience, and if it have created an urgency with respect to this measure, the Government itself originally caused that inconvenience, and has continued it. Yes, my Lords, it is to be imputed to the Government that the Assembly was not in the exercise of its legislative functions, three months after they had been apprised of the resolutions of November. My Lords, if the packet of that month had conveyed an answer to the appeal of the people of Jamaica, expressed in the language, and evincing a spirit, of conciliation, that answer would have been received by the Assembly in a corresponding spirit. Legislation would have been resumed, the entire business of the Session would have terminated, and neither House of Parliament would have been called upon to endure that so great an outrage should have been offered to the principles of justice, and to the law and constitution of Great Britain, as the introduction of this Bill.

But, my Lords, does there exist the inconvenience, or is there the urgency, which should require your Lordships to sanction so great a wrong as that which the passing of this Bill would inflict? I am prepared to show your Lordships that there exists no such inconvenience, and that there is no such urgency, as has been pretended.

My Lords, I will address myself to the subject of the three Orders in Council, referred to in the first clause of the Bill. I must take care to guard against that misrepresentation of my opinion of those Orders, and of the first clause, which I encountered in another place. Having exposed the monstrous principle of placing the Assembly under such restraint as to have no free deliberation on subjects perfectly new, very complicated, requiring much local practical knowledge, and giving occasion for fair and honest difference of opinion, I considered that such a clause carried, upon the face of it, its own destruction,—that it required nothing more than to state its effect. The objection to the principles of such a clause would receive no additional force from a critical examination of the details of these Orders in Council. I was supposed, therefore, to have had nothing to say against those details — an inference, certainly, most erroneous.

My Lords, with respect to one of the subjects referred to in the last clause, — the law of vagrancy, — it is said, that the provisions of this Order in Council are required for two purposes: first, to abrogate laws, now in existence, which are oppressive; and, secondly, to substitute other laws, of a character better adapted to the present state of society.

My Lords, Sir Lionel Smith, in a communication to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, on the 10th of September, furnished a pretence for representing that the immediate abolition of those laws was required. After having complimented the Assembly, when they separated in June, for putting an end to the apprenticeship, his letter says, in page 83., —

> Then I beseech your Lordship to look to the provisions of the local Vagrant Act, unrepealed, 35th Car. II. c. 11. This Act was introduced against the lawless soldiery of Governor Doyley, and many violent planters are now rejoicing in the power it gives of flogging free men from parish to parish; and there is an improvement in its penal powers, by the 32d Geo. III. c. 11, still unrepealed, which adds six months' hard labour in the house of correction.

Then, my Lords, he says, —

> Your Lordships bid me apply to the Legislature to repeal these frightful laws. If I should apply in vain, and in the midst of freedom, we have still terrific engines of oppression and tyranny preparing for the emancipated population.

Now, my Lords, to begin with his prediction of the use of these terrific engines. His letter was writen on the 10th of September. Fortunately, as the Secretary of State had called upon him to make returns of all convictions under the vagrant laws, or for breaches of contracts, we have the returns made by him to the question, "What convictions have taken place under the vagrant laws?" and the answer is, "With the single exception of a person who was found at Montego Bay sleeping in the street, — Nil." Those returns comprise the whole period from the termination of the apprenticeship to the end of December. There was not a conviction or a prosecution under that law; and for the plainest of all reasons, — the 35th of Charles II. c. 11. is repealed by the next Act, the 32d of Geo. III. c. 11. The principle upon which the virtual repeal of such statute has taken place is familiar to every lawyer.

My Lords, in order to excite attention to the provisions of the law, reference was made to a clause in the Act of the 32 Geo. III. c. 11., by which it was provided that white persons were to be separated from persons of colour and slaves. Now, my Lords, that clause is also repealed by that section of the Jamaica Prisons Act which directs the classification of prisoners, and recognises no other distinction but that of sex, or of offences or cause of imprisonment. But it is also repealed by the Act of 1831, which places the free coloured population, and, consequently, the recently emancipated negro population, on the same footing, and confers on them all the same rights, privileges, and immunities which are enjoyed by white persons. That law abolished every distinction, whatever, that was founded on colour.

These laws, therefore, do not exist; and I will take leave to say, from no inconsiderable practice at the Jamaica bar (having held the office of Attorney General for twelve years), that I never knew an instance of an attempt to proceed under the Act of Charles II.; and I am ready to prove, at your Lordships' bar, that, in point of fact, there never was a prosecution under that Act.

I believe there is not a lawyer in Jamaica, who, if his attention were called to the effect of the two laws upon each other, would not at once pronounce that the subsequent Act had repealed the Act of Charles II.

My Lords, I know that the Chief Justice of Jamaica, in answer to an abstract question which was put to him, which is to be found in this volume, "What are the laws in force upon vagrancy?" mentions those two laws. But if the Chief Justice had been asked to consider the effect of the enactments in the second Act on those contained in the first Act, and applied to that consideration the rules of law which are laid down in the adjudged cases, he could not have arrived at any other conclusion, as a lawyer, than that, although both Acts were found in the statute book, and that there was no express repeal of the past Act, yet it was as virtually and effectually repealed by the second Act as if there had been an express repeal.

My Lords, then I come to the supposed necessity for substituting a new law. Now, this is a law in restraint of the negro, for the benefit of the planter. My Lords, vagrancy, as it is understood here, and as it is intended to be prevented by the Order in Council, scarcely exists in Jamaica. Who is in the habit of seeing, there, persons wandering about begging?

arcely recollect an instance of it. A ant, with a good house and good nds, from whence he can derive, with mon industry, and a very small por- of labour, between 80*l.* and 40*l.* a-, is not likely to be a vagrant. He sit down in his house, or loiter in his nds without working; but you cannot him a vagrant. But if a law of this l were necessary, which is obviously nded for the interest of the planter, I whether great weight is not to be n to the fact that the great body of aica proprietors in this country are osed to this law, and consider that no sible benefit which they could derive n its immediate enactment would be equivalent for the actual and still ater injury they would sustain by cting it through the intervention of liament, by the creation of a new er, and, consequently, at the sacrifice that constitution which is their great urity? They do not ask you to pass law which is to benefit them; but, on contrary, they will powerfully address ir Lordships by their counsel, and de- cate the adoption of this Bill.

My Lords, I will next refer to the law pecting the relation of master and ser- t. My Lords, the Assembly, in their dress in answer to the Governor's ech, admit the importance of a law on s subject.

But as to the law in this Order in uncil, — the contract law, — it may be ited to the Crown colonies, although I ve been told that it does not work well the colony of British Guiana; but I ow that it is not adapted to the state of maica, and that it is inapplicable to the rcumstances of that colony.

My Lords, look at one provision of this traordinary Order in Council. I am one those who believe (and I speak from no considerable experience of the negro aracter) that in this scheme of contracts etween master and servant, neither the al interest of the negro population nor at of the employer is consulted. But this know, that, in consequence of the inter- osition of the Baptist missionaries in the olony of Jamaica, the negroes have been aught not to sign written contracts. They have been told not to commit them- elves by writing, — and yet no contract or hire is to be valid beyond four weeks, nless it be reduced into writing.

But, then, there is another provision which would be fatal to that Order in Coun- il — it would prevent the Assembly of Jamaica from looking at this Bill; no contract is to be valid unless it is entered into in the presence of a stipendiary magistrate. What! the Assembly pass a law conformable to that Order in Council, and provide that a stipendiary magistrate must be an essential party to every contract? And, then, the next packet bringing out a communication from her Majesty's Government, calling upon the Assembly, inasmuch as they have now recognised the appointment of these stipendiary magistrates, to provide salaries for them.

My Lords, that system must undergo an immediate revision by her Majesty's Government, or Jamaica will become a perfect wilderness and waste. It is impossible that that relation which you desire to cultivate between the employer and the labourer can exist under the present system. The day must come, — I hope it will not come too late to render any remedy effectual, — but the day will come, when there must be an account given of the policy which has been adopted towards the colony of Jamaica, and some of the other colonies, since the emancipation. Some satisfactory answer must be given to all those representations to the Government, which have been made by men of all parties of the greatest influence and character connected with Jamaica, — but made, I grieve to say, in vain.

My Lords, there is another singular provision in this contract law. A contract is not valid unless made in the colony. Do your Lordships suppose that any labourer or mechanic in Europe will go out to Jamaica, or to any other colony, unless he has the security of a previous contract? Well, my Lords, he has entered into a contract with the person who is desirous of employing him. It is binding during the voyage. But the employer, who has paid the expense of his passage to Jamaica, is at his mercy when he arrives there; he has no power to compel him to enter into a written contract. He leaves his employer. The expense of his passage to Jamaica is lost to the person who has paid it. But it seems it has been told the Government, that scheme may answer in Demerara, or in the smaller Crown colonies. Be it so. But what argument does this afford in favour of its working well in Jamaica? You are dealing with a large colony, in which cultivation is scattered over the whole of an immense tract of country. Every person knows, with respect to the cultivation of British Guiana, that it does not run from the coast above ten or fifteen miles, and that, in fact, the whole range of cultivation is almost immediately within personal inspection. But it is far otherwise with respect to the cultivation of the colony of Jamaica.

Now, with respect to the illegal occupation of land. Here, again, is a most extraordinary misconception on the part of the persons who have fancied that this law is requisite. My Lords, you have a provision in the Slavery Abolition Acts, another provision in the Act passed on the subject of ejectment in 1834, and another provision in the Act for the abolition of the apprenticeship; and each of these provisions affords a complete remedy for that illegal occupation of lands which is intended to be provided against. The ejectment of the negro labourer from those grounds which he had occupied, upon giving him three months' previous notice, is effectually secured by the existing laws. My Lords, the Attorney and Solicitor General of this country, in their printed opinion, properly referred to those laws, as they unquestionably are in force, and as furnishing a suitable remedy.

But with respect to the illegal occupation of other lands, the provisions which are contained in this Order in Council betray an extraordinary degree of ignorance of the actual condition of those lands. My Lords, those lands have been granted to individuals by patent, and consist of wood, and are uncultivated. Their boundaries have either not been run, or, if run, not perfectly distinguished or frequently disputed. Under the provisions of this Act, a stipendiary magistrate would be invested with a jurisdiction to try some of the most difficult and complicated questions, — namely, those which involve disputed boundaries, upon which the negroes might have made a settlement.

My Lords, I defy this law to effect the purpose which is contemplated, — or to effect it without doing manifest injustice to the person who may be the lawful owner of those lands, or entitled to them as being included within the callings of his patent. His title may be good, but he cannot sustain that title against a possession which may have been acquired without his knowledge, — for that possession would completely protect him from being dispossessed under this law.

My Lords, in concluding my observations on the first clause, I beg to state, that, in addition to the objection which I have urged against the principle of that clause, there are these objections arising from the character of the subjects upon which the Assembly are to legislate under this restriction, which justify me in expressing to your Lordships my firm persuasion — my candid conviction — that the Assembly will not, and, I take leave to say, ought not to, resume the exercise of their legislative functions, if that clause remain in the Bill.

My Lords, I have now arrived at the second clause of the Bill, which invests the Governor with the power of re-enacting certain temporary laws which expired last year. They are of two descriptions. I have stated to your Lordships, that there are seven of those laws by which taxes are imposed, and the proceeds of those taxes appropriated. Now, my first proposition — which I state as the correct result of a careful perusal of those temporary Tax Acts — is, that although these Acts have expired, yet, that, under other Acts which are in force, a revenue is raised, more than sufficient to meet the ordinary exigencies of the civil Government of the colony. Your Lordships, therefore, are not called upon to revive those Tax Acts from any necessity of furnishing a revenue before a certain period. Indeed, I do not suppose that this necessity will be alleged on the part of the Government. I know that, not many weeks since, the Secretary of State for the Colonies did not believe that such necessity existed. Indeed, it cannot be urged, consistently with the actual state of the revenue laws of Jamaica.

My Lords, I am exceedingly desirous that your Lordships should be fully in possession of the character of these Acts, and of the revenue which is at the disposal of the Government; I therefore entreat your Lordships' attention to them. The first is an Act imposing a duty on tonnage, and for regulating how the duty payable on gunpowder is to be received. Now, it may be supposed, in the Colonial Office, that this is the tonnage duty which produces 25,000*l.* per annum. It is not so; but it is a duty which is paid upon each vessel entering and clearing the island, as a substitute for a certain quantity of gunpowder, which, under the Revenue Act of 1 Geo. II. cap. 1., every ship was obliged to deliver in kind. This tonnage duty produced about 2700*l.* Now, what is the effect of this law having expired? Why, instead of this duty being paid in money, under this Tonnage Act, it would be paid by the delivery in kind of the gunpowder, under the Permanent Revenue Act of 1 Geo. II.; and the consequence is, that a person who is bound to pay it in kind, will prefer paying the duty in money: so that, in truth, that branch of the revenue is still existing, only in a different name, and under a different law.

My Lords, the next Acts are, the 1st of Victoria, chap. 8., for laying an additional duty on all wines, brandy, rum, &c.; the of Victoria, chap. 11., for laying a on goods, wares, and merchandise, being the growth, production, and ufacture of the United Kingdom. My ls, the duties imposed by these two red Acts also exist under laws which still in force; as, for instance, part of e duties are imposed and levyable er that Permanent Revenue Act, to ch I before called your Lordships' ation, passed in 1728, 1st Geo. II. . 1. The rest of the duties are, when olonial Act is in force, levied under Act of the Imperial Parliament, passed the 3d and 4th of the late King, p. 59. The duties levied under that ute of the Imperial Parliament, being able to the Receiver General, are ap- able under the general laws which are l in force, and which appoint and pro- e the salaries of the servants of the vernment, — namely, the Governor, l judges, the clergy and others.

My Lords, the next Acts are those of 1st of Victoria, chaps. 12. and 19., laying a duty on all horned cattle, and horses. Now, the duty which is raised the former of these Acts is about 184*l.* ie duties are imposed by these Acts, t for the purpose of raising a revenue, t to operate as a prohibition upon the portation of cattle into the colony, to e prejudice of those who breed cattle ere. Now, when your Lordships have petition from any of the proprietors of maica, who are suffering from the non- istence of these Acts, it will be time ough to talk of their expiration as a ievance, and call upon Parliament to terpose for its redress.

My Lords, the amount raised under the and Tax Act is about 28,000*l.*; but your ordships should be aware that the money hich is raised under the expired Act of 37 did not become payable till after ie 15th of September, 1838; conse- uently, the proceeds of that tax were pplicable to the expenses of that very ear in which we now are.

The same observation applies to the ct for levying a tax upon live stock, nd upon trade. These seem to be the nly two sources of revenue which are aised alone under expired Acts. All the ther sources of revenue are raised at his moment under Acts in existence,— amely, the Permanent Revenue Act, and he Act of the Imperial Parliament.

Now, my Lords, this result is plain, rom the state of the Revenue Acts. The onnage duty does not expire till 1843. Under that Act, the sum of 25,000*l.* is raised. Another source of revenue is the Stamp Act, under which the sum of 20,000*l.* is raised. That Act does not expire till the 31st of December, 1839. My Lords, I have just now mentioned 45,000*l.* still raiseable under existing laws. To that I add the surplus of appropriated revenue. To make that intelligible to your Lordships, you should be aware that the amount raised under the Permanent Revenue Act, specifically appropriated, is 10,000*l.* per annum,—that is, 8000*l.* under the 1st of Geo. II. c. 1., and a further sum of 2000*l.* under a subsequent Act; but the amount of the duties, which were intended to raise that sum, produce a great deal more than 10,000*l.* The excess produced beyond what is appropriated by the Permanent Act is 18,000*l.* This sum is applicable to the other public services of the island. You have, then, 63,214*l.*

My Lords, there was an Act passed last year, imposing a further duty on exports and imports; that Act produces 60,000*l.* That Act does not expire till the 31st of December next. You have, then, 123,214*l.*; but I have a right to take the 10,000*l.* of the permanent revenue, because that contributes 2500*l.* towards the Governor's salary, and it also contributes a sum towards the forts and fortifications. I have, therefore, to add the additional duties which are raised under the British Act, which amount to 60,000*l.*; and I have also to add those different duties which I mentioned just now, amounting to 72,000*l.*, which would bring an amount of actual revenue at the disposal of the Government, applicable to the payment of the Governor, judges, clergy, and all public officers, of between 200,000*l.* and 300,000*l.*

My Lords, there is no pretext, therefore, for saying that the immediate want of revenue requires the re-enactment of the temporary Money Acts; because there exists, without these expired Acts, a revenue adequate to the purposes of defraying the expenses of the civil Government. There may be individual creditors, whose demands are unpaid; but the faith of the Assembly is pledged to their payment, by that resolution, in which they contemplate them, as well as all civil servants; and those persons rely upon the performance of that pledge by the Assembly. They are not the persons asking your Lordships to destroy, or suspend, or impair the functions, or discredit the character, of the Assembly. They regard that body as representing them, and as their sure protection and safeguard. My Lords, you do not want this Bill; you need not violate the constitution of Jamaica for the purpose of raising a revenue to answer the immediate purposes of Government.

Then, my Lords, with respect to the other Acts, which are not Acts imposing duties, I take leave to assert that there is no one of those expired Acts of such a nature as to create a necessity for its revival by the Governor in council. There is not one of those Acts in respect of which the public can sustain any injury whatever, whether it be revived in the next six months, or in the next twelve months.

The first of these expired Acts is the Act for establishing the rules and articles of war. In the first place, that Act is never in force, by an express enactment which it contains, except in martial law. Martial law can be proclaimed only by the Governor. The rules and articles of war apply only to the militia, and the militia cannot be called out without the authority of the Governor; and the Government considers the militia not a proper force to retain: therefore they cannot complain of the non-existence of this law.

My Lords, the next Acts are, the Act appointing commissioners to inspect the books of the Receiver General, and to inspect the public accounts, and the Act appointing commissioners to superintend public buildings in the island, which are annual Acts; and the Act appointing Commissioners of Forts and Fortifications, which is a triennial Act. Now, with respect to these three Acts, I believe no one who has the slightest acquaintance with Jamaica can gravely assert, in this House or elsewhere, that any injury would be sustained from those Acts continuing unrevived for eight months longer. For what are those Acts? Under the Act appointing commissioners to inspect the books of the Receiver General, the only commissioners are the Members of the Assembly; but they have no power to raise money, and they have no power to apply money which has not been previously voted by the Assembly. The Board of Works, and the Commissioners of Forts and Fortifications, consist of the Governor, Council, and Assembly; but their powers are strictly confined to the application of money which has been previously voted by the Assembly. The commissioners have no power whatever to apply one farthing, or to contract any engagement which has not been previously sanctioned by the Assembly.

My Lords, I have heard it said that all public works were suspended in consequence of this Act having expired. This could not be. If the public works had been commenced, they must have been commenced under the authority of a previous law, and the contract entered into would be still subsisting, and the contractor, in executing those works, could sustain no prejudice. The Commissioners of Forts and Fortifications are in the same situation as the Commissioners of the Board of Works. They are limited in their powers—they can advance no money which has not been previously sanctioned by the Assembly.

My Lords, it has been said that there was no person to superintend the public buildings. I answer, that the Island Engineer and Surveyor of Public Works still hold their offices and execute their duties, for they are not dependent upon these expired Acts. These pretexts are too puerile to deserve any serious notice. Is the Government prepared to show that any calamity has befallen any public building in Jamaica, or that any injury has resulted, or can result, from these laws having ceased to be in operation since the 31st of December last?

Then comes another Act—an Act in aid of the 5th of Will. IV., relating to the registry of fire-arms. There are two very strict coercive Acts still in force, for the purpose of preventing the improper distribution and use of fire-arms. The 6th of Will. IV. cap. 30., which continues in force till the 31st of December, 1840, is fully adequate to guard against every evil, although the clerk of the peace might not be obliged, in consequence of the expiration of the other Act, to transmit to some public officer a list of those particular arms in his possession.

My Lords, another expired Act—the Clergy Act, 6th of Geo. IV. cap. 17.—was first passed for seven years, and has since been continued by Acts from year to year. That Clergy Act consolidated all the previous clergy laws, and repealed them. This Act, which has consolidated and repealed them, having expired, the former laws revive; and under the former laws the clergy and rectors and curates receive the same stipends which they would receive under this consolidated Act, if it had not expired. The bishop and archdeacon are not dependent upon this Act for their salaries, because they are paid by the Treasury of this country. They hold both their appointments under their patent. So that, in fact, the clergy, as to their stipends and duties, are precisely in the same situation as if this law had not been passed, and they were receiving their stipends under the old law. The expiration of this Act has not produced, nor could it produce, any inconvenience to either of these persons. There is no one provision in that Act in relation to the execution of process issuing from the Court the Bishop, which could not, if required, enforced by the authority of the Supreme Court of Judicature of the Island.

The next Act which expires is the etty Debt Act. It is a law of rather odern date. It was passed in the year 34. It gave to two magistrates cogniance of debts to the amount of 5*l.*, which as subsequently increased to 10*l.* But your Lordships suppose that there is o jurisdiction in Jamaica which can take ognizance of debts of a small amount, nd that creditors for those sums are bliged to go into the Supreme and Assize ourts? In the first place, to the extent f 40*s.*, a single magistrate has authority; nd in every parish in the island, except he precinct of St. Catherine, where the upreme Court is held, there are Courts f Common Pleas which have cognizance f debts to the amount of 20*l.* So that here is not a failure of the ordinary jurisiction to which suitors might resort for he recovery of small debts, as it would eem was supposed by those who put orward this law as one which it was of the reatest importance should be re-enacted.

My Lords, I come now to the Process aw; and I was very much surprised to ear it said by persons who ought to know etter, that, in consequence of the expiration of this law, there can be no court itting, no juries convened, and that, in hort, the courts will be shut up in Jamaica. My Lords, so far from that being he case, the courts are continually sitting, nd would continue to sit, even if this law were never re-enacted again. My Lords, what are the enactments of this law? There are some of them, which, if the Governor, with the advice of the Council, exercise the power of re-enacting them, will present a strange appearance in these days; — for there are many clauses which make provision for the manner in which slaves are to be sold by the deputy marshal. Of course, those are inapplicable; he is not to revive those clauses. But what are the other provisions? My Lords, with respect to all the provisions of that Act, they partly relate to the regulations of the duties of the provost marshal and his deputies, and the clerk of the Crown and others, — all of which, I take leave to say, the court itself, even if there were no Act whatever, could make for the regulation of those who are its own officers. It possesses authority independently of that Act. There is no authority given by that Act, which the Court might not exercise if that Act be never re-enacted.

My Lords, that law contains a provision as to the manner of obtaining the names of persons from whom the panels of juries should be formed. It provides that the clerk of the peace of each parish shall transmit to the provost marshal, before a certain day, a list of the inhabitants of the parish, in order that the latter may make out the pannel. That list is to be made out after the 25th of March, and on or before the 20th of May. The pannel is to serve for the three assize courts following; and that made under the expired Act has been in use for every court that has been since held. Nay, further, if this law were never re-enacted, the provost marshal, independently of this Act, and at common law, would, under the authority of the court, execute the venire. He must summon a jury, by serving a notice on a sufficient number of persons to attend the court. He must return persons qualified by law: of those persons he makes the pannel, under the inspection and control of the court. If this Process Law were not revived for the next two years, he would look at the list which the clerk of the peace had transmitted already; or he would, at his own expense, employ the clerk of the peace to make a list of the inhabitants qualified to serve on juries. The return which the provost marshal would make to the court, and from whence the panel would be formed, would be of the same description, and procured in the same way, as at present; and the Supreme Court would, of its own authority, secure such a return, as would answer the urgency of the venire, and, at the same time, not be burdensome to individuals.

My Lords, the next is the Act for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors. Under the Act, the debtor obtained his discharge only upon the condition, not merely of being in prison, but of delivering up all his effects; the creditor has no motive for sending his debtor to gaol, if he cannot obtain the distribution of his effects, but he has a motive for not sending him to gaol; because, if the debtor has no property, the creditor is subject to the burden of supporting him in prison. There is no inducement to send a debtor to prison, nor is there any inducement for a debtor to enter a prison for the purpose of fraudulently taking the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act.

My Lords, the last of the expired Acts, the Police Act, which was introduced in 1834, expired on the 3d of December last, as it is an annual Act. Now, my Lords, I beg leave to say, if it be intended to be represented that the island is left without a constabulary force, that is not the fact. There is an Act, quite independent of the Police Act (the 4th of Will. IV. cap. 59.), which gives enlarged powers to the justices of the peace to appoint the requisite constabulary force. I find that Lord John Russell, in his despatch of the 15th of February last, speaking of all the Acts which have expired on the 3d of December, 1838, says, —

> On looking them over, I find none, except the Police Act, the want of which may occasion immediate danger; and I trust that this will have been obviated by the means you propose to adopt for substituting a constabulary force on a small scale, in lieu of the former police.

My Lords, we are now at the end of the month of June. We have heard of no tumult, we have heard of no violence or insubordination, which required this police establishment to suppress. Sir Lionel Smith, himself, suggested, and no doubt adopted his own suggestion, of another and adequate civil force. It cannot, therefore, be represented to your Lordships, that the expiration of this law furnishes a ground upon which you could be justified in retaining this clause of the Bill.

My Lords, I have now concluded my description of these temporary Acts, of which this Bill gives you no description, and conveys to you no information. I submit to your Lordships, with perfect confidence, that your Lordships' interposition would not be warranted by the want of the provisions of any one of these temporary Acts. Danger there is none, inconvenience there is none, pretext there is none, to require that your Lordships should invest the Governor of the colony with this unconstitutional power of reviving any of these temporary Acts. But I repeat that, if there were danger,—if there were inconvenience, — if there existed a pretext, — it was created, and has since been and is now continued, by the Government.

My Lords, when I was dealing with the pretence, that there was an urgency for the enactment of those subjects of legislation which are mentioned in the first clause of the Bill, I ought to have brought to your Lordships' attention the unparalleled injustice of the Government in resorting to that pretence, — I ought to have reminded your Lordships that this same Government had prohibited the Assembly from previously legislating on these subjects. Yes, my Lords, under the recommendation of the Select Committee of the House of Commons on Negro Apprenticeship, in 1836, her Majesty's Government conveyed to the Governors of the colonies, and through them to the Assemblies, their opinion, that, on every account, it was desirable that legislation, on all subjects affecting the future condition of the emancipated population, after they had ceased to be apprentices, should be postponed as near as possible to the period of the termination of the apprenticeship. The Report of that committee contains this strong language:— "In conclusion, your committee would observe, that it appears to them to be most expedient that such enactments as are intended to come into operation after 1840" — (that being the period fixed by statute for the termination of the apprenticeship) — "should, as much as possible, be delayed till that period shall arrive; or, at all events, be postponed till the time that more immediately precedes it." Now, will it not be an act injustice, — the most flagrant which was ever committed, — to make the urgency of new laws for the altered state of society in Jamaica, a pretext for subverting the constitution of that colony, when the Government has told the Assembly of Jamaica, by its Governor, that they were not to pass laws of this description, but to postpone them until that new state of society was immediately about to commence? One other instance of injustice can, alone, equal it, and that is — urging, as a pretence for re-enacting, by an unconstitutional authority, those temporary laws by which the revenue is raised, that those temporary Acts have been suffered to expire; when, in fact, the Assembly, by their resolution and Address, offered to re-enact, and would have re-enacted, them, and would have raised the revenue, if the Government had not prevented them from doing so. This was the act of the Governor, who refused to let the Assembly proceed, — who kept them in prorogation; and to the Governor and the Government, and not the Assembly, must be attributed the fact, that these temporary Acts have not been re-enacted, and the revenue, derivable from those Acts, raised.

My Lords, it is impossible that this conduct can receive your Lordships' sanction, and yet your Lordships are asked to regard that conduct as a justification of this Bill.

My Lords, I would call your Lordships' attention to another singular property in this Bill, — perfectly in keeping, however, with its injustice. Your Lordships are aware that the power transferred to the Governor in council is limited in its duration, — namely, to the operation of passing those ordinances on these subjects; yet, in defiance of every common principle of legislation, although the authority be only temporary, yet the ordinances made by that authority may be perpetual. The proviso, giving power to the Governor, Council, and Assembly, of repealing the ordinance, can answer no other purpose but that of announcing to the Assembly, that the Governor, who has passed these Acts in his executive character, need not, and must not be expected to, give his assent to the repeal or alteration of them, if it would be required by the other two branches of the Legislature. Is there any one so credulous as to suppose that those who administer the government, and who are pressing on this measure, will ever give permission to the Governor to assent to any Bill of the Council and Assembly, repealing or altering either of those Acts?

My Lords, there is another striking feature in this Bill. The people of Jamaica are left at the mercy of the Governor, or those from whom he receives his instructions, to convene the Assembly, or not, as he or they please; for this Bill does not even contain a provision to make it imperative on the Governor to convene the Assembly. My Lords, this is, indeed, unilateral legislation. Everything is introduced which is coercive, offensive, irritating, and insulting towards the Assembly; but nothing is introduced which can afford the people of Jamaica security against the oppression of a Governor, or the Government. I am not to be told that the Government will, of its own authority, direct the Governor to convene the Assembly. Alas! the conduct of the Government has not rendered it an object of confidence in the estimation of the Assembly or people of Jamaica. They will look at the provisions of this Bill; they will see that they are called upon to legislate, — and will, if they resume their functions, legislate under the instructions which the Governor receives from the Government here. I cannot, nor will the Assembly, ever forget that it was the avowed desire and object of that Government to suppress the Assembly entirely, — that it was their avowed opinion that legislation by Assemblies in the colonies was not compatible with emancipation, — and that any form of government was better than a Representative Assembly. I cannot suppose, — the Assembly and people cannot suppose, — that, having so pertinaciously adhered to those opinions, and so perseveringly pursued that object, as to bring forward this Bill, — so strongly resembling, in its obnoxious features, that former Bill, which, in obedience to the sense of the House of Commons, they had abandoned, — I say, my Lords, I cannot, nor will the people of Jamaica, suppose they will renounce those favourite opinions, that they can have any desire to see the Assembly convened, or that they would give such instructions to the Governor as would afford the Assembly a fair opportunity of resuming their legislative functions. It is impossible that the Assembly and people of Jamaica can regard, with confidence, those who have just struggled to carry a measure which destroyed the constitution, avowedly, and are now struggling to carry this measure, which, if it does not destroy the constitution in form, does in substance and effect, — for it renders the exercise by the Assembly of its legislative functions altogether incompatible with that free agency, without which its existence, as a branch of the Legislature, will be perfectly nugatory, and, indeed, derogatory to the persons who remain members of it. But your Lordships will defeat this unconstitutional attempt by rejecting the Bill. There is no ground — no, not even that of expediency — to justify you in passing it; — if I could suppose it possible that such a ground could sanction a measure which subverts a constitution, by rendering it impossible that one branch of that constitution could any longer be retained with advantage to the community, or with honour to those who compose it.

My Lords, I am persuaded that your Lordships must feel that the Government has not entitled itself to call upon your Lordships to give effect to this measure; and that therefore your Lordships must, as I humbly hope you will, reject this Bill altogether.

My Lords, I take leave, with great respect, to say that this is the only course which your Lordships can pursue, consistently with those principles of justice, and respect for the institutions which the laws and constitution of this country have created, which ever govern the proceedings of this House.

My Lords, if I have established a case which claims the exercise of your justice by rejecting this Bill, I have accomplished all that my duty requires. But I cannot leave your Lordships' bar without feeling, and without asking your Lordships to feel, the momentous consequences involved in the issue of your decision upon this Bill. My Lords, if you adopt, or if you modify, this Bill, and thus leave the Assembly discredited or degraded, or incapable of exercising their functions efficiently, because incapable of exercising them as free agents, you will have inflicted upon the people of the colony an irreparable injury. Its injustice will not be the only complaint which will be made. It will have inflicted a wound fatal to the future welfare of that great colony.

My Lords, there is no state of society, however refined in civilisation, which can stand the shock of a policy which has the effect of degrading the higher classes of society, and of implanting distrust and ill-will towards them in the breasts of those who stand in a more humble and dependent relation. But, my Lords, what must be its effects upon a state of society, perfectly new in the history of the world, where a great experiment has just been made, where the great mass of the population are labourers and dependents just advancing into a state of freedom, and making the first progress towards civilisation?

My Lords, in such a state of society, common reflection would tell us that the aid of every moral influence which you can invoke is required; yet by this measure the Government would destroy a moral influence which could, and would, exercise the greatest and most valuable ascendancy; because its tendency, by degrading the Assembly, is to exhibit the persons of whom it is composed as no longer deserving the confidence of those who have hitherto lived with them in the relation of dependents, and between whom there is subsisting feelings of kindness and confidence. A stigma is to be cast on them as not worthy to be intrusted with legislation, except under such restrictions as import degradation and mistrust. The emancipated population are to be told, by this Bill, that they are not to respect or confide in those with whom they are to live, and with whom they have to maintain, in a kind and friendly feeling, that relation which is necessary, not merely for the cultivation and prosperity of the colony, but which is essential to the happiness and welfare of the labouring population themselves.

My Lords, the effect of such a policy will be fatal to the acquisition of habits of industry, and fatal to the progress of civilisation. It will end in the disappointment of the expectations — the just expectations — of the people of England. It will end in a complete discouragement of the other nations of Europe and America to follow our example, in putting an end to slavery. Capital will be withdrawn. The negro population may enjoy freedom and repose; but cultivation will have ceased; Jamaica will, indeed, remain — but she will remain only as a memorial — to tell you what the bounty of God had done for man, but what man's own folly and recklessness had prevented him from enjoying. Such, my Lords, will be the fate of this great colony, if this measure be adopted.

But let me turn to a brighter prospect. Let this measure be rejected by your Lordships. Let her Majesty's Government be left to adopt, as other Governments have done, a course of conciliation. Satisfy the people of Jamaica, that, whilst neither the Imperial Parliament nor the Government will renounce the right or neglect the duty of interposing, when the legislation of that or any other colony is not adapted to, or does not promote, the interests of all classes; yet, in the language of their Address, that her Majesty did not, and does not, wish to deprive them of their rights as British subjects, or of that internal legislation which they have derived from the constitution of Great Britain, and which, for two centuries, they have enjoyed.

My Lords, such a course, adopted by her Majesty's Government, — such an answer to the appeal which the Assembly made to her Majesty, — would induce that body honestly, honourably, and cheerfully to resume the exercise of their legislative functions.

My Lords, that which has passed would be forgotten, or retained in their recollection only for the purpose of retaining those feelings of gratitude and attachment with which they will regard those of their fellow colonists in this country, who have given them support in resisting a measure so fatal to their interests. My Lords, that support will not only excite gratitude and attachment, but it will secure for the advice and recommendation which those supporters may convey to the colony, that weight and influence on future legislation in Jamaica, which, in the language of the resolutions of one of the meetings, will satisfy the just expectations of the people of this country, and best promote the successful issue of the great measure of emancipation. I firmly believe — and everything I have heard from Jamaica, and from those who have recently arrived from thence, confirms my belief — that my anticipations of the manner in which such a communication from the Government would be received, are well founded. But if, contrary to those anticipations, — if, contrary to the just expectations which the great body of Jamaica proprietors here entertain, — such a communication failed to produce this much desired termination of the present dispute, — there is no possible injury that could take place in the three or four months which must elapse before Parliament would be re-assembled, and be enabled to make the necessary provision for the government of Jamaica. Whatever might be the result, your Lordships would have abundant justification for the course you had taken. You would have acted upon the well-grounded expectations which those connected with the colony entertained and conveyed to you; but, above all, my Lords, if you failed, —if you were disappointed in your expectations, — you would have no cause of reproach. On the contrary, you would have the satisfaction of feeling that the course you had taken was that which was most consistent with, and best maintained, those sacred principles of justice, and of respect for rights and institutions conferred by the law and constitution, which has rendered this House, in the exercise of its legislative as well as judicial functions, the sanctuary of justice, and the never-failing refuge of those who invoke its protection from oppression and wrong.

I pray your Lordships to reject this Bill.

Counsel having also been heard on behalf of the planters, merchants, and others, the further consideration and second reading of the Bill was then adjourned to Monday next; and the Lords summoned.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — I beg to ask whether the Noble Marquess will consent to lay on the table, on Monday, copies of those Acts of the Assembly which have expired since October last?

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — I have no objection to lay them on the table.

LIVERPOOL BUILDING ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Brought from the Commons, and read a first time.

POOR LAWS AMENDMENT ACT.

Petition for alteration of, in relation to the bastardy clause, — of guardians of the Pocklington union. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

IRELAND.

Petition representing the present condition of the poor of Ireland to be most distressing, and praying for their immediate relief, by the adoption of measures calculated to give them proper employment, and also for the construction of railways, — of inhabitants of Mallow. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (CANADA.)

Petitions for the protection of, — of clergy of Whalley: and of the minister, churchwardens, and other inhabitants of St. Peter's, Wallingford; Landenny; and Ragland. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

KINGSTON UPON HULL DOCKS BILL.

Notice taken that this Bill had not been prepared in conformity to the Report from the sub-committee to whom the petition for leave to present the petition for the Bill was referred. — Order (17th June) for second reading of the Bill read.

SIR W. JAMES. — I move, Sir, that that Order be discharged, and that leave be given to withdraw the Bill. If there be no objection to that course, I shall, then, ask for leave to introduce another Bill in its stead, to empower the dock company to purchase and hold certain land near that town.

Mr. POULETT THOMSON. — It was my intention to have resisted the second reading of this Bill, as it is to oppose the introduction of another Bill in its place. The circumstances of these Hull Docks are peculiar; and as the public revenue is connected with the question, we should be cautious in not proceeding too hastily to legislate upon the subject. By the "Hull Dock Charter" the company is entitled to levy dues, not only on ships coming into the docks, but also upon all vessels, foreign or otherwise, entering the harbour; and these dues, according to the Reciprocity Acts, must be repaid by the Treasury. Then, the question regarding the limits of these docks is extremely doubtful, and will shortly be decided by a court of law. There are other questions pending, which this Bill will interfere with. Under these circumstances, I think it would be premature to give to any party an exclusive right over the land which the company seeks to acquire under this Bill for the purpose of extending the Hull Docks, as all other parties would be thereby debarred from competition on a future occasion. Besides, the conduct of the parties with regard to this Bill has been exceedingly objectionable and suspicious. The rules of the House have not been complied with; and, at all events, at this late period of the Session, I shall feel it my duty to oppose the introduction of a second Bill.

Mr. HANDLEY. — I deem it my duty to support the proposition of the Honourable Member for Hull, because, if carried into effect, it will be of very great advantage to that town. It is hardly fair of the Right Honourable Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade to object to the introduction of another Bill, because it was a mistake on the part of the solicitor which obliged them to abandon the former one.

Mr. BROADLEY. — I will go so far as to agree with the Right Honourable Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, that the conduct of the parties who brought in this Bill is not such as we ought to sanction; but I do not conceive that to be a good reason for objecting to another measure, if that measure be, as I conceive it is, perfectly simple in its details, and most useful in its object. The Right Honourable Gentleman also objected to the introduction of such a measure at so late a period of the Session. Why, Sir, it could not have been brought forward any sooner. It is brought forward when the parties are legitimately entitled to bring it, — the petition for it having been actually presented before the Bill, authorising the sale of the land, had received the Royal assent, in the present month. The question as to the extent or limits of these docks will not affect this piece of land. It will neither take it out of, nor place it within, those limits. I cannot see, therefore, what foundation there is for the opposition of the Right Honourable Gentleman. He seems to think that the conduct of the parties has been such as to warrant suspicion. In what respect? They have done nothing that has not been done under legal advice. They now only ask permission to make a purchase of this land; and before they can take any further step, they must come to Parliament again. In conclusion, Sir, I have only to say, that the merchants of the town of Hull are in favour of the measure, — it is anxiously called for by the town, generally; and I do trust that the House will see the justice of allowing it to proceed.

SIR W. JAMES. — The Right Honourable Gentleman having stated that the conduct of the parties to the Bill is open to suspicion, I beg to assure him and the House that I have the word of honour of the solicitor for the Bill, that it was through inadvertence, and through the advice of professional men, who were of opinion that the changes to be made in the Bill, according to the recommendations of the committee, might be made in the committee on the Bill, that the mistake arose. The Right Honourable Gentleman has said that there are important questions pending, which will be disturbed by this Bill. Now, I can only say, in reply to that objection, that I cannot possibly see how questions which are pending will be disturbed by this Bill, which is only in the nature of an Estate Bill. The fact is, that if the Bill be not brought in, the land may fall into other hands, by which the town of Hull, which requires additional dock room, will be deprived of an incalculable advantage.

Mr. PRYME. — That there is great want of dock room in Hull, I admit. I do not object to the introduction of the Bill on that account; but the parties seeking to pass this Bill do not propose to make an additional dock. What they propose is, to get possession of a piece of land, for the purpose, as they say, of making a dock; by obtaining possession of which piece of land, they will shut out all competition. It is not only the most eligible, but, I believe, the only eligible, piece of ground that could be appropriated to the construction of a dock; and yet we are called upon to allow it to be locked up for two or three years, without being appropriated to that purpose. If this Bill be obtained, the parties may come to this House at the expiration of that time more in the capacity of dictators than of suitors, — for they will be the sole possessors of the land in question. On these grounds, I submit, that the parties ought to come before this House, at once, with a Bill for making the dock.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — Sir, knowing how very difficult are the duties which my Right Honourable Friend the President of the Board of Trade has, at times, to perform, it shall always be my endeavour to support him when I consider him in the right, as I do in this instance. I have resisted all solicitation on the subject, — being determined to be guided by my view of the public interest, and by the discussion that might take place upon it in this House; and I must confess I am of opinion that the merits of the case rest with the observations of the Honourable Member who last addressed the House; and that we ought not to allow any step to be taken in this matter, until the subject is brought at once under the view of Parliament, both with regard to the powers to be granted and the object to be attained. The Honourable Gentleman has stated that the land in question is almost exclusively the piece of land suitable for increasing the docks. That being the case, the possession of it would be highly valuable, either for such a purpose, or for the purpose of preventing a rival company from enlarging the docks. I therefore think that Parliament should interfere to prevent this land from being placed in a position that may be disadvantageous to the public.

Mr. BETHELL. — I beg leave to state, Sir, distinctly, that the company have no intention other than to come fairly and fully before the Legislature, — that they have no direct interest in the matter, — and that their only wish is to do what they conceive will be most beneficial to the town.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL. — This, Sir, appears to me to be a question of very great difficulty. It is one, I assure the House, in the decision of which I have no personal interest whatever; but, upon the whole, I feel disposed to allow this Bill to be proceeded with. You, first of all, give to this company the power of purchasing the land; you give them no other power; they ask for no other power; and they will, of course, be obliged to come before you again in the next Session of Parliament, before they can proceed any further. I confess I do not see any objection to the withdrawal of this Bill, and the introduction of another in its stead.

Mr. CAYLEY. — I have only to observe, Sir, in support of the opinion just offered by the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, that this application is not made without just reason, as far as public feeling is concerned; for, not only the corporation, but the Trinity House, the Town Committee, and the Chamber of Commerce, are all in favour of the proposed Bill.

The Order for the second reading having been discharged, and the Bill withdrawn, —

SIR W. JAMES said: — I now move,

ALLISON'S DIVORCE BILL.

Order for further consideration of special Report, read.

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — This being the first case which has come before us under the new Orders to regulate our proceedings on Divorce Bills, the committee thought it their duty not to pass this Bill as a matter of course, but specially to call the attention of the House to the subject. In doing that, they feel that they will be discharging their duty. It is not my intention to ask for a vote affirming that the committee have done right; but if it be the opinion of the House that the committee are in error, it is desirable that that opinion should be made known, as the question will come before other committees on Monday next. The committee have acted, in this case, on the evidence taken before the Lords, and they hope that in doing so they have done right; but in order to afford time for consideration, I beg to move that the Bill be read a third time on Monday next.

Mr. WYNN. — I certainly think that sending this question to a committee upstairs is a convenient and desirable course; but my Honourable and Learned Friend will allow me to suggest whether, in the first case, it would not be better for the committee to report the result of the evidence shortly?

Mr. W. PATTEN. — I wish to call attention to that part of the Report which states that the agent, understanding, from the declared intention to refer the evidence taken in the House of Lords to this committee, that the attendance of the witnesses would not be required, had not summoned them from their several residences. Now, though the House of Lords may have been satisfied with that evidence, a committee of the House of Commons might not. I therefore think that no agent should be allowed to give notice to witnesses not to attend, as the committee is thereby deprived of the opportunity of hearing their evidence delivered personally.

Bill to be read a third time on Monday next.

Dublin and Drogheda Railway. — Leave given the Select Committee on Petitions for Private Bills to sit and proceed on Monday next.

Pontefract Honor Court Bill. — Read a third time; amendments made; Bill passed.

Lord Templemore's Estate Bill. — Read a third time, and passed.

Ship Propeller Company Bill. — Petition of Bennet Woodcroft and Robert Gardner, against. — Referred to the committee on the Bill; counsel ordered.

Rathkeale (Limerick) Inclosure Bill. — Petition for enlarging the time for the committee to report, till Monday, 8th of July. — To lie on the table, and to be printed.

Ballochney Railway Bill; Norwich Tonnage Bill.—Lords' amendments agreed to.

SMALL DEBTS BILLS.

LORD STANLEY. — Perhaps I may be allowed to call the attention of the House for a few minutes to the proceedings to be adopted with regard to the numerous Small Debts Bills which have been introduced. The House is aware that the proceedings of all the committees on Small Debts Bills have been suspended till Monday next, in order that, in the mean time, some discussion on the subject may take place, with a view to produce uniformity in those Bills, by the adoption of some general regulations which would be applicable to all of them. I understand that the committee, appointed to consider whether a general measure cannot be brought forward, will sit on Monday; and I believe it is probable that that committee will, within a few days afterwards, make their Report. It is, however, possible that it may be found impracticable to introduce a general measure founded on that Report at so late a period in the Session; but even if such should be the case, I think a course might be adopted which would secure uniformity in Small Debts Bills, and at the same time enable all parties anxious for such Bills to proceed in the present Session. The course I would suggest is this; — that when the committee shall have reported, the chairman or some other member of the committee shall take the trouble of abstracting the leading and essential principles of the Report, — such as the constitution of the court, — whether it is to be composed of local commissioners, or a barrister, or a barrister acting as an assessor to the local commissioners — (which I am inclined to think would be the most expedient plan); — whether the commissioners are to be appointed by the Lord Chancellor, or another party; — whether they are to be paid by fees or salary; — and whether they may or may not interfere with private rights. That abstract being made, I would propose that the chairman of the general committee should then move an instruction to all committees on local Small Debts Bills to make provisions in those Bills in accordance with those leading principles of the general measure to be afterwards introduced. By the adoption of that course, a parliamentary authority will be given to the proceedings of the different committees, — those committees will be in a position to proceed on a uniform principle, — and all parties, anxious for local Bills, will be enabled to obtain them in the present Session, — while all of them will be in accordance with the general measure to be afterwards introduced. I would suggest, therefore, that it might be wise to suspend the proceedings of committees on Small Debts Bills for a short time beyond Monday; and that an early day next week should be fixed upon, — when, after a short debate, the House, I am persuaded, will be enabled to frame some general instruction which will allow all the Small Debts Committees to proceed on one uniform system, that will be sanctioned, not by any extraneous authority, but by the authority of this House. Perhaps the Learned Judge Advocate can say when the Report of the Committee on County Courts will be presented?

SIR G. GREY. — The committee is summoned for Monday next; and will, I have no doubt, in a very short time afterwards, make their Report, as they have already agreed on the principle upon which they propose that a general measure shall be founded. Whether we can apply that principle to a series of separate Bills, I will not undertake to say; but I certainly think such a course may be liable to a variety of objections.

LORD STANLEY. — The main object will be, to get a certain instruction laid down by the House for Private Bill Committees, if they are to go on with these local Bills. Surely it will not be impossible for the House to decide how the courts are to be constituted, how the persons to preside in them are to be paid, by whom those persons are to be appointed, or whether they will or will not interfere with private rights? Upon these four or five simple points the House might make up its mind, and give an instruction to the several committees to frame their Bills accordingly.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I think the Private Bills before the House should be forwarded, if possible, without being subjected to the inconvenience of a delay, which, however, may be owing to the House itself. I own, without saying, at once, what course I shall take, that it seems to me that if the House is to consider the various points alluded to by the Noble Lord, it would be better to introduce, at once, some general measure on the subject, than to decide by any instruction, or any form of resolution, what those general points should be.

SIR G. STRICKLAND. — My great fear is, that the Session will pass away without anything being done, after the enormous expense to which the several parties with Bills before the House have been put, and are still subject. I am decidedly in favour of a general measure; but if that cannot be passed at once, — in justice to these parties, I think they should be allowed to proceed with their Bills, upon the understanding that they would only be continued until the general measure was passed.

Mr. P. THOMSON. — I agree with the Noble Lord, that it would be well, further to postpone the sittings of the committees on these Bills until we have the Report of the Committee on County Courts. After the declaration of the Chair the other day, we cannot allow those committees to proceed in the course suggested upon that occasion. I therefore move, "That the time for Committees on Small Debts Bills to report, be further enlarged till Monday, 8th of July."

Motion agreed to.

LIGHTING THE HOUSE.

Mr. WALLACE. — I beg to inquire of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, whether there is any prospect of seeing the "new lights" in the House soon, or not?

Mr. HUME. — Sir, I can only inform the House that the committee appointed to consider the question have taken all the evidence they intend to receive, and will meet on Wednesday next, to decide upon the course most likely to lead to the desired result. On Wednesday, therefore, I shall be enabled to give an answer to the question of the Honourable Member.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Mr. HUME. — Sir, I beg to move for a Return of the number of persons confined for debt in her Majesty's gaols in Middlesex and Surrey, and the other counties in England and Wales; and, also, a similar Return with regard to Scotland and Ireland; with a view of ascertaining how far the Bill which has recently passed the two Houses of Parliament has been successful in its operations.

Motion agreed to.

ADMITTANCE TO THE TOWER.

Mr. HUME. — Sir, this House, on the 14th of March, ordered Returns to be made of the number of persons admitted to view the Tower and the regalia; and also of the number of persons admitted at the Royal Academy. I beg, now, to move that they be made forthwith.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I believe there is some doubt upon the subject of these Returns, and therefore I hope that the Honourable Member will have no objection to postpone his motion for a few days.

Mr. HUME. — My only object is to obtain the Returns in continuation of those already made; and I beg to say that I shall renew my motion on Tuesday next.

SHANNON NAVIGATION BILL.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — Sir, I beg leave to withdraw my motion that the Grand Canal Company should be heard in opposition to this Bill, on its coming before the House to be read a second time.

CANADA.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — Sir, the Noble Lord opposite expressed his intention to intimate to the House what course he proposed to pursue with respect to the Bill providing for the union of the two provinces of Canada; and said that, if he proposed to press that Bill upon the House, he would declare his intention this evening. I beg the Noble Lord, now, to afford the House the information required.

LORD J. RUSSELL.—I have to state, for the information of the Right Honourable Baronet, and those who act with him, that I do not mean to press the second reading of that Bill this Session.

Mr. C. BULLER. — May I inquire of the Noble Lord, whether it is his intention to take any further steps, this Session, to provide for the government of Canada? and whether the subject is to be brought under the attention of the House at all?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I stated, yesterday, that the Bill for the government of Canada would be proceeded with, with a view of carrying it into a law.

Mr. C. BULLER. — For the union of the two provinces?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — No. I announced some time ago, with regard to that question, that despatches had arrived from Upper Canada, stating the opinions which were entertained in reference to it by the House of Assembly, and by a committee of that House. Further despatches were received yesterday, which have been read to-day, from the Governor of Upper Canada, stating some important circumstances as to the state of that province, which induce me to think that it would not be expedient, unless absolute necessity should compel the adoption of such a course, to have a discussion in this House as to that question, lest some unforeseen mischief might thereby be produced in the province.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — These were exactly the grounds on which I thought the question should be discussed. Will the Noble Lord indicate at once, or on some early day, — as we are not to proceed to legislate permanently with regard to Canada, — what course he intends to pursue, on a future occasion, to bring this question to an issue? Many persons are exceedingly anxious to know what is the intention of the Imperial Parliament upon this subject; and I venture to say that it will become necessary that they should apply themselves to the question, as one of paramount importance, — what is to be the situation of the Canadas? I request the Noble Lord, therefore, to state exactly the course which is to be adopted, — whether at the commencement of the next Session we are to send for persons to be examined at the bar of the House? or what other means are to be taken with a view to a proper decision being arrived at?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I think it better that I should answer the question of the Right Honourable Baronet now. I propose, then, in the course of the present Session, as I have already stated, to proceed with the further stages of the Bill, which will remove those difficulties that now stand in the way of the temporary government of Canada. It is the expressed intention of the Government to propose a plan, of which I have already given the outline, for the purpose of effecting the union of the two provinces. It has appeared from accounts which have been received, that the plan of the union, which was at first adopted of their own accord, and not only at the instance of several parties in the province of Lower Canada, but also of persons of great influence in the House of Assembly in Upper Canada, has since been the subject of considerable discussion; and by the last accounts it was shown, that, considerable difficulties prevailing upon the subject, a general desire existed — among one great party, at least — that the House should not proceed to legislate without first hearing the whole detail of the case of Upper Canada. I think, therefore, that it is necessary we should not endeavour to carry any further a measure providing for the union of the two provinces, without giving every fair consideration to the views which may be urged as to the manner in which that union ought to be carried into effect. It is the intention of the Government, then, having proposed their Bill, and having laid it before the House, to send it out to Canada, accompanied by certain instructions, with a view to obtain as general a concurrence as may be possible in the plan; and I hope that, at an early period of the ensuing Session of Parliament, we may be prepared with a plan which will be likely to tend to the permanent settlement of the question. The Right Honourable Baronet has stated that he objects to the course which I intend to pursue. Now, I do not in the least degree find fault with any objection he may have to make as to the line proposed to be adopted with regard to the union; but I must say that I believe that a very great part of the difficulties which have arisen with regard to the Canadas, in bringing forward any plan respecting them, has proceeded from the discussions which have taken place having been carried on, not so much with the purpose of relieving Canada, as for other purposes; and also from the course which was adopted, at the end of the last Session, with regard to the government of Lower Canada. My own belief is, that, if Lord Durham had been allowed to continue in the course which he was pursuing, he would have enabled Parliament to come to some decision which would have been satisfactory to all parties.

LORD STANLEY. — I did not quite understand the Noble Lord as to the course which he means to take as regards the Canada Government Bill. I understood the Noble Lord to say, that it is his intention to send out a Bill to Canada for the purpose of obtaining as general a concurrence of opinion in that province as possible; but I did not understand whether the Noble Lord, with the information he has received to-day, intends to send out the Bill which has been printed this morning, and delivered to Members? or whether he intends to withdraw that Bill, and send out another, embodying a different proposition?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — It is the intention of Government to send out the printed Bill to which the Noble Lord refers.

METROPOLIS POLICE BILL.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — Sir, I wish to inquire whether the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department can state to the House the day on which he intends to proceed with the Metropolitan Police Bill?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I shall proceed with it on Thursday next, if possible.

FACTORIES.

LORD ASHLEY. — In consequence of a technical informality, I beg to withdraw the notice which I gave of a motion for an instruction to the Committee on the Factories Bill, and, at the same time, to ask the Noble Lord when he intends to lay on the table the last Reports of the factory inspectors, which has now been due ever since March last — and which, I have been given to understand, contains most important matters relating to the operation of the Factory Act?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I have no objection to lay the Reports in question on the table; but I am not quite sure that they are now in a state to enable me to do so.

LORD ASHLEY. — But they have been due to the House three months and more.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE.

Mr. CAYLEY. — I wish to inquire whether, with reference to what fell from the Right Honourable Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, on a former evening, he will be prepared, on the part of the Government, to propose any measure on the subject of harbours of refuge on the north-eastern coast?

Mr. P. THOMSON. — Sir, I deny that anything fell from me, on a former occasion, to justify the Honourable Member in supposing that Government had taken up this question. On the occasion referred to, I objected to a particular Bill, by which tolls were authorised to be levied, being introduced as a Private Bill, — thinking, as I did, that a Bill giving such an authority ought to have been a Public Bill. Nor can I give the Honourable Gentleman an affirmative answer as to whether the Government will take up the question of harbours of refuge; for no sooner is it suggested that any one particular spot is fitted for the purpose in any part of the kingdom, than up start five or six Gentlemen, each maintaining that there is some other spot in his own immediate neighbourhood more especially adapted to the purpose. I can, however, promise that the Admiralty will give every assistance in their power in perfecting the survey of the coast.

Mr. CAYLEY. — Am I to understand that the survey by the Admiralty will be made forthwith?

Mr. P. THOMSON. — All that I said was, that the Admiralty would give every assistance in their power, — that is to say, as far as the use of the charts in their possession. For the Admiralty to have a survey of the coast expressly made, would be useless and unnecessary.

MISCELLANEOUS PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented, and ordered to lie on the table; namely, —

Sale of Beer Bill, — From Stickney, against.

BANKRUPTS' ESTATES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Read a third time, and passed.

OVERLAND COMMUNICATION WITH INDIA.

Mr. M. PHILIPS. — I wish to put a question to the Right Honourable Baronet the President of the Board of Control with reference to the present state of steam communication with the East Indies. Are the papers moved for last Session on this subject prepared? and how soon may they be expected to be laid on the table of the House? With reference, also, to the public meetings which have taken place on the subject of overland communication with India through Egypt, has the Right Honourable Gentleman received any communications? and will he make them public?

Digitized by Google

SIR JOHN HOBHOUSE. — Sir, the Returns to which the Honourable Gentleman alludes, were moved for last Session, but there has not been time to prepare them before the close of the Session; and as the order for their production has not been renewed, the East India Company have thought themselves not called upon to present them. If, however, the Honourable Gentleman wishes for them, they shall be presented. As to the other question of the Honourable Gentleman, it is quite true that I have received several written communications from Mr. Curtis, the chairman of the association, on the subject, and that I have written in answer to those communications, and also communicated with the East India Company. With regard to the communications with Mr. Curtis, I cannot in courtesy agree to make them public; but if that gentleman think fit to do so, I cannot prevent him.

Mr. M. PHILIPS. — I also wish to know whether the expression of public opinion which has been witnessed, will lead to an extension of the means of communication to Ceylon and Madras, as well as to Calcutta and Bombay?

SIR JOHN HOBHOUSE. — No steps have been taken either by the Government or the Company to extend the communication to Ceylon and Madras, as well as to Calcutta and Bombay. The Honourable Gentleman will, no doubt, remember that the recommendation of the committee which sat on the subject was, that Bombay, alone, should be the subject of the first experiment. Only two years have elapsed, and the experiment has, therefore, not been sufficiently tried, to show whether such extension is absolutely called for.

SHANNON NAVIGATION.

SIR F. TRENCH. — May I inquire whether the intention of the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is to mend or to rebuild the Bridge of Athlone? or whether it is to remain in its present abominable state, and to await the fate of the Shannon Navigation Bill?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Sir, the rebuilding of the Bridge of Athlone forms a part of a general Bill for improving the navigation of the Shannon, which is now on the table of the House; and I cannot separate that Bill into distinct parts. For the delay of the Bill I am not responsible; it has arisen in consequence of a petition having been presented, praying that counsel be heard at the bar against the Bill. That opposition has now been withdrawn, and I therefore intend to move the second reading of the Bill at once.

BANKING IN IRELAND.

Mr. HUME. — Sir, I wish to know whether the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will name a day for the introduction of the Irish Banking Bill?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — The Governor and Deputy Governor of the Bank of Ireland have arrived in town this day, and I shall therefore be able to name an early day for the discussion. In the present state of the public business, I cannot now name the day; but I will certainly take the very earliest opportunity of pressing on the measure.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I do not see how the Right Honourable Gentleman can satisfy the people of Ireland by introducing such a Bill at so advanced a period of the Session. Would it not be better to state the nature of the plan at once, and let it stand over till next Session? It now seems that the Right Honourable Gentleman is about to act on a principle different from that which he formerly stated — hypothetically, at least. It seems that he now proposes to keep up the monopoly of the Bank of Ireland to the extent of fifty miles round Dublin.

OUTRAGE ON THE BRITISH FLAG.

LORD VISCOUNT INGESTRE. — Sir, I have observed from the public prints, that another outrage on our flag has been committed in the Mexican Seas. Has the Admiralty received any information on the subject?

SIR T. TROUBRIDGE. — The Noble Lord must be aware that, on a subject of such importance, a proper notice ought to have been given; and that it would be most improper for me to answer from memory, without first referring to the facts to which his question relates.

LORD INGESTRE. — Then, Sir, I give notice that I shall ask the question on Monday next.

POOR LAW ACT CONTINUANCE BILL.

Mr. HAWES.—May I inquire when the Noble Lord will bring forward the Poor Law Act Continuance Bill? I hope full opportunity will be given for discussing so important a measure.

LORD J. RUSSELL.—I will give due notice before the Bill is brought in.

ELECTION PETITIONS' TRIALS BILL.

On the Order of the Day for the further consideration, in committee, of the Report of this Bill,—

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said:—Sir, I now propose to bring up the clauses I have framed, for the purpose of carrying into effect the proposal I made to the committee.

Additional clauses brought up, and Bill reported.

The Bill was then recommitted; considered in committee, and reported; further consideration of Report on Thursday next; Bill, as amended, to be printed.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—I beg, now, to move the Order of the Day for going into committee on this Bill.

On the question being put,—

Mr. SHAW said:—I really should like to know in what position we stand with respect to this Bill? The second reading was suffered to take place without discussion, excepting upon some differences of opinion amongst those who sit on this side of the House. The discussion upon former Bills, on the same subject, took place on motions for going into committee. The present Bill, I believe, was committed, pro formâ, without discussion, and various additions have been introduced into it, some of them making very material changes in the Bill. Altogether, a Bill of 250 clauses has been produced,—being 34 more than the Bill which was presented in February; there is, likewise an Appendix of 20 pages; and all this without explanation from the Government. The present Bill contains a totally new principle of franchise: it proposes, for the first time, to apply the English franchise to Irish corporations. Looking to the importance of the principle, and the short time that has been given for considering the effect of the new clauses introduced, I put it to the Noble Lord, whether it is quite fair to go into any matters, to-night, on which there may be a difference of opinion? It was not until the last two days that any intimation at all was given of the intentions of the Government to bring it forward this evening. The Noble Lord cannot charge this side of the House with having caused any delay, up to the present moment. As I stated last night, it was not considered, until very lately, that the Government intended to persevere; and, certainly, under all the circumstances, Gentlemen on this side of the House did not expect to be pressed into a discussion of the measure without a longer notice. Now, I am disposed to make what may be considered a fair compromise, and to give up the right of taking any discussion, now, on the question that the Speaker do leave the chair. If the Noble Lord will consent to go into committee, pro formâ, such clauses as will not raise considerable discussion might be agreed to. The others can be deferred; and I, and the Honourable Gentleman with whom I act, will then have time to consider the real points upon which we objected, and upon which we will ultimately divide. For instance, the clauses up to the sixth can be agreed to without serious division. The clauses to which objection exists may be brought on at a future period.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—I cannot say that I think the Right Honourable Gentleman is prepared to make any great concession. The Right Honourable Gentleman says, in the first place, that he is ready to give up the right, which he and his friends certainly have, of taking a discussion on the question that the Speaker do leave the chair, as has been done on former occasions. But the Right Honourable Gentleman should recollect that, last year, a different course was pursued with respect to this Bill. Previously, it had been contended by Honourable Gentlemen on the other side, that it was better to extinguish corporations altogether,—which was a principle entirely different from that of the present Bill. Last year, a different course was adopted, and it was stated by Honourable Gentlemen on the other side, that they were prepared to consider the question of corporations founded on an elective or popular principle, and, therefore, that they differed only upon details. After such a statement, and especially after a discussion and division had taken place upon the second reading of the Bill in the present year, I thought that there was no opportunity, now, for going back to a question which must be considered a dead and by-gone question. The question, at present, is as to the details of the Bill; and when I proposed that the Speaker should leave the chair, to go into committee on the Bill, I felt that it had been kept a sufficiently long time before the House. It was introduced in February, and went into committee in April. The Right Honourable Gentleman says that he is ready to allow us to go as far as five clauses of the Bill; but he will retain the right of objecting to every word and syllable of the 245 clauses that remain. Now, I do not think that the concession is to be received with any extraordinary gratitude. I think it would be better to go on with the Bill, and go at once into the clauses upon which there is the greatest difference of opinion, — those with respect to the franchise, — and leave the more complicated clauses until the Right Honourable Gentleman is prepared with his amendment. I will either do this, or go regularly through the Bill, as the House may think proper.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — Sir, I do trust the Noble Lord will not press on the consideration of the Bill, which many Gentlemen on both sides the House believed the Government did not intend to proceed with this Session; — for the Bill, which was introduced in February, has been postponed from week to week. The Bill, as amended, has not been, in a printed form, beyond a fortnight or three weeks; and it is increased from 216 clauses to 250. Here is a series of 34 new clauses introduced, — ten of which — beginning at the 184th — have for their purpose the amendment of the Poor Relief Act; and I am very much disposed to doubt the propriety of inserting them here. The qualification provided by this Bill is different from what it was in former Bills. The qualification established by the Bill is an 8*l.* qualification, but it is to last only for three years. After that, as I collect from the Bill, every person who is assessed to the poor-rate, at however small a payment, is to have the borough qualification. If the 8*l.* qualification were to be permanent, I could understand how one series of clauses should be introduced; but, as this qualification is to last for only three years, I cannot perceive the object with which they have been inserted in the Bill. The Bill is thus, for some cause or other which I cannot understand, encumbered with this series of clauses for the amendment of the Poor Relief Act, which ought to be the subject of another Bill. I really, therefore, think that the House ought to be allowed some little time for the consideration of the 250 clauses contained in the Bill. I may, here, observe that the powers given to the town councils by this Bill are extremely formidable. I boldly assert that, under this Bill, it will be in the power of the town council to create any number of offices they please; to allocate any amount of salary they think fit; and to supply any deficiency in the borough fund for those purposes, by taxing, ad libitum, the inhabitants of the town.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — No, no!

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — My Honourable Friend says, "No!" but I can direct his attention to the clauses by which the power is given as I state. I say they have the power to create new officers — to pay what salaries they please — and to tax the inhabitants for the purpose of raising funds to pay those salaries; and, moreover, this they have power of doing in the most objectionable manner, — namely, by the gradinated scale of the 9th George IV. In the first place, to show that they have the power to appoint officers, I refer my Honourable Friend to Clause 79. I do not say that this is a new clause; but it is new with respect to former Bills; and I call upon the House to be cautious how they sanction a principle of this dangerous kind. Clause 79., then, is to the effect that the town council in every borough in Schedule A, in the year in which this Act comes into operation, shall appoint fit and proper persons to be town clerk, and such other officers as are usually appointed in such boroughs. Now, I say this is an unlimited power. Then, as to taxing, I beg to refer the House to Section 108., which empowers the town council, in case the borough fund should be insufficient for the purposes aforesaid, to estimate, from time to time, what fund will be sufficient for carrying into effect the provisions of this Act, and to order a rate to be made. And for that purpose the council are to have all the powers conferred by the Act of 9 George IV. I think that I have now satisfactorily shown that these councils are to have the power of appointing officers in such number as they may think fit,—that they are to have the power of fixing the salaries, and of raising such sums as may be necessary to pay them under the 9th of George IV., according to that most unjust standard of taxation, the graduated scale. Surely, these are most formidable powers to be given to the town councils. Nay, I see nothing in the Bill to prevent the corporation of Dublin making the Honourable and Learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. O'Connell) Lord Mayor of Dublin, and giving him a salary of 50,000*l.* a-year, which they might make the citizens of Dublin pay.

Digitized by Google

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and laughter.]

I have stated that there is one series of clauses, the object of which properly relates to the amendment of the Poor Law Act passed last year. There is also another series, from Clause 144. to Clause 155., which involve a principle quite new. I am not saying that these may not be very judicious clauses; but I maintain that they contain a perfectly novel principle, and that they did not appear in the Bill as printed in February. Honourable Gentlemen who represent English and Scotch cities and counties may not be aware how we manage fiscal matters in Ireland. In Ireland, all funds for local purposes are raised by the grand juries; but this Bill proposes to transfer this power to the town councils in boroughs. This, therefore, is an innovation upon the practice hitherto established, and requires time for consideration. The House should be cautious how it confers such a power on a town council; and, at any rate, it should take care to introduce proper guards against the dangers which might accrue from the town council being armed with this new authority. I think that, if this power were conferred upon the town council, the franchise should, at any rate, be considerably extended. Votes should be given to the landlords of persons not holding leases, who would not have votes themselves. Again, the 193d section contains a provision, the object of which, I confess, I do not understand. It provides that all tenements in these boroughs shall be separately valued. Time, therefore, is required to enable the House to look into that, and to see to what purposes the clause might be applied. I, for one, will agree entirely to the introduction of provisions which will bring about a perfect valuation. The sixth clause, also, appears to me to have some particular object in view, as the clause can only apply to the city of Dublin. The clause seems to point to that particular custom in Dublin, which was put forward and established by affidavit in the case known as Hancock's Case, in "The King v. The Corporation of Dublin." The corporation claimed to have a veto on the freedom of any individual, and a writ of mandamus was, accordingly, refused on the ground that the custom was a reasonable custom. There is no other corporation in Ireland to which such a right belongs; and it is therefore perfectly manifest that this clause has been introduced with a particular object in view. Sir, I will not, now, detain the House further.

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH.—I am inclined to think, from what has already occurred, that not much time would be gained if we were to proceed, now, to discuss the Bill in committee. I am quite ready to conduct our political differences in a conciliatory spirit, and in a mode most likely to advance the public business; and therefore, if the Right Honourable and Learned Recorder still adhere to the objections which he has raised, perhaps he will allow the House to go into committee, now, and take some of the unobjected clauses,—postponing those on which considerable discussion is expected to arise,—it being understood that the points likely to be discussed shall be fully considered beforehand, and that notice shall be given, if possible, of the amendments which it is proposed to make. If that arrangement be acceded to, I should hope that no further objection will be made to you, Sir, leaving the chair, in order that the House may go into committee at once, and address themselves to the points not in dispute.

Mr. O'CONNELL.—I only hope that, when the subject is next discussed, we shall really go on with the business.

On the question being put, "That the Speaker do leave the chair,"—

Mr. Serjeant Jackson presented petitions against the Bill,—from Galway; and Youghal.—Ordered to lie on the table.

SIR GEORGE SINCLAIR.—I wish to take this opportunity of stating that it is my determination to persevere in opposing this Bill. I consider the measure calculated to injure, seriously, the Protestant interests of the country; and although I will not, now, trespass upon the time of the House, I reserve to myself the right of stating, at length, on the bringing up of the Report, the reasons why I object to this Bill, — all of which have been strongly confirmed since last year.

The House then resolved into committee, Mr. BERNAL in the chair.

The preamble was postponed.

Clauses 1. to 5. were severally agreed to.

Clauses 6. and 7. were severally postponed.

Clauses 8, 9, and 10. were severally agreed to.

Clauses 11, 12, and 13. were severally postponed.

On Clause 14. being put, —

Mr. LITTON said: — Really, I feel myself quite incompetent, in proceeding at such a rate with the Bill, to decide how far clauses which now appear valueless to one side of the House, and innocuous to the other, may become valuable and important by the rejection or passing of other clauses. Many of the clauses now passing as a matter of course, and with our consent, may break up the spirit or letter of some other clauses, or may render the Bill a mass of confusion; and thus, clauses now passed as a matter of course, may become ridiculous, useless, or injurious. I do not see that any time will be gained by the course we are taking; and, really, it is impossible to understand the Bill by thus advancing from the thirtieth to the fiftieth, and from the fiftieth perhaps to the hundredth clause.

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — I do not see the evils which the Honourable and Learned Gentleman seems to apprehend. All the clauses up to 20. appear to be of a formal nature.

Mr. LITTON. — I beg the Noble Lord's pardon. I, for one, have a great objection to the tenth clause. Now, the committee passed that clause in a moment. That is the reason I object to going on in this way.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — The Honourable and Learned Gentleman can reserve himself for the bringing up of the Report.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — I do not think there is any objection to going on up to Clause 19. inclusive. At Clause 20. we must stop.

The clause was then agreed to.

Clauses 15. to 19. were severally agreed to.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — It will be convenient if the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman will give notice of the clause he means to object to, and the amendment he means to propose.

Mr. SHAW. — If the Noble Lord will let us know when he will go into the Bill, I will endeavour to give due notice of my amendments.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — On Thursday.

The House then resumed; the Chairman reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on Thursday next.

PUBLIC OFFICES (DOWNING STREET).

On the motion of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, committee nominated: — Mr. Robert Gordon, Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Warburton, Mr. Goulburn, Mr. Hawes, Sir Robert Harry Inglis, Mr. Robert Steuart, Sir Thomas Fremantle, Mr. Hume, Colonel Davies, Mr. Edward John Stanley, Lord Charles Fitzroy, Mr. Planta, Sir De Lacy Evans, and Mr. Greene. — Power to send for persons, papers, and records; five to be the quorum.

SHANNON NAVIGATION BILL.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I beg, now, to move that this Bill be read a second time.

On the question being put, —

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER said: — I do not rise to oppose the second reading of this Bill; but I cannot help stating that a commission for the purposes of this Bill is, in my opinion, unnecessary, as I think the business might be transacted by the Board of Works.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — In answer to the remark of the Honourable Gentleman, I will briefly explain that there are to be three commissioners; two of them are Colonel Burgoyne and Mr. R. Griffiths, who are to act gratuitously, and Captain Jones, the chief engineer, who was recommended by Colonel Burgoyne, — and he, only, is to be paid. The whole question, however, will be better discussed in committee. There are stringent clauses in the Bill which I deem to be absolutely necessary in order to insure the repayment of the money advanced; for, however anxious I may be to promote the improvement of Ireland, I am bound to do my duty as a public officer, and to protect the public purse. The question of compensation has been already disposed of, and I hope it will not be renewed. I only ask the House to give its consent to the second reading, and to reserve all discussion on the details of the Bill until it goes into committee.

Mr. LUCAS. — For my part, I do not object to the stringent provisions of the Bill; for it has been observed that the sums advanced by this country in aid of public works in Ireland are never repaid. I hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will enforce the payment of the loans to Ireland; for he will then do a service to the country, — inasmuch as, without a proper understanding on this subject, public credit must be injured, and the difficulty of getting capital into Ireland increased. What is intended to be a loan, should be so called when asked for, and the payment of it should be insisted upon; but where there is no prospect of repayment, it would be much better to call it a grant at once.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I think that gratuitous commissioners are, generally, very bad commissioners. I hope that the question of compensation will not be opened in committee, — that no discussion will take place as to whether too much or too little has been given. I knew one instance in which the claim was for 30,000*l.*, and the award was made for 5000*l.* only. I did not bring the case before the House; but I advised the parties to submit, rather than to re-open the case. I think the provisions of the Bill with regard to the repayment of loans cannot be too stringent. I must tell those who think that Ireland borrows money and never pays it, that not one shilling was ever raised on the county rates of Ireland, by a general Act of Parliament, but it was repaid, and that with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. When I hear men talk of a matter of bounty, and that the English Members of this House are ready to advance money as a bounty, I must say that I do not think such measures any bounty at all, but a severe burden upon Ireland, seeing that 5 per cent. must be paid for money raised at 3½ per cent. I challenge any Honourable Gentleman to produce a case where borrowed money was not repaid by Ireland to the last farthing.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Rather than reopen the question of compensation, I would give up the Bill. I shall certainly resist any attempt to go into that subject again.

Mr. SHAW. — I consider it a great national object, as much to the credit of England as to the advantage of Ireland, that English credit should be made instrumental in promoting Irish objects; and, on the other hand, there should be a full assurance of repayment. I quite agree with my Honourable Friend behind me, that there is a general impression — and I cannot help thinking, with the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin, that it is an unjust one — that money advanced to Ireland is, generally, not repaid. There is no instance, I believe, of money being fairly lent to Ireland without having been repaid. It is quite useless to refer to loans to the clergy, because every one knows that they were made under circumstances which precluded all just expectation of repayment. I believe that, if it had not been for this impression, money would have been promptly advanced for railways in Ireland.

Mr. HUME. — I am quite satisfied that the proposition for advancing money for railways was lost in consequence of the impression in this House that the money would not be repaid. I cannot but regret that the further discussion upon that question has been given up. Money could not be lent for a better purpose; and I hope her Majesty's Government will not fail to introduce a measure early in the ensuing Session. I find that 29,000,000*l.* of money paid up, and 12,000,000*l.* to be paid, is the amount laid out upon railways in England alone; and if proper measures had been taken, a very large amount of money would now be circulating in Ireland.

Mr. SERJEANT JACKSON. — I feel very much the vast importance of the Shannon navigation, to Ireland and this country, and also the vast importance of railroads. I am not aware whether the Right Honourable Gentleman knows it, — but there is an impression abroad that the Shannon Navigation Bill is a job, and that the Right Honourable Gentleman has nothing but a job in view. I am glad to hear, however, from the Right Honourable Gentleman, his declaration that he does not mean to pay any other commissioner than the one who must necessarily be very much employed in the work; and that the Bill is not got up for the purpose of putting patronage into the hands of the Government. As I opposed the plan for railroads in Ireland, I think it right to say that, upon hearing the subsequent statements of the Noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland, the objections I entertained were entirely removed by what I then understood to be the view of the Noble Lord. I therefore cannot but express a hope that the Government will press forward their amended project early in the ensuing Session, — when I trust they will receive general support.

Mr. S. O'BRIEN. — I hope the Noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland will not, even now, finally abandon his railway scheme, but that he will take the sense of the House upon it; if so, I am sure the Noble Lord would now carry it by a large majority. With respect to the Bill before the House I will merely observe that it has my cordial support.

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — I have no intention to enter, at this time, into the merits of the Railway question; I only hope my Right Honourable Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be more successful in his scheme of water carriage, than I was in that of land carriage. I have been involuntarily compelled to abandon that measure; but had I been allowed to prosecute it, I am sure I could have satisfied the Honourable and Learned Member for Bandon that any notion of patronage was as unfounded in that instance as it has been proved to be unfounded with respect to the Bill in the hands of my Right Honourable Friend.

Mr. WYSE. — I deeply regret that the Irish Railways Bill has been given up, almost without consideration; and I trust, if the Noble Lord does not renew the question in the next Session, that some Honourable Member on one side of the House or the other will do so, and thus afford an opportunity, not only of discussing the merits of the measure, but of clearing the Irish people from the aspersions which have been cast upon them. I concur with the Honourable Member for Kilkenny in thinking that if the plan of the Noble Lord had been acted on in England, large sums might have been saved in the construction of railways; the monopolies by which, I fear, the country will ere long be embarrassed, would not have been created; and the public might have secured those profits which now go into the hands of private individuals.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I should have been glad if the Government had not abandoned their scheme with reference to Irish railways, if it had only been for the purpose of affording a comparison between railroads constructed by the Government, and those undertaken by private individuals; and of thus ascertaining which system of construction is the more calculated to promote the public interests. With this view, I hope, early next Session, the Government will renew their scheme.

Mr. DARBY. — I should not have offered one word upon this occasion, but for what has been said upon a question not now before the House, — the Government scheme for the construction of railways in Ireland. My opinion is, that such matters ought to be left for private speculation, and free from Government interference. Therefore, if the object of this Bill were to authorise an advance of the public money for the construction of railways under the control of the Government, I should object to the second reading; but as it is not, and believing that some benefit will arise from it, I, for one, hope the House will allow it to pass without opposition.

Mr. SHEIL. — In reference to those provisions in the Bill before the House, which relate to the subject of awards and compensation, I wish to observe, that although there may be no suspicion of bias in the commissioners, who without the intervention of juries are to make the awards, still, as it is possible they may be wrong in one case out of a hundred, I think there ought to be an appeal allowed from their decision.

The question was then agreed to; Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday next.

PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND) BILL.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I have now to move, Sir, that the House resolve itself into committee on the Public Works (Ireland) Bill. My object in making the motion is this; — a sum of money has been granted by Parliament for the purpose of carrying on public works in Ireland, but the application of that money is limited to the Act 1 and 2 Will. IV.; whereas the object of this Bill is, to make this money applicable to the purposes of the two Acts, the 1 and 2 Will. IV. and 1st of Victoria.

Digitized by Google

Question put, and agreed to; House resolved itself into a committee of the whole House.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — The vote I have to move is, 'That the sum of 50,000*l.* appropriated by an Act of the last Session of Parliament to the promotion and extension of public works in Ireland, out of the sum of 500,000*l.* in Exchequer bills thereby authorised to be issued, shall be applied to the purposes of grants or loans, under the provisions of an Act passed in the first and second years of his late Majesty, and of an Act passed in the first year of her present Majesty."

Upon the question being put from the chair, —

Mr. HUME said: — How much of the 50,000*l.* remains to be appropriated?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — The original sum voted was applicable to the purposes of both the statutes I have alluded to, but this sum of 50,000*l.* was limited to the purposes of the first of those statutes. The object now is to appropriate it to both. I am not at present able to state whether any portion has been appropriated. Speaking from recollection, I should say none; but in a future stage of the Bill I shall be prepared to answer the question.

Mr. LUCAS. — I did not expect this question would have been brought forward to-night, and therefore cannot be blamed if I am very much astray as to the purport of the Returns on this subject which have been furnished to the House. I have, however, a very strong recollection that these moneys have been lent by the Government in every possible variety as to the mode of loan and as to the rate of interest. There have, in some cases, been grants, — in others, loans, in proportion to the amount of tithe commutation; — and, without being prepared to state what ought to be done in such matters, I think I have a right to suggest that there ought to be some more fixed principle in these transactions.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — It is impossible, à priori, to do more than define particular limits within which a certain discretion shall be exercised; but, in the papers on the table of the House, the Honourable Gentleman will find the facts of every single case stated. I quite admit that it is a proper subject for suspicion, when there is a discretionary power in the Treasury to lower the rate of interest in one case, and raise it in another, without control; but, in this case, the Honourable Gentleman can call for the production of the whole of the accounts, which may be examined and investigated to the fullest extent. The Honourable Gentleman has, undoubtedly, done perfectly right in calling attention to this subject; but I may, also, be permitted to say, that there is no single act, no single department, of the Government, which will bear a closer or fuller investigation than that of the Board of Works in Ireland; and I assure the Honourable Gentleman and the House, that I am quite ready to give all and every information on this subject.

CAPTAIN BOLDERO. — I see there are three Money Bills on the Orders of the Day for Ireland, exclusive of the project for advancing money for railways, the Report on which has been withdrawn. I wish to ask the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much money he intends to advance for Ireland this year in the shape of loans and grants? and how much he intends to give for England?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I am glad the Honourable and Gallant Member has asked the question. The Honourable and Gallant Gentleman has asked the question with the view of insinuating that extravagant aid is given to Ireland by means of the three Bills now in progress. The first Bill, — the Loan Bill, — though it has an alarming sound, and is calculated to produce on the minds of English Members an apprehension of gross inequality of aid as regards Ireland, is, in fact, to enable a charitable society to lend sums not exceeding 5*l.* to needy persons, and take nothing from the public purse. The second Bill is to obtain the authority of an Act of Parliament for the appropriation of a sum which has already been granted. And the third Bill — the Shannon Navigation Bill — appertains to a subject which has been thrice under the consideration of the House; — which was entered upon during the Administration of the Earl of Liverpool, — and which has been before Parliament ever since.

CAPTAIN BOLDERO. — I never heard a question so neatly avoided in my life. The question put was this, — What was the sum which was advanced to Ireland by loans and grants? and what the sum advanced to England?

Digitized by Google

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I have told the Honourable and Gallant Member that the first Bill is a charitable Bill.

CAPTAIN BOLDERO. — The amount ?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — The amount is nothing at all. The second is merely to provide for the allocation of money which has been already voted by Parliament; therefore, no money is, now, asked for by that. And with regard to the Shannon navigation, I have told the Honourable and Gallant Member that the total sum to be expended is that which is estimated for; half of which is to be repaid by the Irish counties, by a county rate — to the levying of which they are pledged. The other half is that sum which was granted for the purpose, under the provisions of an Act which passed three years ago, with the assent of every Member of the House; and that sum, stated in the estimate, and so provided for, is the maximum of the expenditure to be incurred, and to be granted for the improvement of that most important navigation. The whole grant — which will extend over five or six years — will not be more than 150,000*l*.

The resolution was then agreed to; House resumed; Resolution to be reported on Monday next.

SUGAR DUTIES BILL.

On the motion of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER — the Order of the Day for the third reading, read.

Mr. EWART. — The Bill was postponed on a former occasion, when it was on the Orders, on the ground of the absence of several Honourable Gentlemen who were anxious to take part in the discussion upon it. It was not expected to be brought on to-night; and although I am desirous of stating my views, I have come down quite unprepared for the discussion. I believe this to be also the case with other Honourable Members. I trust, then, under these circumstances, the Right Honourable Gentleman will not object to postpone the Bill to another day.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I postponed this Bill the other evening, because the Honourable Gentleman and the Honourable Member for the Tower Hamlets were not in their places. I should have brought it on then, had they been present; and as they are now present, I think I am entitled to proceed with it.

Mr. EWART. — I did not know that it was to be brought on, two hours ago.

On the question being put, "That the Bill be read a third time,"—

Mr. EWART said: — I cannot allow the Bill to be read a third time without discussion.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I do not object to my Honourable Friend going into the discussion on it; but I do not think it reasonable to ask me again to put it off.

Mr. EWART. — It is a subject full of statistics, and I am not prepared to go into the question at this moment.

Several HONOURABLE MEMBERS. — Go on!

Mr. EWART. — The object of the motion of which I have given notice, and which I am sorry at this time to bring before the House, is, in the first place, to show to the House the high price at which sugar will, probably, arrive, in this country; and, in the second place, to call their attention to the great advantages which might result to this country if Parliament would so far modify the laws which protect colonial sugar, as to admit sugar which is the produce of free labour, on terms distinguished from those applying to sugar which is the produce of slave labour. The House may probably be aware that petitions have been presented to this House from the large commercial communities of Liverpool, Glasgow, and other places, in favour of the reduction I propose. Our exports to the Brazils are of very large amount, and our imports thence are very limited. The objection of the friends of humanity to the admission of the sugar of the Brazils is, that it is the produce of slave labour. I confess I am, so far, of their opinion. I wish to reduce the duties on sugar, cocoa, coffee, and other articles of tropical production, coming from those countries where they are produced by free labour, in contradistinction to the duties on slave labour products. I will, for a moment, call the attention of the House to the enormous price which the people of this country are obliged to pay for sugar, in the shape of sugar duties and protection of colonial sugar. I dare to say that many Honourable Gentlemen present are aware that the difference of price between colonial sugar and foreign sugar is full 18*s.* per cwt. By the last Returns, the average price of British plantation sugar was 41*s.* 2½*d.*, exclusive of the duty of 24*s.*, while good Manilla sugar was selling at 23*s.* 6*d.* per cwt.,—a difference of no less than 76 per cent. I think that the people of this country ought not to be called upon to pay the large sums which they do to the protective tax on sugar, considering the large amount of 20,000,000*l.*, which they paid—and I think, properly paid—four years ago, in compensation to the West India planters; although, I believe, many persons look back with regret to that grant. It has struck me as not being a disadvantageous mode of statement to institute a comparison between the consumption of sugar in these kingdoms, and the consumption of those articles with which sugar is generally used, such as tea, coffee, and cocoa; and the result of my inquiries is to show that, while the consumption of those articles has considerably increased, that of sugar, instead of proportionably increasing, has absolutely retrograded. The consumption of cocoa has increased very considerably. Tea appears to be much more stationary. From authentic documents, to which I have had access, it appears that, in 1801, the consumption of tea was 1 lb. 4 oz. for each individual in the country. In the present year, it does not amount to more than 1 lb. 5 oz. for each individual. In 1801, there was not more than 1 oz., upon the average, of coffee consumed by each individual. In 1811, the average was 8 oz.; in 1821, about the same; while, in 1831 it rose to about 1 lb. 5 oz.; and in 1838, it was 1 lb. 6 oz. I will now turn to sugar, which presents a much less favourable appearance. Each individual consumed, in 1801, about 30 lb.; in 1811, about the same; and in consequence of the increase of the duty, the average amount consumed by each individual has now decreased to 19 lb. These results appear still more remarkable in the case of Ireland. The saying of Mr. Huskisson, in 1829, is still strictly true,—that above one third of the inhabitants of this country cannot have sugar with their coffee. The sugar refiners have long been aware of the very inadequate demand for their goods. It is true that we have derived some advantage from the introduction of East India sugar; its consumption is, however, but limited in its extent. The Drawback Bill of last year was a good Bill, as far as it went; and the equalisation of the duties payable on East and West India sugar, was also beneficial in its operation. I desire, however, to see the same advantage extended through all those portions of the East Indies which, though not nominally British possessions, are such in reality. I am anxious, also, that the sugar trade should be open to every country where sugar is the produce of free labour. I am anxious to see the gates of commerce thrown wide open, and invidious distinctions put an end to. There can be no doubt that an ample supply of free labour sugar might be had. Thirty years ago, the cultivation of sugar was unknown in Siam. In 1821, the produce was only one tenth of what it is now. Siam is capable of producing sugar to the extent of 15,000 tons annually,—and all the produce of free labour. The next source of supply would be Manilla, the exports from which, at this time, are no less than 13,500 tons. Then, the export of sugar from Java has, of late years, very considerably increased; and I am not making the calculation too low, when I state, that that island would be capable of supplying sugar to the extent of 20,000 tons per annum,—all the produce of free Javenese or Chinese labour. China could export 6000 tons, and Cochin China 1000 tons. Thus a total amount of free labour sugar might be procured, far more than equal to the consumption of this country; and by taking your sugar from these sources, you would be giving encouragement to the great principle of freedom, instead of having recourse to the produce of slave labour for our supplies. But I moreover look forward to the day when sugar will also be imported from the coast of Africa, and when free labour may be universally substituted for the odious bonds of slavery. I believe that that infamous traffic is not to be put down by armed vessels, but by commerce. I know that exportations of coffee have long taken place from Sierra Leone; and, by encouraging the cultivation of coffee and sugar in that country, we should open to ourselves a new source of supply, besides conferring a great benefit on that country. I hold in my hand a statement which I have received from a gentleman who is acquainted with that part of Africa, wherein he says,—

> That the British Government might easily put down the slave trade on this coast, by applying that moral influence which it possesses, to induce the people to turn their attention to agriculture and commerce; and that this is the only method that can succeed.

If, then, it be possible to induce the inhabitants of Africa to apply themselves to the cultivation of the soil by means of free labour, we shall do much towards civilising that country; while, at the same time, we should hold out hopes to the friends of humanity in this country, which, hitherto, they have not been able to indulge in. I would, first, wish the House to reflect on the great advantages that must arise, in a moral point of view, from encouraging the trade in sugar and other commodities, the produce of free labour; and then, as a matter of interest, I would ask them to consider how important it is that we should endeavour to provide, by some means, against the great inconveniences that must result to this country from the present very inadequate and continually declining supply of sugar that we derive from our West India colonies. I believe that, if we were to say we would be willing to take sugar from the French colonies, if produced by free labour, the consequence of such a declaration would be — the immediate emancipation of the slaves in those colonies, and that an extensive cultivation of free labour sugar for the British market would directly take place. And I have also a strong belief that such a course of policy would have some effect on the United States, in inducing that country to take steps to abolish slave labour; and that she would no longer allow the freedom she enjoys to be alloyed by the existence of slavery in her own bosom: at all events, I should like to set her the lesson. I thank the House for the attention they have paid to a most uninteresting subject,—rendered still more so by the incompetency of the person who has attempted to bring it under their consideration. I now beg to move, as an amendment, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the question, in order to add the words, "it is expedient, on the earliest opportunity, that all sugars, the produce of free labour, be admitted at the same rate of duty as the sugar of our West Indian colonies," instead thereof.

Mr. PEASE.—I second the motion.

Upon the question being put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question,"—

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said:— My Honourable Friend the Member for Wigan has, I am aware, taken this opportunity of introducing the subject of his motion in the discharge of a public duty, rather than for the purpose of interrupting an annual Bill, which, for the public service, must needs be passed; and though I shall answer my Honourable Friend but shortly, I shall do so — not from any intention of offering the smallest disrespect to him. The suggestions which my Honourable Friend has offered are by no means to be considered so trivial as to be undeserving of much attention. The subject is no doubt important, and involves many more considerations besides those to which my Honourable Friend has referred. If we look at the mere question of supply to our market, the principle undoubtedly is, — let us get as much of every article as we can, and at the cheapest possible rate; but, in applying this principle with reference to the general interests of England, we immediately open the whole question of our colonial policy, — and that is a question which must not be discussed in a mere incidental manner, with respect only to the supply of sugar, without taking into consideration, as well the whole obligations which we are under to our colonies, as the obligations which those colonies are under with respect to us. For one, I am not prepared to admit that the preservation of a great maritime power like this, with extensive colonial possessions, is a matter of so much indifference, that we should act prudently to select any one branch of our colonial commerce, and discuss it, as my Honourable Friend has done, in reference only to the question of supply and demand. It is satisfactory to me to learn that the steps which were taken by Government, last year, for the extension of trade, and the facilitating supply, have met with the approbation of the commercial public. And although those measures — the alteration of the drawback, and the equalisation of the duties on sugar, the produce of the East Indies, with those on sugar which we receive from the West — may not be important as to their immediate effects, yet I do anticipate that, ultimately, much good will result from them. It is also gratifying to me to be enabled to state, that that body who might be considered as prejudiced by those measures, are perfectly assenting parties to them. And if a time should ever come when the supply of sugar from the West Indian colonies shall be found to be insufficient to meet the demand, it would be advantageous as well to the interests of those colonies as to this country, to consider by what means a further supply might be obtained. My Honourable Friend has said that the people of this country look back with regret on the grant of 20,000,000*l.* sterling to the West Indian proprietors. I do not think so. But I believe the people of this country ould be very ready to look back with pentance on that step, if they thought at the planters had failed in the duties rising out of their part of the contract. t present, however, I do not believe that ne people of England repent of having arned that proud distinction, which sepaates them, as regards humanity, from all ne nations of the earth, — even at a cost, ne amount of which, in olden times, ould have more than covered the whole ational debt, and, in modern times, might ave defrayed the charge of an unjust and unfortunate war. My Honourable Friend ays that, by taking the course he recommends, foreign countries would, he hinks, be induced to follow our example n abolishing slavery in their colonies. I hould be glad to hear that such a feeling existed on their parts; but I believe my Noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs would be most agreeably surprised, to hear that any of those foreign states which have slave colonies had really decided upon following our example in emancipating their slaves. But, whatever may be the feeling in those countries on this matter, I believe that the course which has been suggested by my Honourable Friend would have the effect of retarding the accomplishment of his own wishes in this respect. The question which those foreign powers will naturally consider is, whether or not it would be to their interest to abolish slavery in their colonies? We must not bribe them to do so, but leave them to act upon their own free will. With regard to the United States, the great slave question, there, is mixed up with various considerations of much more important local interest than the question of sugar, or any other article of produce. I hope we may yet see the day when the hopes of my Honourable Friend shall be carried out; but I do not wish to see the day when those who are the advocates of humanity would extend their principle so far as to interfere in the internal concerns of other free and independent states, whether they should be those of America, or of any other country.

Mr. CLAY. — I have no intention of prolonging this debate, or of entering into a discussion upon the general question, at this time; but the fact that the sugar refiners of this country — the greater part of whom are my constituents — are deeply interested in this matter, will, I trust, serve me as a sufficient excuse for troubling the House with a very few observations. If I rightly understood the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he rests the question as to the expediency of acceding to my Honourable Friend's motion, on this point, — whether or not the supply from our colonies is sufficient for our consumption? If so, I say it is now that that contingency, on which the Right Honourable Gentleman rests his acceding to this motion, has arrived. The supply is not, at present, sufficient for the consumption of the country; and there is not the smallest surplus for exportation. The home price of sugar, now, free of duty, is considerably higher than it is on the Continent. The proof of this is to be found in the simplest possible form. Under the system in which the drawback is allowed on the exportation of refined sugar, not only is the duty paid on the importation of the raw article returned to the party who exports, but even a sum beyond that duty. Therefore there is an actual bounty offered on the export of sugar. Thus, if the prices of sugar in England and on the Continent be equal, the sugar refiner of England has a very considerable advantage over his continental rival; and will, consequently, export not only the surplus, but that which is actually wanted for the consumption of this country. He can also afford to give such a price to the importer of sugar, as will induce the importer to sell to him rather than to the consumer. I admit that, to a certain degree, this inconvenience was remedied by the measure of last year; but the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer must be aware that the Bill of last year did not take off more than, I believe, one half of the premium which had been previously given on the exportation of sugar. I know this is a question of abstruse calculation, with which I should not, on this occasion, be justified in troubling the House; but I may observe that I have, myself, paid considerable attention to the subject; and I believe I state only that which is the fact, when I say that the existing system gives a bounty on the export of refined sugar of not less than 6*s.* per cwt. At this time, the quantity of sugar imported into this country is not sufficient for the consumption of the people of England, and we are now paying a monopoly price for that article; therefore, I contend that that contingency has arisen, in which the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said that the whole question must receive the attention of the House and the Government, and when it would be necessary to come to some determination upon it. I agree, then, that in obtaining the supply for our market, our own colonies ought to have the preference; and that they might, with propriety, object to our introducing slave-grown sugar in competition with their free labour produce. But I cannot help remarking, on the subject of the produce of slave countries, that it is a most extraordinary thing that, without one word of remonstrance from the opponents of slave-grown produce, we take upwards of 4,000,000 lb. of slave-grown cotton from America every year, as well as an enormous amount of slave-grown tobacco; while the loudest outcry is raised against the introduction of a single hogshead of sugar that has been produced by slave labour. I do not hold that our colonies are entitled to any more protection than this, — that if there be any colony or other country which produces sugar, or any other article, by means of free labour, and we can introduce such produce into our own country with advantage to our consumer and our commerce, we are bound to do so, and to give the country that benefit. For the reasons I have stated,— first, that the supply of sugar has already fallen short of our demand, and, secondly, that the colonies have no right to enjoy a monopoly of our market as against any country producing sugar by free labour,— I shall, if he think proper to divide upon it, support the motion of my Honourable Friend the Member for Wigan.

Mr. C. P. THOMSON. — Considering that this subject is one of very great importance, and that it deserves the most serious attention, I will take the opportunity of saying a very few words upon it. Before, however, I go into the general question, I must observe that my Honourable Friend who spoke last is misinformed, in stating that there is at present a bounty on refined sugar, equivalent to 6*s*. per cwt. The Return on which I proceeded when I introduced my Bill on the subject last year, was taken in such a manner as to insure the most exact result; and care had been taken to prevent anything being given in the shape of bounty. This calculation was also made before there was anything like a short supply of sugar in the market; and we moreover took the prices of sugar in foreign markets, as well as the price of East India sugar; so that the utmost care was taken to prevent a drawback being given in the shape of a bounty. There is one advantage, however, which the West Indians enjoy from having their sugar refined in this country, which can hardly be designated a bounty, — namely, they obtain a higher price for the treacle which is obtained from the sugar, in undergoing the process of refining, than they could get in a foreign country. This is the advantage that they get from having their sugar refined here rather than elsewhere; but there is no bounty paid.

Considerable delusion prevails in this country on the subject of slave-grown produce, as contradistinguished from free-grown produce. I trust that the country will not adopt the notion, that we can separate, in our commerce with foreign nations, free-grown produce from slave produce. I protest against the comparison which has been made by my Honourable Friend respecting the slave-grown cotton from the United States. It is utterly delusive to talk of the consumption of that article in this country, as though we could not get sufficient free-grown cotton from other places. My Honourable Friend says, "How strange it is, that you listen to the outcry against taking slave-grown sugar, while you take slave-grown cotton to the amount of millions annually; and slave-grown tobacco, from which you get 3,000,000*l*. sterling a-year in the shape of duties." For my own part, I most cordially wish that slavery everywhere was at an end. But what is the system of policy which this country has been going upon, in her commercial treaties with almost all foreign countries, for a great number of years past? We have entered into treaties, putting these countries on the footing of the most favoured nations, on certain equivalent advantages being given to our commerce. Supposing we adopted the proposition of the Honourable Member for Wigan,—what would the United States do? They would come forward with the treaty in their hands, and would insist that the produce of that country must be put upon exactly the same footing as the sugar and coffee produced in Siam, Java, or Hayti; or they would say that you did not put them on the footing of the most favoured nations, and therefore you were violating your engagements with them. The Brazils, also, would hold up your treaty in your face, and would say, "Our produce is our produce; and you have no right to inquire whether it is the result of the labour of one man or of another man; but take it you must, or be guilty of a breach of faith according to your treaty." This country has entered into several of these engagements with foreign nations, and Acts of Parliament have been passed concerning them, and placing the produce of those nations upon the footing I have described; and they would one and all say, that by taking such a step as that involved in the proposition of my Honourable Friend, you not only broke faith with them, but you also interfered with the domestic relations of their country.

With reference to the importance of the question, as a general question, I do not for a moment deny it. I admit that it is a matter of very great importance, and is one which will be forced upon the attention of Parliament, and of the country, within a very short period. In the first place, this is a matter which will necessarily force itself upon the attention of the Government, as connected with the treaty with the Brazils. The present treaty is of a temporary character, only, and will expire in 1842; and if we enter into fresh relations with that important state, this subject must necessarily be considered. The exports to that country are upwards of 4,000,000*l.* a-year of British manufactures. This is the most important trade that we carry on with any part of the world, with the exception of the United States of America. The produce of the Brazils is almost entirely confined to sugar and coffee; and when we arrive at the period at which the treaty will be about to expire, this subject must force itself upon the attention of the House. The other branch of the subject is also of deep importance, and deserving of much consideration,—I mean, the short supply of colonial sugar. Up to last year, the produce of our West Indian colonies was considerably more than sufficient for the supply of this country. Practically, therefore, the West Indian colonists enjoyed no monopoly, though apparently and nominally they did so. Since that period there has been a considerable falling off in the produce of our colonies. Again: the growing population of this country requires a larger supply of colonial produce, and there is this deficient supply of the West Indies to meet this demand; therefore, within a short time, it may be necessary to pay an extraordinary price, when that which was formerly only an apparent monopoly will be felt as a real monopoly. But at the present moment, this is actually the case with respect to coffee. The duty on coffee was reduced, nine years ago, by Mr. Huskisson; and at a more recent period, by myself. Coffee is most extensively consumed in this country; and, notwithstanding the low rate of duty, a much higher price is paid for it here than on the Continent. The produce consumed here is almost entirely colonial; and therefore, with the high price, it is obvious that a real monopoly exists. The Government are deeply impressed with this important subject; and it is obvious that great attention must be paid to this point, as well as to the other subjects to which I have adverted. It is important that we should look at this question—that we should regard the different interests that will be involved by blinking the consideration of it even for a time. I am, satisfied, however, that it must be forced on the attention of the Government and the Legislature, if not by the wants of the people of this country, at any rate by the treaty with the Brazils; and I trust that it will be met fairly, and when it shall have become ripe for consideration, that the difficulty will be dealt with in the way that a matter of such importance deserves.

Mr. HUME. — I have heard, with great satisfaction, the statement of the Right Honourable Gentleman. He has admitted the necessity of some alteration in our commercial policy, and has said that it is inevitable. I trust, then, that the consideration of this most important matter will not be unnecessarily postponed. At the present time there are only two thirds of the average supply of colonial produce from the West Indies, and the people of England are called upon to pay the same amount as if they had a full supply. Therefore, to talk of putting off the consideration of the question till 1842 or 1844, when certain treaties will expire, is most absurd. I say, that the people of England, after the very liberal manner in which they have contributed to the affluence of the West Indies, are entitled to all the advantages which might be obtained by an improved system of commercial policy. And of this I am sure,—that no representative of this country would have voted so large a sum as 20,000,000*l.* for compensation to the slave owners, if it had been supposed that the monopoly would still continue. I admit that I cannot draw that distinction which has been proposed to be made by my Honourable Friend the Member for Wigan, between slave produce and free labour produce. I think it would be inexpedient to make such a distinction, in the present state of our commercial relations. It is obvious, however, that the whole subject must be taken up, next year, by her Majesty's Government;—it cannot be longer delayed. I would suggest, then, to my Honourable Friend (Mr. Ewart), that, as it is clear he could gain nothing by going to a division, now, the better course would be to withdraw his motion.

Mr. HODGSON HINDE. — As the representative of a large maritime constituency, I am desirous of making one observation only. If our colonial possessions in the West Indies would yield a supply of sugar sufficient for the demands of this country, I would be unwilling to admit that article from other countries; but my opinion is, that they will not. The remark, however, which I have to make, is, that I am sure that neither my constituents, nor the country at large, would be satisfied with the distinction that is proposed to be drawn between sugar and cotton, the produce of slave labour and of free labour; and I am quite sure, also, that such a distinction never could be practically established.

Mr. THORNELY. — I feel considerable satisfaction at the statements which have been made by the Right Honourable Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, for I have long felt that this was a subject which most especially called for the attention of Parliament; and I believe it will be found absolutely necessary to bring it under consideration in the course of the ensuing Session. The proposition of my Honourable Friend the Member for Wigan is one that I think could not be carried into effect, because, if you were to reduce the duty on foreign articles, the produce of free labour only, you would find that the Brazilian merchant would, under the treaty with Brazil, at once bring his produce, also, into the market at such reduced duty, and you could not possibly prevent it. In my opinion, we ought to reduce the duty upon all those articles which may be called necessaries; and thus we should confer a real benefit on the people of this country. It may be a matter of very little importance to Members of this House, what price they pay for their sugar, coffee, and other similar articles; but we should consider the comforts of the labouring classes; and amongst those whom I represent in a mining district, are many who, in winter, do not see the light of the sun except on Sundays, — and it is of no slight consequence to them that they should be enabled to obtain those little comforts when they have an opportunity of enjoying them, and that they should not be placed beyond their reach by heavy duties. It is remarkable how the price of foreign productions is increased on their way from the producer to the consumer, and how that increase of price is mystified. If we go to Java or to Hayti, we can buy good coffee at from 9*d.* to 4*d.* per pound; while here, at Charing Cross, we are charged 1*s.* 10*d.* for the same article. To be sure, there is 6*d.* per pound duty on coffee grown in our own possessions, while coffee brought from foreign possessions is not admitted at all, — there is an entire prohibition put on it by the Government. This is a question in which I feel very great interest; for I believe that there is no measure which would be attended with more benefit to the country than a reduction of these duties generally, in order that the price of those articles of foreign produce which are necessary to the comfort, and, I may add, to the health of the poorer classes, may be so reduced as to bring them within their reach. Indeed, I feel that this is a subject of so much importance, that it ought to supersede all others. I cannot perceive that the distinction can be carried out, which has been attempted to be drawn between free labour and slave labour produce; therefore I cannot acquiesce in the motion of my Honourable Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Ewart). Slave labour cannot, in my opinion, continue much longer; — the moral feeling of the time is against it. The Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer says, "I cannot look forward to the abolition of slavery in the United States." But I must tell the Right Honourable Gentleman that I do look forward to it, and am very strongly impressed with the opinion that my hopes in this respect will be accomplished; for I know that there is a very strong and increasing party rising up in that country in favour of abolition, and who are now attempting and doing much in carrying out their views; and I may allude to a distinguished writer of that country, whom I am proud to call my friend, — I allude to Dr. Channing, — who is interesting himself warmly in favour of that great object.

Mr. MARK PHILIPS. — Although I may have expressed a different opinion at one time, I am not ashamed to state that, on further consideration, I am convinced that the distinction which is proposed to be drawn between slave labour produce and free labour produce cannot be taken. I feel clearly the accuracy of the views of the Right Honourable the President of the Board of Trade on this subject; and if I refer to a point on which he has dilated, it is only to observe that, with respect to the importance of the trade of this country with the Brazils, there is among my constituents, but one opinion. I did hope that I should, ere this, have been intrusted with a petition to present to the House from the Chamber of Commerce at Manchester, which has been agreed to at a recent meeting, and is signed by the president and other influential members of that board, — and among them, by some who have, at all times, been the strenuous advocates for the abolition of slavery in our own colonies, — praying that the attention of the House and the Government may be directed to the importance of our trade with the Brasils. If, on the expiration of the Brazilian treaty, by which we are now placed on the footing of the most favoured nations in our commercial dealings with that country, the Government of the Brazils were to say, "You refuse to take our produce in return for your manufactures; therefore we will no longer grant you those commercial advantages which you have hitherto enjoyed as regards this country," — we should lose, perhaps, the most valuable branch of our trade. This is a subject which ought to be taken into consideration with a due regard to the magnitude and the importance of the interests involved, both with respect to our trade with foreign countries, and the consumers of foreign produce among the population of this country; and I trust that another Session will not be allowed to pass over without the attention of the House being specially directed to it.

Mr. EWART. — I will, with the leave of the House, withdraw my motion.

EDUCATION (NATIONAL).

LORD BROUGHAM. — I beg to postpone my motion relative to education from Thursday to Friday next.

The ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY. — I rise to submit a motion, to which I do not anticipate any objection, as it is for the production of documents, copies of which have been already laid before the other House of Parliament. I will therefore move an Address to her Majesty, praying that she will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House —

Copy of Treasury minutes, dated the 30th of August, 1833, the 7th of March, 1834, and the 5th of July, 1838, relating to the application of sums granted by Parliament for the purpose of public education: And, also,

Copy of Order in Council appointing a Committee of Council to superintend the application of any sums voted by Parliament for the purpose of promoting public education; and copies of any minutes of, and of any Report from, such committee.

I now beg to give notice, that, on Friday next, I shall submit a motion on the subject to which those documents relate.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I wish it to be understood that my motion is entirely different from any which can be founded on the Orders in Council. In fact, it has nothing to do with either of the plans of education now so generally spoken of; and therefore, in order that I may not interfere with the Most Reverend Prelate, I will further postpone my motion from Friday to Monday next, — hoping, on that day, to have the support of the Most Reverend Prelate.

JAMAICA BILL.

The Order of the Day for the second reading of this Bill, and the Lords to be summoned, having been read, —

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY said: — In the short time during which I have had the honour of holding office of Colonial Secretary, I have, on more than one occasion, felt, and frankly admitted, the disadvantages under which I labour, from the circumstance of my long absence from the business of this House, in the discharge of duties elsewhere. I regret this the more, as I have lost, in consequence, much valuable information, which could be gained only by listening to your Lordships' discussions. But though this remark will apply generally, I have, on the question now before the House, the advantage of much knowledge, derived from a residence of some time in Jamaica; and, from the same source, some considerable acquaintance with the negro character. With the experience thus derived, I can with more confidence press on your Lordships the adoption of the measure now before you. I am the more strengthened in my conviction of the necessity of this course, by accounts which I have this morning received from Jamaica, describing the gratitude with which the announcement of the same measure was received by the popular party in that island. The great mass of the population hailed it as a boon which would give due protection to the negro population; and I can assure your Lordships, that if you were to refuse to pass this Bill, it would create an impression in the minds of the negroes that the protection of Parliament had been withdrawn from them. I repeat to your Lordships, that I much fear that the rejection of this Bill would be so interpreted by the negro population. I feel it the more imperatively my duty to impress this consideration on the House, from the fact that very false views have been promulgated of this question. From my own observation, I can state that no friendly feeling exists between the negro population and the House of Assembly. A friendly feeling can be brought about only by the conduct of the Assembly itself; and I must say that that body has not shown much disposition to produce it since the passing of the Emancipation Act. Many of your Lordships have had the advantage of hearing the agent of the House of Assembly (Mr. Burge), and of the great talent and experience which he has evinced at your bar, on this important question; but I regret that much of your Lordship's time was consumed in hearing matters altogether irrelevant to the case. Great stress was laid on the collisions which have from time to time taken place between Governors of Jamaica and the House of Assembly, in respect of what the Assembly has declared to be an interference with its rights. These, however, are but the conflicts of local authorities, and bear no comparison with the collision between the House of Assembly and the British Parliament. Is the British Parliament to be called upon to submit, and to make reparation to the House of Assembly? Are your Lordships to say, "You are right, and we are wrong; we acknowledge our error, and we hope you will resume your duty?" The learned gentleman was also pleased to state that this measure must have originated in a general desire for change. I sincerely hope that everything in Jamaica will be changed; for if things remain as they are, that island will not be what it is the wish of the British Parliament and of the British people it should be. I consider that the change proposed to be made is the safest, the best, and the most praiseworthy of all the changes that have been effected in this age of progressive amelioration. Your Lordships were told of the necessity of "protecting established institutions;" but, let me ask, was not slavery itself an established institution of the island? The learned gentleman proceeded — as, perhaps, it was not very unnatural that he should do — to throw a very considerable portion of the blame on her Majesty's Government, and on the course which they have pursued, both recently, and before I had the honour of filling my present position. But the learned gentleman passed lightly over another culprit, — he evaded the share which another culprit had in this transaction. It is in the presence of that culprit that I now stand. Your Lordships are, above all, answerable for the state of things which has been produced in Jamaica. It is said that, in this instance, your Lordships originated the measure which has produced the resistance (so much to be regretted) on the part of the House of Assembly; and therefore it is to you that the learned gentleman must address himself, when he requires that there be a retractation of the offensive measure with regard to Jamaica, and the promise that the same course shall not be pursued again. Unless he does this, he does not follow out the feelings and wishes of his constituents. Your Lordships cannot evade the responsibility thrown on you, by pleading any habitual custom in which you indulge, of passing, without any examination, measures which originate with her Majesty's Government. That measure passed without much discussion, it is true; but it was a measure which was necessary for the state of things which then existed. The real question at issue is, was the united Parliament right, or not, in passing the Prisons Bill? and if right, do the state of things, and the attitude assumed by the Jamaica House of Assembly, call on Parliament to interfere? I am of opinion that such a measure as the Prisons Bill was necessary during the progress of the transition of the negroes from a state of slavery to a state of freedom: it is an opinion which I formed when I was at Jamaica, and which I communicated to the Government when I returned. Words have been used on this question, which are strangely misapplied. Is it not an absurdity for a body to talk of "popular rights," which neither represents the property nor the population of the island? Is it not an equal absurdity to talk of "the benefits of free government," when the representation is in the hands of those, who not only have no share in the interests which are divided amongst the great mass of the population, but who always have acted on antagonist principles to them? Such is my opinion of the incompatibility of carrying out the mighty change in the state of society in Jamaica—which has taken place, but which, I regret to say, is still to be worked out, without some such measure as the present,—that I do trust that your Lordships will assent to this Bill, which provides that if the House of Assembly do not return to its duty, a council shall have the power of providing for objects of immediate interest, and of establishing that machinery by which the relations of master and servant will be placed on grounds which the servants will be able to look to with confidence, and by which the masters cannot sustain any injury. Making every allowance for the statements of an advocate, who naturally is disposed, when addressing an assembly not very well acquainted with the nature of the measure on which he is speaking, to make the best of his own case, I was really surprised to hear the learned gentleman who appeared before your Lordships state that the House of Assembly had been always ready, from the year 1832, to address itself to the improvement of the prisons. I had some experience myself, in 1833, of what was the discipline in the workhouse and gaol of Kingston; and I can state that there were abuses there of the most horrible description, with regard to confining, without distinction, felons and slaves in custody for the debts of their masters. But from one end of the island to the other, the abuses which then existed were such as I could not observe without horror, and without communicating to many individuals of influence, members of the Assembly, what I thought of them, who all admitted the evil, and promised to administer a remedy. But this has always been the case in the Island of Jamaica: the members of the House of Assembly will individually express opinions which may sound reasonable enough; but when they are met together, they completely disregard them. I hold in my hand an extract from a despatch dated the 16th of September, 1832, which states that the House of Assembly refused to apply themselves to remedy the grievances of the slaves till their own grievances were remedied; and they refused to pass a Bill which was intended to amend the very defective management of their gaols. Such was the state of the gaols and workhouses in the Island of Jamaica in 1832 and 1833; and I again pressed on individuals who, I thought, influenced the opinions of the House of Assembly, the necessity of mitigating some of those evils.

On the 12th of April, 1835, the Governor reported the cases of two female apprentices who had been flogged in the Kingston workhouse; and on the 7th July, 1835, that the Gaol Act of 1834 authorises the common council, or five magistrates in session, to pass rules, saying "they have passed rules authorising the supervisors of workhouses to inflict corporal punishment on all persons, not even excluding females; they have also adopted the custom of cutting off the hair of all females who are sent into the houses of correction for confinement or punishment. They have in some instances put untried people to hard labour, and cut off their hair."

On the 29th of August, 1835, Lord Glenelg, in reply, adverted to the indecorum and injustice of scourging or cutting the hair off women for any imputed or real misconduct. The Governor was instructed to apply to the Assembly to amend the Act; and it was stated, that if such practices should be continued under the sanction of any colonial enactment, the Government would feel it their duty to apply to Parliament. On the 17th of November, 1835, the Marquess of Sligo, in obedience to these instructions, sent a message to the Assembly, suggesting important amendments in the Gaol Act, and calling especial attention to the fact that women were flogged on the treadmill. This message was referred to a special committee, but no amended Bill was passed. On the 5th of March, 1836, the Governor reported the result of inquiry into transactions at the St. Andrew's workhouse; and said, "It proves that I have not lightly made the charge of the corporal punishment of females being still, in spite of all my efforts, administered in the different workhouses of this island." I had an opportunity, myself, of observing the disgraceful extent to which corporal punishment was carried. Accompanied by two of my suite, I went, unexpectedly, to examine into the system pursued; and the punishment that I saw inflicted upon women was of such a nature, that the officers who were with me, some days afterwards, declared that they had never witnessed anything to equal it, even under sentence of court-martial. I made application to the directors of the workhouse, upon the subject of the officer who superintended this punishment; but I soon found that it would be impossible to procure his discharge. He was reprimanded, but, for anything I know to the contrary, he is still in the same situation which he then filled. On the 30th of March, 1836, the Governor referred to the conviction of the supervisor of Trelawney, for flogging Jane Reid; and added, "that the punishing women who would not work at the treadmill, by the cat, had become so general, that, in his opinion, an example should be made." On the 9th of April, 1836, the Governor reported the evidence on the inquest of Louise Beveridge, who died at the treadmill at Morant Bay, after having been tied upon the treadmill with four other females, — the verdict being, "Apoplexy, occasioned by — excitement!" On the 11th of June, 1836, Lord Glenelg observed that it appeared, from this evidence, that in the Morant Bay workhouse, "the women who refused to work at the treadmill were fastened to it by ligatures round the arms, for twenty-four successive hours, in such a manner as to endanger the lives of all, and actually to occasion the death of one:" and in reference to the same workhouse, on the 31st of August, 1836, his Lordship observed, that it appeared "that, out of eleven deaths in that workhouse, on which inquests had been held since January, 1835, three were confessedly owing to injuries received on the treadmill, and eight were ascribed to the visitation of God; under which general description it was obvious that many cases may have been included, in which the death of the prisoner was not unconnected with the treatment which she had previously undergone." Repeated acts of cruelty subsequently appeared; and, on the 1st of August, 1836, the Marquess of Sligo, in reference to his instructions from home to endeavour to procure a remedy for the deficiencies in the law for preventing cruelties in workhouses, stated, "I again say, advisedly, the remedy must come from home." On the 22d of February, 1837, the House of Assembly was solicited by message to take the subject into consideration. This message was referred to a special committee, who reported to the effect that the existing laws were sufficient to prevent abuses; and nothing was done. On the 1st of July, 1837, Lord Glenelg said, —

I have already had occasion to advert more than once to the abuses alleged to exist in these places (gaols and workhouses), and I have intimated an opinion that unless some remedy should be applied to them, it might be necessary for the stipendiary magistrates to abstain from committing apprentices to the workhouses.

Occasion arose to reiterate these instructions on the 14th of October, 1837; and, on the 1st of August, Lord Glenelg sent out the Report of the Select Committee on the Working of the Apprenticeship System, appointed in May, 1837, in which it was commanded that there should be instituted, without delay, a strict and searching examination into the state of the workhouses in the West India colonies, and especially into the construction and use of treadmills, &c. On the 27th of October, 1837, a despatch from the Secretary of State (dated May 21. 1837) was laid before the Assembly, reviewing at length the provisions of the Gaol Act of 1834, and urging various alterations and amendments. This message was referred, as before, to a special committee, and no further proceedings were taken. On the 13th of February, 1831, Lord Glenelg, in his despatch, said, —

I apprised you that it was my intention to address you in a separate despatch on the subject of the requisite measures for the immediate prevention of abuses of a flagrant character in the houses of correction. It would be a great satisfaction to me to learn that a law of this nature were passed by the colonial Legislature; but should this not be the case, there is no subject which, in my opinion, more imperatively demands the interference of the Imperial Legislature.

On the 21st of February, 1838, the Assembly was again solicited by message to entertain the question of prison discipline, and a further despatch was laid before it, with exactly the same result as before, — reference to a committee, without further proceedings; and, finally, in the month of June, 1838, the Assembly met, but did nothing as regards the question of prison discipline. I allude to these cases only, because your Lordships were told by the agent for Jamaica, that the Assembly, up to 1832, had always shown a disposition to reform abuses. I have now brought the question to the state in which it was at the meeting of the House of Assembly; and to show the temper of that house, I will refer only to the protest in which they advert to an Act which was universally thought to be necessary, — the Act in Aid, — a measure which is not now denied by any party in this country to be a proper and fair interference of the British Parliament to carry out the measure of emancipation. They say, expressly, —

It is unreasonable and unnatural that one nation should assume to pass laws to bind another nation, of whose customs, wants, constitution, and physical advantages and disadvantages, she is and must be profoundly ignorant; and whose distance opposes an insurmountable barrier to the attainment of local information.

And then they go on to assert that, —

When lawgivers consent to sit in judgment on an Assembly in no respect their inferiors, except in extent and magnitude of power, — when they condemn and presume to punish upon charges kept secret from the accused, — they cannot be expected to listen to a defence which would convict them either of imbecility and cowardice if they were urged to the injustice by popular clamour, or of fraud and malice, and a thirst for omnipotent authority, if the injustice were the result of deliberation and design.

Not content with this, they proceed to contend for their own uncontrolled powers. They say, —

We will also acknowledge that they can seize by force on the powers which they do not possess in law or reason. There cannot be two Legislatures in one state. If the British Parliament is to make laws for Jamaica, it must exercise that prerogative without a partner.

Those are the decorous terms in which the House of Assembly addresses the two branches of the Imperial Legislature. So that the Assembly absolutely places itself on a level with your Lordships and the other House of Parliament, and declares that if the Imperial Legislature presumes to interfere on any one point, they will abstain from the due exercise of their duty! Your Lordships' House does not escape: —

The taxation of the colony may perhaps be delegated to the House of Lords, into which was first introduced the infamous Bill for our destruction; and, for the first time for many ages, their Lordships in that Bill were permitted to exercise the privilege of laying on British subjects grievous pecuniary penalties. The power of taxing Jamaica may console their Lordships for its deprivation elsewhere.

Such was the language of the House of Assembly, previous to the last offence said to be offered it by the passing of the Prisons Bill; and this was what the counsel at the bar had to offer as a proof of the wish of the members to conciliate this country. With reference to the particular question to be this night decided, I am anxious to show your Lordships that doing nothing would not be effectual. I have not heard that any one of your Lordships intends to move the repeal of the Prisons Bill; and out of the mouths of the Assembly itself it is clearly demonstrated that no debasement short of the repeal of that Act would induce it to resume its functions. The Assembly states, in its first resolution, that the Act of the British Parliament "is a violation of our inherent rights as British subjects;" and, further, "that the same has not, and ought not, to have the force of law in this island." Thus they not only decide that this Act is a violation of their constitution, but they aver that an Act of Parliament passed by your Lordships and by the other branch of the Legislature is not law, and ought not to have the force of law, in the island. They distinctly declare, also, that till her Majesty's gracious pleasure be known, — until they shall be informed "whether they are henceforth to be treated as subjects having the power of making laws, as hitherto, for their own government, or whether they are to be treated as a conquered colony, and governed by parliamentary legislation,—they will not proceed with their duties." And here I may observe, that though both the learned counsel dwelt upon the conciliatory tone that should have pervaded the despatches, yet anything less conciliatory than the language made use of by the House of Assembly I am at a loss to conceive; because, the greater portion of their address is re-assertion, in other words, — perhaps not to the same offensive extent in point of phrase, — of what the House of Assembly before asserted, — that, unless your Lordships are prepared to go to the extent of repealing the Prisons Act, nothing will satisfy them. I think, therefore, that your Lordships are bound to provide not only for those wants of the public service which this abrupt termination of their duties on the part of the House of Assembly has produced, but also to provide the materials for legislation in case of their refusal to legislate upon some of those points, which, unless they be listened to at present, may be remembered only, when the time may be too late to establish those habits of industry on the part of the negro population, which are necessary for the permanent wellbeing of the colony, and the good understanding of the population.

With regard to contracts, it was admitted at the bar of your Lordships' House that the present contract law was not such as the present negro population received with confidence, and that they did not act on it. It was stated that they were advised by certain parties not to sign the contracts; and why were they so advised? Because the present contract law is not considered (and, in this instance, I must say that certain parties are right in judging for those who have not sufficient power to judge for themselves) such as establishes an equal jurisdiction between the two parties. Allusion has been made to the influence of the Baptist missionaries over the negroes; and, on that subject, I must say that I was in the colonies at a very critical period with reference to the relations between the negroes and missionaries, — namely, the year after the rebellion, in which the most unjustifiable share of the mischief was attributed to the efforts of those missionaries, when not a single chapel belonging to them remained standing in the island. But their influence over the negroes is founded upon this, — that they are the persons who prepared them for that great boon of emancipation which afterwards arrived for them; and I may add, that every thing I have heard, since, shows that their influence has been exercised beneficially. But I hope that when there is established some proper tribunal for regulating the contracts between masters and servants, they will feel it is no part of their duty to interfere as to the value of remuneration for negro labour, and that they will exercise their influence beneficially in some other way. At the same time, when I hear so much against the Baptist missionaries, I cannot but recollect, that but a short time since no such distinction was drawn; for one of the most difficult acts of my Government was to arrange a dispute which arose in consequence of a Wesleyan missionary being assaulted by a member of the House of Assembly; so that it cannot be said that "all missionaries, except Baptists," are received with favour by the representatives. I trust that such cases do not occur, now, but that better feelings have grown up. In the course of the arguments that were stated, at the bar, on the subject of the contract laws, a declaration was made by the counsel on behalf of the Assembly of Jamaica, which I trust will go forth to the people of this country, that they may know what they should guard against. Your Lordships were told, indeed, that the House of Assembly proposed no measure for the payment of the stipendiary magistrates; but I hope that the people of this country will feel themselves pledged to see those contracts carried into effect. Now, the obvious object for our attainment must be, to protect the negro, who has not yet experience or knowledge sufficient to take care of himself; and if, with this declaration before your Lordships, you were to reject this Bill, you would do it with the foreknowledge that there was no chance of protection for the negro, if it were left exclusively to the House of Assembly. With respect to the contract laws, there are, no doubt, several clauses that are highly objectionable; but it is not necessary to go into them, as the House of Assembly has admitted that a new contract law is required; or I could have pointed out the reasons why the negro should be unwilling to bind himself by a permanent contract. Then we were told that the vagrancy laws, which authorised the whipping of females, were repealed; but the chief justice of the island has informed me that they are not; and even supposing his opinion to be wrong, we have no means, here, of correcting it; so that, unless your Lordships interpose some other remedy, the Vagrancy Act of Car. II. must be considered practically in force. With respect, too, to waste lands, any man who knows the situation of Jamaica, must be aware that the provisions of this Bill are most unobjectionable and necessary. But, then, your Lordships are asked, "Why should you press these on the House of Assembly? for they are laws for the planters." That, however, I cannot admit; for, as far as these laws will amend the habits of the negro, they are laws for the negro as well as for the planter; and, if equitably enforced, will be for the permanent benefit of the negro as well as for the temporary advantage of the planter. And then we are asked, much to my surprise, "What are you about? Take care what you are doing; for the law you are passing is for the planter, and will deprive the negro of his newly acquired franchise." Are your Lordships aware that, under the present state of the law, for a negro who has a freehold of sufficient value to entitle him to a vote, — of which class, indeed, there are very few, — it is utterly impossible to exercise it under fifteen months.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — Fifteen months from the 1st of August last.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — But they must be registered; and the number of persons either registered, or in a situation for registration, might be counted easily within the walls of this House. A considerable portion, too, of direct interference with the rights of the negro came from the House of Assembly; for in 1837, they passed an act raising the franchise to 30*l.* a-year; and last year, another Act, with a further rise, was passed. And yet this is one of the reasons urged in the memorial against any interference with the Jamaica House of Assembly! Then, with reference to the second clause of the Bill, I hold that it is not necessary, in order that your Lordships may adopt that clause enabling the Governor and Council — not the Governor alone — to revive the expired laws of the island, for me to prove — indeed, I have not the means of doing this — that all those expired laws are requisite; but amongst them are many, independent of financial arrangements, which must be revived, and I think your Lordships will say, that in this crisis the Governor ought not to be left without the power of doing so. Again, as to the militia laws, Sir Lionel Smith has stated, and I believe truly, that it has been the earnest endeavour of the missionaries to impress on the minds of the black population the great necessity of preserving tranquillity; and that in that respect they have stood in the place of police; but, surely, that is not the security in which your Lordships would wish to place the peace of the country. Amongst the laws necessary to be revised are the police laws, giving additional pay to the officers, the Rules and Articles of War, and the Insolvent Debtors Act. It has been said that if there were no Insolvent Debtors Act, no person would be put in gaol; but in answer to that I beg to state, that I have this day received accounts, showing that the prisons of Jamaica are crowded with persons who would have been discharged if the Insolvent Debtors Act had been enforced. But again, to return to the impression that this law is to oppress the negro, and will be useful to the planter, I have heard, to-day, from Jamaica, the manner in which the former Act was received; and as the negroes appear from that to have a great expectation of protection from some official source, I hope that your Lordships will take care to qualify the disappointment of this night's proceedings, — for disappointment it must in some respects be, — by assuring them, that if the Legislature is once again to be tried, and shall refuse to do what is necessary to protect them, your Lordships will, in that case, provide a remedy for them. It has been said that the interest of the Negro was never considered by the authors of the former measure; but I think the manner in which it was received is an answer to such an imputation. I have had peculiar opportunities of judging of the impressions likely to be made upon the Negro mind. After the Act of 1833 passed, I spent some weeks in travelling into every corner of the island, explaining to the negroes the object of the Act, and impressing upon their minds how much to their future interest it would be, to receive it properly; and I had the happiness of succeeding in so convincing them of the object which the Act had in view. I have always heard, since, that the negroes never worked more effectually, or showed themselves more fitted for the great boon, than in the interval between the passing and the operation of the law. Now, your Lordships have heard a great deal of all Jamaica interests being so opposed to the present Act. No doubt, many public meetings have been held on the subject, and many persons of great respectability in Jamaica are opposed to the Bill; but, on the contrary, many Jamaica proprietors of great weight, who are resident in the island, have, of late years, declined to act in the House of Assembly, and have been advised by their attorneys not to belong to it. At the same time, I had the pleasure of appointing two of the most influential members of that much despised council. But my Noble Friend (the Marquess of Sligo) who has been Governor of Jamaica, and whose conduct towards the negroes on his estates in the island I have observed, as resembling the treatment of an English landlord, has expressed himself in favour of this Act. My Noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Harewood), who has much in this country to occupy his time and attention, will, I think, find that he has been deceived on this subject; and I must say that it is not by confining exclusively to the House of Assembly, legislation in the present emergency, that the permanent interests of the negroes will be best provided for. I trust that this subject will be approached, on this occasion, without any spirit of party, — although I cannot say that such has been the case in former attempts to provide for the contingencies that have arisen. Remember that you are approaching hallowed ground! You must not trample on national humanity; great and enduring interests are at stake; recollect, well, the question you have now to decide. You called upon the House of Commons to interpose in the cause of humanity; and the House of Commons now calls upon you, with the same object. The British Parliament enacted emancipation, and it remains for the British Parliament and the British people to see that it be carried out. But our labour will be useless if we sacrifice, I will not say the cost, but the great benefits to be derived from what I may affirm to have been one of the noble acts of the British Legislature.

The EARL of HAREWOOD.—In now offering a few observations to your Lordships, I must commence by stating that I extremely regret that, in the critical and delicate position of Jamaica, the Noble Marquess, while having the power of office in his hands, should have appeared in your Lordships' House, not so much to speak on the material question of the Imperial Parliament acting over the heads of the Assembly, as to speak and act, hostilely, against the House of Assembly and the institutions of Jamaica; and that he should have opened his speech with an avowal, which, I think, was very ill timed, of having received his information from the popular party. If the Noble Marquess says there is any person connected with the West Indies who denies the power of Parliament to legislate in certain circumstances, he is completely mistaken; for there is no such denial either on the part of any person, or the House of Assembly. On the contrary, all have admitted it; and therefore, to say it is one of the sentiments of the House of Assembly, is incorrect. I will, however, state, that the discretion of Parliament must be very great in exercising that power, and that your Lordships are to consider Jamaica as an independent Legislature, with a constitution of its own; and, unless you show that a great emergency has arisen on the point on which you intend to legislate, you are not justified, even as the Imperial Parliament, in interfering. Now, the point in the present instance, is the Prisons Act; but that is not all, for that Act occasioned the present crisis, on which this dispute broke out, though a variety of circumstances previous to that had caused an irritation and excitement in the colony, — such, for example, as withholding from the inhabitants every description of information; and, even on the Prisons Bill itself, when it was brought in by the Colonial Office, not a single word was uttered as to the effect of that Bill on the constitution of Jamaica. It was brought in, too, at a time of year when only a few Members of either House of Parliament were in town; passed through both Houses without any information on the subject having reached the colony from their agent, — it having gone through two stages in the House of Commons before he was aware of it; and the first time it was heard of in Jamaica was its being stuck up on the doors of the House of Assembly. That, surely, was not the way to treat any body of persons. The Legislative Assembly of Jamaica did not deserve such treatment. The Noble Marquess has said that, in 1832, a representation was made to the House of Assembly concerning the state of the prisons; but he omitted to say that, on that subject, in 1834, the House of Assembly received the commendation of the then Governor of the colony for having taken it into consideration, and also that the present Prisons Bill contains many of the same provisions as that of the Assembly. Captain Pringle was then sent out to make inquiry; and the House of Assembly stated that, so soon as Captain Pringle should have made his report, they intended to take up the subject; and, indeed, they had so far taken it up as to have twelve clauses prepared to be proceeded with in the next session. But, before that time, Captain Pringle made his report here, and the Prisons Bill was passed, and sent out. With regard to the question of the legislative power, I would put it to your Lordships to consider what will be the operation of the measure upon society in Jamaica, seeing that its effect, and still more its intention, is, indirectly, to supersede the House of Assembly of the island. If the Government mean to do so, let them say so; but let it not be put into the power of the Governor to say that the House of Assembly shall be called upon to do certain Acts, — and that, if they do not do those Acts, then his own legislative power shall be brought into play. I have no doubt — I have not the slightest doubt on earth — that the intention of Government is to do away with the House of Assembly. If it be not, I should like to hear the fact answered, the other way. As to legislation for the colony, I maintain that the Imperial Parliament had the right to interfere, especially on the subject of the abolition of slavery. That was a great national question; it concerned great national interests. The Imperial Parliament might have interfered, with propriety, on most points connected with the Emancipation Act; yet they referred it to the House of Assembly of Jamaica to pass measures relating to two most important points connected with that Act.

As to the Noble Marquess's observations respecting the popular party in Jamaica, I believe that I am a friend of the popular party, and substantially so; and I do not want to take from them the rights to which they have lately succeeded. The shortest way for the Government would be, to do away with the House of Assembly at once, if that be their indirect object. At all events, of this I am quite sure, — that, looking to the present state of the Island of Jamaica, it is the duty of Government to proceed with the utmost caution and circumspection. I do not complain, therefore, of any measures of a cautionary character which the Government may have thought proper to put in execution; but what I do complain of is, that the reports which have been made of the state of the island are all on one side; they are not taken with due care; nor are all that have been received communicated to your Lordships. I fear that all the reports of the stipendiary magistrates are not laid on the table of the House. With regard to the Acts enumerated in the second clause of the Bill, the Noble Marquess appears to admit that they are of no importance, with the exception of those concerning the police: but it ought to be observed, that, if your Lordships mean to conciliate the people of Jamaica, it will be necessary, out of those seventeen Acts, to exempt from the operation of this law seven, — for seven only are Money Bills, strictly speaking, the others not being so: — but these are Money Bills; and if it be your Lordships' object to declare yourselves anything short of hostile to the constitution of Jamaica, you will think it necessary to exempt from this clause, on the ground that they are Money Bills. For myself, however, I must say, I object wholly to the measure. I do not think that your Lordships were justified in carrying the Prisons Act in the way in which it was carried. Still, if that measure were carried in haste, I am not for begging pardon of the House of Assembly of Jamaica. Not I. But I think that the Imperial Parliament may possibly have legislated hastily on that occasion; and that, nevertheless, the hand of conciliation may possibly yet be held out, — and that, not in any mean or unworthy manner, — for I am persuaded it requires only the commonest assurances to effect the end desired. This is the state of the case. In consequence of the passing of the Prisons Act, the House of Assembly says, "We cannot go on." What happens? The House of Assemby is prorogued, and it is kept prorogued: from the 3d of February to the present hour, they have remained under prorogation. Not one word in explanation has been allowed them. But I am sure that a common softening down as to the Prisons Act would have done all that was required. But I say that the House of Assembly have not had an opportunity given them for explanation. Sure I am that, if one word of conciliation were offered to them, instead of hostility, they would come to work again as willingly as ever. There is another view of the subject which appears not undeserving of your Lordships' consideration. On the first division of the two which were taken on this Bill, there was a very large minority in the House of Commons, who voted against annihilating the power of the House of Assembly. On the second division, the majority in favour of the Bill was only ten, — clearly showing that it was not very acceptable to the House of Commons. But, without referring further to that point, I will merely add, that, having mixed myself up with the West Indian proprietors elsewhere, I feel bound to call upon the House to give a decision one way or the other upon this important question; and, as the Money Bills are not omitted from the second clause, I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time this day three months.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.—In speaking of the popular party in Jamaica, and the intelligence I have received from them, I only meant to refer to intelligence received through the ordinary channels of information.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I will not deny that I entertain great objection to the principle of legislation involved in this Bill. I profess to be against the Prisons Bill. I think it most improper to interfere with the Money Acts of the Assembly. But although I have great doubts as to the principle of this measure, yet I am not prepared to say that nothing should be done in the matter; and I, for one, shall vote for the second reading. As to the Bill itself, I object to the principle of it, as I object to the principle of all such Bills, whether they be Island Bills or Canadian Bills. My Noble Friend is only against the suspension of an island constitution, not of a Canadian constitution. If he were a Canadian, he would have felt, on the late occasion, with me; but, as he is a Jamaica man, my Noble Friend is opposed to this Bill. On the whole, I think it would be better to take the discussion to-morrow; particularly as I, for one, when I came down to the House this evening, thought it was already so arranged. As your Lordships are obliged to do something, you may as well do it in the committee, where it can be done with the least waste of time.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON.—I cannot allow this question to go to a vote without troubling your Lordships with a few words upon it. I understand that I have been subject to some animadversion at having opposed the Negro Emancipation Bill. I certainly did endeavour to prevail upon your Lordships not to pass that Bill. In fact, I divided the House against it. But, from the day that that measure was passed into a law, to the present, I beg to observe, that, Parliament having thought proper so to pass it, I have agreed to every other proceeding which has been proposed by the Government in order to carry negro emancipation into execution. I have assented to all these measures, though, I confess, with great pain, always protesting against them, and considering them invasions of the constitution of Jamaica. But, considering that the planters of that island had received compensation for emancipating their negroes, and that measures for carrying into execution that provision had been instituted, I was of opinion that your Lordships ought to carry the further Acts necessary for completing the Emancipation Act into execution. I therefore have agreed to all those measures, at the same time that I protested against them; and invariably called upon your Lordships to endeavour to settle the affairs of Jamaica with the concurrence of the House of Assembly and the authorities of the island, rather than to take the affair upon yourselves. But I have no recollection of the measure which has been the cause of the existing disagreement between the Governor and the House of Assembly of Jamaica. I certainly do attend very constantly to the proceedings of your Lordships' House, and to the measures which come under consideration; and more especially, last year, I gave great attention to the measures relating to the West Indies; but I have not the smallest recollection of the Prisons Bill. Probably, indeed, I was out of town at the time; for if I had been in my place, most probably I should have opposed the Bill. But the measure was carried into execution, having passed Parliament; and it appears to me that it was communicated in a very extraordinary, a very unusual, and a not very decorous manner, to the House of Assembly of Jamaica. But, however all that might be, I cannot think that the House of Assembly was justified in coming to the resolution that it would not perform its duty, and that it would suspend its functions. Under these circumstances, I confess that, notwithstanding the speech of my Noble Friend behind me (the Earl of Harewood), I shall vote for the second reading of the Bill,—though I certainly do so very unwillingly. I confess that what has occasioned me the greatest doubt on the subject, has been the speech of the Noble Marquess on moving the second reading of the Bill. I never heard a speech from a Minister of the Crown, coming down to Parliament to expound the principles of a measure for imposing restrictions upon the constitutional rights of the population of a portion of the British empire, which was so little calculated to conciliate the hearers of it, and so little calculated to conciliate the public; and I repeat, therefore, most solemnly, that the greatest doubt which I feel as to the propriety of giving the Bill a second reading, is created by some of the topics which entered into the speech of the Noble Marquess. The Noble Marquess, almost in so many words, declares his object to be the destruction of the Legislature of Jamaica; and he yet enter-ains an opinion that the most effectual way of protecting the negroes is the destruction of the House of Assembly. But t should be remembered, that, if it had been possible to do so, those who brought orward emancipation would have brought t forward by means of the House of Assembly of Jamaica. They regretted they could not do this; though, to the very ast moment, they were desirous of it. It s perfectly true that Parliament refused, ast year, to put an end to slavery on the 1st of August, 1838. That part of the measure was, however, enacted by the House of Assembly of Jamaica, because Parliament had positively refused to adopt it; and yet the Noble Marquess comes down and tells your Lordships, notwithstanding, that, as he believes, the very last act of the Jamaica Legislature was to pass this enactment for emancipating all negroes in the island on the 1st of August, 1838; that the Jamaica House of Assembly cannot be trusted to carry into execution the new regulations which become requisite under the new relations of society established in that island; and that the functions of the House ought to be put an end to. Still, the very last measure which they passed, was the law emancipating their negroes two years sooner than the period settled by Parliament. I say, therefore, that, under these circumstances, showing as they do the injustice of the Noble Marquess's remarks and opinions in opposition to this House of Assembly, I do doubt about the propriety of agreeing to the second reading of this measure. I am one of those who always considered — and I am sure the Ministers of the day so stated — that it was their duty and their intention to do all they could to preserve and protect property in that island, to protect the civilisation of society, and to encourage it by every means in their power. Now, I should like to know how property is to be protected? how civilisation is to be established? If you begin by destroying the House of Assembly, and establishing there a despotism in the person of the Governor of the colony, acting with his Council, I believe that there will be no safety for liberty, no safety for persons, in the state of society which will then exist in Jamaica. I believe that neither liberty nor property will be secure, unless the House of Assembly and its authority be maintained. I know this, that when I first heard of these intentions of putting down the House of Assembly, — according to reports which have been confirmed by the speech of the Noble Marquess this evening, — it was my firm opinion that there existed a desire to withdraw every white from the island. If that be not the wish of her Majesty's Government, then I will say that those who propose such measures as these are not in a state of sanity. Property cannot exist either there or elsewhere without drawing to it a certain degree of power; and if you destroy the House of Assembly, you must withdraw the whites: that your Lordships may rely upon. I certainly am anxious to vote for the second reading of this Bill: I wish it to go into committee, that it may receive such amendments as may be necessary to render it palatable to the House of Assembly, and at the same time to insure the execution of those measures which are required for carrying on the government of the colony. I confess that, when I hear of the misbehaviour of the House of Assembly, and their neglect of all their duties, I cannot avoid reminding those who speak in this tone that the House of Assembly has been in a state of prorogation from February to the present time. The Noble Marquess opposite now comes down to ask your Lordships to visit with vengeance the House of Assembly, by authority of the Legislature of this country; but never even hints any intention on the part of Ministers to instruct the Governor, who is now about to go out, to call the Assembly together. Now, I think it is the duty of those who are in possession of authority to endeavour to conciliate those who may feel offended, — to give them a chance, at least, of continuing in their functions by treating them with civility and kindness. The Noble Marquess has done no such thing; on the contrary, his whole speech was made up of violent threats against the House of Assembly, — uttered for no other reason, that I could divine, except that the House of Assembly has disapproved of an Act of Parliament passed in usurpation of their own authority, and communicated to them in a way in which I do not think any private gentleman would like to have an order from a superior delivered to him. I advise your Lordships to vote for the second reading of this Bill. I am sorry my Noble Friend has moved that it be read a second time this day three months. I advise your Lordships to go into committee, that you may consider the various clauses of the measure, and make such amendments as may appear proper, with the view of sending it down to the other House in such a shape as that it may be sent out to the Island of Jamaica with some hope and prospect of being effectual.

LORD GLENELG. — As your Lordships seem disposed to concur in the suggestion to go into committee on the Bill to-morrow, I certainly shall not think of obtruding myself long on your attention. I will just state the course which the Government pursued with respect to the Prisons Act. I wish to guard your Lordships against supposing that the subject of the West India prisons is one that has recently arisen. The state of the workhouses and prisons of Jamaica was a constant topic of complaint in the despatches of the Marquess of Sligo and Sir Lionel Smith, to the Colonial Office. It was constantly pressed on the attention of the House of Assembly during the years 1836 and 1837. My Noble Friend below me (Lord Brougham), in a speech delivered by him last Session, directed your Lordships' attention to the frightful abuses which disgraced the gaols of Jamaica; and he called on Government, by every sacred consideration of justice, to put an end to the cruelties perpetrated in those horrid dungeons. I said, in reply, that I could not but admit that the time had at length arrived at which Parliament must interpose, in its strength and majesty, to repress practices equally revolting to justice and common humanity. The Prisons Bill was in consequence introduced, after the Report of Captain Pringle, the inspector, had been received. I maintain that the Prisons Bill was a necessary part of the Abolition Act Amendment Bill, to which your Lordships agreed last Session. The House, by acceding to the Abolition Act Amendment Bill, gave its sanction to the Prisons Bill. The latter measure was founded on the previously expressed opinions of your Lordships, and was destined to apply, permanently, and to a future condition of society, the same principles which the other measure only put into temporary operation. The Prisons Bill was passed without any opposition; but nothing can be further from the truth than to say that it was a measure passed in ignorance, and without a full expression of your Lordships' approbation. It has been said that the measure was promulgated in Jamaica in a peculiar manner. I am not aware of the circumstances; but I suppose it was proclaimed in the manner in which Bills generally are proclaimed. This I know, — that, looking over the debates which took place in the House of Assembly at the time that the Act was sent out, I do not find in any one of the speeches, whether of speakers hostile or favourable to the Government, the slightest allusion to any want of civility or courtesy on the part of the Home Government, in the mode of promulgating the Act. Many of the speakers were extremely hot, extremely violent, against the conduct of the Government generally; but not one of them made any complaint upon this particular subject.

VISCOUNT ST. VINCENT. — It is not my intention to trespass, long, on the attention of your Lordships; but I feel anxious to say a few words with respect to what has fallen from the Noble and Learned Lord opposite. I certainly do disapprove of the manner in which Government have acted, with reference to the Prisons Bill. I say it was ungracious towards the House of Assembly, after what they had already done to forward the operation of the Emancipation Act, not to give them some credit for what they might do hereafter. Looking at their past proceedings, I think it cannot be said that the House of Assembly are indisposed to adopt all the necessary measures to carry out the Emancipation Act. With regard to prison discipline in Jamaica, I admit that a remedy is required; but I think the Government have not adopted the proper one. I object strongly to the principle of the present Bill; and when I know that a few kind words would have been sufficient to induce the House of Assembly to resume their functions, I should have thought that the Noble Lords opposite, having suspended their functions a short time since, and having then experienced the effect of a few kind words themselves, would have hesitated a little before they proposed to Parliament to deal so harshly and severely with the Assembly of Jamaica. As the Bill is not to be opposed in the present stage, I hope, when your Lordships go into committee, you will be careful to expunge all the objectionable clauses. I trust that you will expunge not only the first clause, but that part of the second which gives to the Governor in council the power of enacting Tax Bills, provided the House of Assembly do not resume its functions within a certain time. Jealous as the other House of Parliament usually is of its privileges, I cannot help feeling some surprise that it should, last year, have allowed the Prisons Bill, which is a Money Bill, to be mutilated in your Lordships' House, and to be passed and sent down to them, without one word of comment.

The EARL of HAREWOOD. — As it appears that your Lordships are not disposed to divide, I shall not press my amendment; but, in withdrawing it for the present, I beg to say that I do so under a firm conviction that such alterations will be made in committee, as may enable me to agree to the Bill. If those alterations be not made, I shall deem it my duty to oppose the measure in its further stages, and to take the sense of the House upon it.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE.—In consequence of what has just fallen from the Noble Viscount opposite, I think it is hardly expedient that I should occupy one moment of your Lordships' time. It is certainly my intention to reserve my observations in favour of the Bill till it shall have arrived at its next stage; but, at the same time, I cannot but say that I think the Noble Duke (the Duke of Welllington) has treated my Noble Friend, the Noble Marquess (the Marquess of Normanby) near me, with great harshness and great injustice. I listened very attentively and carefully to the whole of my Noble Friend's speech; and I declare I could not perceive, in any part of it, anything of the heat, anything of the violence, anything of the acrimony, anything of the irritating nature, which the Noble Duke has so liberally imputed to it. The fact is, that, owing to circumstances, we are forced upon a course of action of which we do not, ourselves, approve, — which we do not think the best that could be adopted, — which we do not think will be successful, — which we believe will ultimately terminate in the necessary adoption of the measure which has been rejected; but, at the same time, as my Noble Friend has most clearly and distinctly stated, we are willing to give the present Bill, which must be regarded as an experiment, a full and fair trial. My Noble Friend stated that he meant to treat it fairly; and, unquestionably, if the House of Assembly should do that (which I do not think they will do), — if they should show a disposition to resume their functions — to perform the duties which are imposed upon them — the duties for which they are constituted, — if they should show a disposition to take such a course, unquestionably there will be every desire on the part of the Government to do that which I admit, with the Noble Duke, would have been, if circumstances would have permitted it, by far the most prudent course that could be adopted, — namely, to concert all the measures, connected with the completion of the Act of Emancipation, with the House of Assembly, and thereby to secure the consent, concurrence, and authority of that body. Unquestionably that would have been the best course that could have been adopted; but the Government was driven out of that course by the conduct of the House of Assembly. It was with the deepest regret and concern that the Government felt themselves compelled to adopt a different course. However, they will be ready to act according to their original and better intention, when they feel that they can do so with justice to themselves, justice to the country, and justice to the colony itself. When the Noble Viscount (Viscount St. Vincent) spoke of the impropriety of having originated a Money Bill, — and when he commented upon the apathy of the House of Commons in not vindicating its privileges, — I must be allowed to express my surprise that he, seeing the great impropriety of the measure, did not take the opportunity of resisting it last ——

VISCOUNT ST. VINCENT. — I was not in the country.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I am surprised, then, that the Noble Duke did not state, last year, what he has stated this evening, with respect to the Prisons Bill. The Noble Duke is in the habit of paying the closest attention to the business which comes before your Lordships; and I am therefore astonished that he should have allowed so very objectionable a Bill to pass without notice. I again repeat, that I shall reserve my observations in support of the present measure till its next stage; for I merely rose to state that the remarks which the Noble Duke has made upon my Noble Friend's speech were too severe; — nay, more, that they were utterly unfounded.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — As I fully and entirely concur in every word that has fallen from the Noble Duke in reference to the Noble Marquess, I feel it my duty to rise to take my share in any responsibility that may result from the expressions he has used. I think that the speech of the Noble Marquess was calculated to deprive the measure, now proposed, of the advantage of having a fair trial. I think it was calculated, by its revival of old grievances, to irritate the House of Assembly, and to prevent the adoption of those measures which the condition of the colony seems to require. With the exception of the speech of the Noble Duke, I may say, I regret the tone which has been adopted on both sides of the House in the present discussion. On the one hand, I think that the Noble Marquess has shown much intemperance in his condemnation of the House of Assembly; on the other hand, I think that the Noble

Earl (the Earl of Harewood), and the Noble Viscount (Viscount St. Vincent) near me, have been too eager to vindicate and excuse the conduct of that body. Of the two, however, I must say that I think the intemperance of the Noble Marquess is most to be deprecated. As regards the Prisons Bill, I will take upon myself any blame which may attach to this House for passing that measure. I consider that that measure was perfectly justifiable. I thought so on reading Captain Pringle's Report, and also on the description which a Noble Friend of mine gave the country of the atrocities practised under the old system. As I am of opinion that the Imperial Parliament was justified in passing the Prisons Bill, I cannot consider that the conduct of the House of Assembly was altogether justifiable. I am, however, anxious that legislation for the colony of Jamaica should be carried on by the House of Assembly under its existing constitution. I dislike all suspensions of constitutions; they alter the tone of men's thoughts and feelings, and are in their results highly injurious to general liberty. It has been well said by a high political authority, that slavery, even if it commence at the extremities, is inconceivably rapid in its progress, and is certain, before long, to carry its contagion even to the heart of an empire. I might add, that it is of the very essence of arbitrary government, when it is once commenced, to create necessities for its own continuance. It is for this reason that I objected to the measure which was introduced into the other House of Parliament on this subject, — but which, in deference to public opinion, was subsequently abandoned. It would have been destructive of liberty in Jamaica; and the destruction of liberty in Jamaica would have been detrimental to the cause of general liberty in this country.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON. — One word by way of explanation. I have to apologise to your Lordships for not having attended to the Prisons Bill at the time it was under your consideration, last year. Perhaps, if I had attended to it, I should have voted for it, as I did for other Bills, which I considered to be necessary to carry into execution the Negro Emancipation Act, — against which, be it recollected, I voted originally. When, however, that measure became an Act of the Legislature, I voted in favour of all measures necessary to give it effect. I have no recollection of the Prisons Bill being mentioned at all in Parliament; but if I had been in the House at the time, I should probably have voted in favour of it on the grounds I have already stated.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — If I had deserved the severe animadversions of the Noble Duke, no one would feel more severely than I should do, the weight of censure falling upon me from such a quarter. But I have the pleasing consciousness of feeling that I do not deserve it. I did not, therefore, require the weight of the sentence with which the Noble Baron opposite (Lord Ellenborough) has thought to overwhelm me, to induce me to rise and protest against those animadversions as unfounded and unjust. The Noble Baron, however, divided his censures so equally amongst all your Lordships who have taken share in this debate, that you must even make up your minds to bear it among you as you best can. The Noble Duke has found fault with me, because I did not distinctly state that the House of Assembly would be called again together before the Bill was put into operation. Now, when I said that this experiment should be fully and fairly tried, I meant, of course, that the House of Assembly should be called together in time to prevent the necessity — in case it resumed its functions — of those Orders in Council being carried into execution. The Noble Baron (Lord Ellenborough) has been pleased to say that I have been intemperate. If the charge be true, I can only plead that I am not in the habit of being so. But any person who has been an eye-witness, as I have been, of the practical evils of slavery, must be inclined, when he sees impediments to the remedy of them raised and created by the House of Assembly, to express himself rather warmly. At the same time, I cannot tax my memory with having used, on the present occasion, a single expression which I feel myself called upon to retract.

The amendment was then withdrawn; and Bill read a second time, and committed to a committee of the whole House to-morrow; and the Lords summoned.

SLAVERY.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I wish to ask a question of the Noble Marquess the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in reference to a statement which has gone the round of the American and European newspapers. I entertain no doubt that it will be in the power of the Noble Marquess to give it a decided contradiction; ut the sooner that contradiction goes orth the better. The statement in question is, that five slavers put into Rio on ne 25th of March last, and that the slaves hich they carried were sold to a slavery f eight years at 5*l.* a head. This, evidently, must be untrue. But it is clear iat a practice prevails, which demands ne immediate attention of her Majesty's overnment. The practice is this,—that hen negroes cannot be properly located, s it is called, they are taken to Cuba and ther places, where it is legal to indenture iem as apprentices. I have been informed by a gentleman of high respectability connected with Dominica, that 430 egroes were, in 1837, brought there in a laver, which afterwards remained for the urpose of being repaired. I am bound, lso, to observe, that my informant states iat, wherever the negroes are located, ney generally, if not uniformly, behave ith the utmost correctness and propriety.

Digitized by Google

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.—I have received no information on the ubject of the Noble and Learned Lord's rst inquiry. As regards his second, I hall take care to ascertain whether or ot there be any information in the Colonial Office relating to it.

COMMON PLEAS REGULATION BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR having moved he third reading of this Bill,—

LORD LANGDALE said:—The practice in the Court of Common Pleas being ormerly confined to serjeants, was, by an rder issued five years ago, opened to all arristers. The Bill now before the House proposes to open it only partially, y confining the power of moving for ew trials to causes tried on the circuit, and excluding those tried in London nd Middlesex. As the greater number of causes tried by the Common Pleas are in he latter division, of course barristers re shut out in a proportionate degree. I think, then, it would be more conducive o the public service, if the Act were more extended in its operation. As this Bill is, however, brought in for the purpose, as I understand, of reconciling differences, and as it is in all probability well considered, I shall not further oppose it.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The reason that this privilege is confined to he circuit is, because the serjeants do not go there; whereas they are always to be found in London and Middlesex.

The Bill was then read a third time, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

Of all seizures that have been made by the Excise and Customs of any of such sweets or made wines and sweetened compounded spirits so imported, and the reason of such seizures:

Of all sweets or made wines and sweetened compounded spirits seized inland, being brought from Scotland into England, contrary to the provisions of the Act 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 72., since the passing of the said Act to the present period:

Stating how all seizures of the above-mentioned sweets or made wines and sweetened compounded spirits, within the period of the dates specified, have been dealt with, if any, and what amount of penalty has been enforced against the parties from whom any such seizures have been made:

Of the quantity, stating the denomination, sort, or kind, of all such sweets or made wines and sweetened compounded spirits remaining in bond on the 24th day of June, 1839, and where bonded.

ALLEGED INSULT TO THE BRITISH FLAG.

LORD VISCOUNT INGESTRE. — Having been rather irregular, the other evening, in putting a question to the Honourable Baronet the Member for Sandwich, in reference to an outrage supposed to have been committed on the British flag in the Mexican seas, I beg, now, to inquire, either of that Honourable Member, or of the Honourable Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty, first, whether the Admiralty have received any official communication of the fact of that outrage having occurred? next, whether, supposing the statement contained in the newspapers to be true, the midshipman who is said to have been ordered by Commodore Douglas to be reprimanded, has received such reprimand? and whether, if he has so received it, the Board of Admiralty concurred in the propriety of it?

Mr. C. WOOD. — I conceive the Noble Lord to allude to a letter which appeared in the Times newspaper in the course of last week.

LORD INGESTRE. — I read the account of the outrage in question in the Hampshire Advertiser.

Mr. C. WOOD. — The material points of the statement are, — that shortly before the capture of Vera Cruz by the French, subsequent to the affair of the Express packet, and while her Majesty's ship Vestal was lying of Vera Cruz with a British sloop in company, — Captain Carter, of the Vestal, being senior officer, — an English boat from the sloop, under command of a midshipman, went on shore, and that a Mexican subject took refuge in the boat for protection, but was taken by force from thence by the French officer in command. The Admiralty, however, has received no account whatever of any such transaction, — because, as far as I can learn, no such transaction has taken place. My attention was first called to the subject by the question of the Noble Lord on a former evening. I at once perceived that, if the dates given with the statement in the Hampshire Advertiser were correct, it was utterly impossible that the transaction could ever have occurred, because, at the time named, the Vestal was not at Vera Cruz. She arrived there on the 28th of December, and this occurrence is said to have taken place on the 5th of that month. I could have wished to have stopped here, as this answer will, no doubt, be deemed satisfactory by the Noble Lord and the House; but, rather than lie under the imputation of concealing any circumstances of the case, actually known to me, I shall mention to the House some facts connected with it. For their accuracy, however, I cannot vouch, having received them second-hand, as I may say, from an officer whom I have not since been able to see on the subject. His statement is, that two British officers went out in a Mexican fishing boat to learn to catch turtles, when they chose to hoist the British ensign. This boat went among the French squadron, where the French guard boat was, when her commander took the Mexican out of the boat. Upon this, some representation was made by Captain Carter to the French admiral, who said he would communicate with the commodore. Whether that communication took place, or not, the Mexican who was taken out of the boat was set at liberty within twenty-fours. This I presume to be the foundation for the story which has appeared in the papers. Whether that statement be correct, or not, I cannot positively pronounce. If it be, it is clear the English officers were in the wrong in hoisting the English flag in a Mexican fishing boat; and, under such circumstances, no Mexican could have claimed the protection of that flag. The commodore has not thought it worth while to report this affair to the Admiralty at home; and the Noble Lord, who has been so recently afloat, must be well aware that many irregularities may occur on foreign stations, which may be quite fit to be animadverted upon and reported upon, but which ought not to be brought before the House of Commons.

LORD INGESTRE. — After the rebuke which the Honourable Secretary has given me for bringing the subject before the House, I beg leave to say that, having seen the account in the public newspapers, and, therefore, invested with some probability, I felt it my duty to take this step. In those accounts, it appears that a subordinate officer, for doing what he deemed his duty, has been reprimanded by his superior. Is that a proper way to keep up the discipline of the service? Hence it was that I put the question to the Honourable Gentleman, — the more especially since the present is the third instance of the kind reported to have occurred in that part of the world within six months. I am glad, however, to find that the Admiralty has received no account of such a transaction, and that further stain does not rest upon the British flag. I have been actuated by no party motives in putting the question, but merely the desire that a subordinate officer might not be unjustly reprimanded without public notice being taken of the fact.

SIR F. BURDETT. — I think the country should feel indebted to my Noble Friend for putting the question. The accounts referred to have appeared in very authentic public organs ——

[Cries of "Order!"]

I only wish to say that I trust no time will be lost by the Admiralty in making inquiry into the facts.

SHIPWRECKS.

Mr. G. PALMER. — I beg to know whether the Right Honourable Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has turned his attention to the Report of the Committee on Shipwrecks made last week? and whether the Government will introduce any Bill this Session to carry out the recommendation of that Report?

Mr. POULETT THOMSON. — It is impossible for me to tell whether I can introduce any measure on the subject during the present Session. The Report of the committee has not yet been printed; and, previously to any measure being introduced, it will be necessary to have that Report circulated among Members of the House, and sent forth to the public. I cannot, therefore, give the Honourable Member any pledge; but I greatly doubt the possibility of introducing any measure during the present Session.

SHIPS OF WAR.

LORD INGESTRE. — I wish to know whether it is the intention of the Admiralty to build a line-of-battle ship on the plan of the late Admiral Gage?

ADMIRAL ADAM. — The only answer I can give the Noble Lord, is, that the subject is under the consideration of the Board of Admiralty.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION BILL.

Mr. W. MILES. — I wish to ask the Noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department, when it is his intention to proceed with the Summary Jurisdiction Bill?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I intend to proceed with it the week after next.

FACTORIES BILL.

Mr. FOX MAULE having moved the Order of the Day for going into committee on this Bill, —

Mr. WILSON PATTEN said: — I do not rise for the purpose of creating a discussion before the House goes into committee, but for the sake of obtaining information, by which my opinion, and the opinions of many other Honourable Members, will, I think, be influenced with respect to this Bill. They who have looked into it must have seen that extraordinary powers — greater powers than the local magistracy possess — are to be given to persons holding very subordinate situations under the inspectors; and those powers, I am convinced, will tend very much to injure the Bill in its operation. Now I wish to inquire of the Honourable Gentleman what salary he intends to give, under the new Bill, to each of the sub-inspectors? and whether he will consent to increase the number of inspectors, with a larger salary to each, and to do away with the sub-inspectors altogether? I am convinced that the master manufacturers, who consider themselves rather hardly dealt with by this Bill, are desirous that the inspectors should be persons of such authority as to be above suspicion of collusion with themselves or with any other party.

LORD STANLEY. — Before the Honourable Gentleman answers the question proposed by my Honourable Friend, perhaps I may be allowed to say, in conformity with the views entertained by my Honourable Friend and Colleague, who has just sat down, that I am satisfied the Government will find the working of this Bill much facilitated if they give a greater character of respectability — I do not mean mere personal respectability, but that which consists in weight and authority, also — to the inspectors, rather than adopt the plan of having sub-inspectors or superintendents. The inspectors, as at present constituted, have a most inquisitorial power — to say nothing of their legislative powers, — and the same powers are proposed to be given to the sub-inspectors. The master manufacturers by no means complain that such powers should be given; but they consider that powers of so peculiar a nature should be intrusted only to persons above all suspicion, not only on the score of moral character, but also with reference to their position, as indicated by the amount of salary paid to them. Of course, I do not mean to say that an increased salary will necessarily produce an increased respectability; but I do think it too much to hope that persons whose salary is only 350*l.* a-year (which is to cover their travelling and incidental expenses), would, by that salary, be placed beyond the reach of those temptations to bribery to which they will necessarily be exposed under the operation of this Bill. The manufacturers by no means desire to evade the inspection which the law deems necessary; but they do wish that it should be rendered more efficient. At present, the visits of the inspectors being only periodical, and remote from each other in point of time, they are without that efficient control which residence in the district and constant personal observation would give them. I hope the Government will listen to these suggestions; and even if the result be an increased amount of charge, that they will consent that, instead of a small number of inspectors, not resident in particular districts, and a large number of sub-inspectors with small salaries, there shall be an increased number of inspectors, resident in particular districts, to whom larger salaries shall be paid. Though the expense of the measure will be increased by the adoption of this proposition, its efficiency in operation will also be much increased. The opposition which Government will have to fear, will not be so much from the master manufacturers as from the natural feelings of the parents, — who will perceive that, by the restrictions imposed by the measure, many of their children will be prevented from adding to their means, and enabling them to eke out their weekly earnings. The only chance, then, of securing success for the measure, is by obtaining the cordial co-operation of the master manufacturers, — which is only to be done by showing them that the operation of the law, though stringent, will not be vexatious, and that they will not be constantly subjected to the inquisitorial interference of persons in a subordinate station. I have been thus particular in expressing my opinion, in addition to that of my Honourable Colleague, because the answer of the Government may very materially affect the spirit in which Gentlemen connected with the manufacturing interest may approach the consideration of the subject on the present occasion.

SIR GEORGE STRICKLAND. — Sir, the real complaint of the manufacturers is different from what has been stated by the Noble Lord; it is, that they should be subjected to what is called inspectors' law.

LORD STANLEY. — Hear, hear!

SIR GEORGE STRICKLAND. — I conceive that the means of remedying this objection would not consist, as the Noble Lord supposes, in increasing the salaries of the inspectors, but that that object would be much better attained by rendering it unnecessary for the inspectors to make any of the regulations in question, — in fact, by your laying down the law in the Act of Parliament, and then calling on the inspectors to put the law in execution, and see it obeyed. I would not give the inspectors power to make laws which, although, perhaps, good in themselves, must, from the source from which they spring, be objects of suspicion to the manufacturers. I hope the clause which gives these powers to the inspectors will be omitted in the Bill.

Mr. MARK PHILIPS. — Sir, I think that the argument of the Honourable Baronet is entitled to much consideration; but there is this to observe, — that if the law were laid down in the Act, and the interpretation of it left to the inspectors, the evil would only be renewed in another shape. In objecting to the appointment of the sub-inspectors, it is not the wish of the master manufacturers to elude that vigilance which the law thought it necessary to maintain; but they affirm that they ought not to be subject to be intruded upon in a manner that, by persons of character, honour, and respectability (of whom how many there are among them I need hardly say), would be very much deprecated. I beg distinctly to be understood as making no complaint whatever against the existing inspectors; I am merely looking at what might happen under the operation of this Bill. Appointments might be made that would be extremely vexatious to individuals. It is possible that persons might be hereafter appointed, whose claim to those appointments would partly be their practical knowledge of machinery, and of the operation of factories. These persons would have the right of admittance, at all times, to all parts of the factories; and what is there to hinder them from afterwards, in some way, taking advantage of secrets and improvements, the disclosure or the use of which might be highly advantageous to themselves, but most detrimental to the manufacturer? Great care ought to be taken by Parliament to insure these appointments being filled only by persons fully qualified to undertake such important trusts. I am decidedly for the appointment of resident inspectors, who could at all times obtain access to the factories. I will not, however, do more, now, than say that I join in the opinion as to the propriety of a remodelling of the plan for the appointment of sub-inspectors, which has been so well expressed by the Noble Lord.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — Sir, there was a great deal in what has fallen from the Honourable Gentleman, which would have been better discussed, when we come to the provisions of the Bill in committee. As to the question of the Honourable Gentleman opposite, with reference to the salaries of the sub-inspectors, the Honourable Gentleman will see, from the Bill itself, that we do not propose to touch, in it, upon the salaries, at all. It will be competent to the Honourable Gentleman to move to increase the salaries when that question shall come before the House in another shape. With regard, however, to the suggestion, that the sub-inspectors should not have the power of making regulations under the inspectors, I am so convinced, after a full investigation of the subject, of the necessity of their having that power, that I should be most unwilling, indeed, to give up the principle. It is extremely difficult for Honourable Gentlemen to steer between the master manufacturers, on the one hand, and the agitation in the country on this subject, on the other; but I certainly think that the best conclusion that could be arrived at, has been adopted in the Bill.

Mr. W. PATTEN. — May I ask the Honourable Member opposite, what is the number of sub-inspectors intended to be named?

Mr. FOX MAULE. — The number of sub-inspectors is not fixed in the Bill; and, as regards the salaries, the Honourable Gentleman can, if he think fit, move to increase the amount when the question shall come on, in considering the Estimates.

LORD STANLEY. — My objection is to the proposition, that there should be an unlimited number of sub-inspectors, each of them with an unrestricted power to inspect the factories. I think a preferable plan would be, to appoint one inspector for each district, with an adequate salary, who would maintain a complete inspection at all times.

Mr. BROTHERTON. — Sir, my wish is, that Government, in altering the Factory Act, could have made its provisions so simple as to preclude the necessity for there being so much inspecting. It would be much better to introduce such a Bill as would be agreeable to the feelings of all parties, and that would render all this expense unnecessary. It would be very easy to legislate in such a manner as would make the interests of the parents comport with the welfare of the children, and thus remedy the evil complained of by the Noble Lord.

LORD ASHLEY. — I should be very happy if anything could be done to meet the objections of the Honourable Member. I admit that the inspectors have, in many cases, proved a great annoyance, and that the uniformity of regulation which was hoped for, from the factory inspectors has been found unattainable. It has frequently happened, that after a system of regulations has been laid down, something has arisen rendering it necessary to alter them, and lay down new ones. I quite agree with the Noble Member for North Lancashire, in thinking it desirable that there should be greater respectability and responsibility on the part of those appointed to exercise such powers as are given by this Bill; and the Honourable Member will, no doubt, recollect that I suggested as much two years ago. My suggestion was, that the travelling expenses of the inspectors should be paid by way of mileage, because I thought that out of a salary of 800*l.* or 400*l.* a-year it was impossible to make the necessary number of visits. The observation of the Honourable Member for Salford is perfectly true as to the complicated state of the law on this subject. If we had only one restrictive clause preventing the working of the mills beyond certain hours, we might almost get rid of the inspectors altogether, and rest on the principle of Sir John Hobhouse's Act of 1825. As long as the present Act lasts, I trust there will not be a smaller number of inspectors than there is at present.

Mr. HINDLEY. — Sir, I see, by the notice paper, that several amendments are to be proposed with respect to reducing the hours of working in factories; and I wish to know whether it is the intention of the Government to resist those propositions?

Mr. FOX MAULE. — In reply to the Honourable Member, I beg to say, that I shall resist any alterations in the Bill as regards the age, or the time of working.

Order of the Day for a committee of the whole House, read.

On the question, "That the Speaker do leave the chair," —

LORD ASHLEY said: — I shall not detain the House more than two minutes, while I protest against the manner in which the progress of this Bill has been delayed. It was introduced on the 14th of February, and we have now arrived at the 1st of July before it has been committed. The consequence of this delay is, that the Bill cannot be discussed in such a satisfactory manner as I could wish, as, at this late period of the Session, the attention of the House is wearied, and also many Members, on whose assistance I relied in discussing this Bill, are prevented from being present. The Noble Lord, no doubt, has gained an advantage by this proceeding, which, I have no doubt, will tell against me in the division.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I shall not detain the House, even one moment, by making any reply to the observations of the Noble Lord.

LORD ASHLEY. — I am not aware that I have said anything in any way uncourteous, to call forth such a reply from the Noble Lord. If I had done so, I would willingly apologise; but I did not expect such an answer from the Noble Lord.

The SPEAKER then left the chair, and the House resolved itself into committee.

The first clause was agreed to.

On the second (the interpretation) clause being put, —

Mr. BROTHERTON said: — Sir, it is my wish that this very important question should be discussed with calmness and moderation. This is a matter involving the interests of 400,000 persons employed in mills and factories. The object of the measure is, no doubt, to give protection to the children and young persons employed in the factories from excessive labour, and I give Government full credit for its intentions; and the only difficulty with me is, as to the means by which that end may be obtained, for I do not think that the provisions of this Bill will effect the object in view as satisfactorily as other means which might be adopted. I consider that the means proposed by me are better and more simple than those in the Bill; and in order that the committee may be able to judge of this, and of the nature of my amendment, I will endeavour, shortly, to give them an account of the various enactments which, at different intervals, have preceded the present Bill. In 1809, a Bill was passed to protect children under 16 years of age, enacting that they should not work more than twelve hours a-day. This was found insufficient, and great efforts were made to alter the Bill. It was proposed to extend the age to 21, and to reduce the time for labour. However, even so late as 1825, the Legislature could do no more than to reduce the time to sixty-nine hours a-week. In 1831 an Act was passed, by which the Legislature fixed the age for protection at 18, and declared the number of hours' work in a week should be fixed at sixty-nine. In 1833, the present Act was passed: by this, children under 18 were prevented working in factories for more than forty-eight hours a-week, or eight hours a-day; but above the age of 18 they might be employed any number of hours. It was also required that children, to be enabled to work in the factories, must produce certificates from their parents and surgeons; and provision was further made that they should go to school a certain number of hours in the week. By an extraordinary anomaly, however, these provisions did not extend to silk-mills,—for children of 6 years of age might be made to work in silk mills twelve hours a-day; while, according to the Act, children of 12 years of age could not be made to work more than eight hours a-day in a cotton mill. The details of the Act were so complicated, that they led to the commission of all sorts of frauds; and the consequence was, that the provisions of the Bill have not been fairly carried into effect. It is, in fact, a measure most objectionable to the masters, oppressive to the workmen, and does not afford protection to the children. To prove this, it will be only necessary to state that, last year, out of 4700 factories, 2074 individuals were convicted, and penalties recovered to the amount of 531*l.*; but, notwithstanding all their exertions, it is notorious that the inspectors cannot prevent the children or young persons being overworked. Mr. Horner and others of the inspectors have admitted that it is impossible to prevent the law being evaded; and it is well known that, in Nottingham and its neighbourhood, great numbers under the legal age are working sixteen hours a-day. It may be carried into effect, apparently, in some small places; but the truth is, that, on an extensive scale, it really does not afford protection to children under 13. It appears from the Returns before the House, that in 1835 there were 56,700 children under the age of 13 employed in factories, and the total number of children and young persons under the age of 18 was 354,684. The result of the return for last year was that the total number employed was 413,435 persons, and of those 32,464 were under the age of 13. Thus it would appear that the number of children employed under the age of 13, was as 1 in 6 at the first period, but last year the number would be as 1 in 12. In gross numbers, the difference between the number of children employed in 1835 and 1838 is upwards of 22,000. I would ask any Honourable Gentleman acquainted with the subject, whether he believes that anything like that number of children have been thrown out of work in the factories during these three years?

Again, in Scotland, in 1835, the number of children under 13 that were employed in the factories, was about 1 in 7, as compared with the total number of persons employed; but, at present, according to the Returns, the proportion is 1 in 32. There must surely be some deception in this. The great improvements that have been made in the machinery in the factories, within the last few years, have greatly diminished the amount of labour required of the adults; and I believe that I am not going beyond the mark, when I state that, in some branches of trade, the services of nearly one half the number of adults have been dispensed with since 1831. We find that these persons are kept immured in the factories for twelve hours — and more than twelve hours — a-day; and I ask, is it just, or expedient for the interests of the community, that any proportion of the workpeople should be kept so long at labour in the factories as to prevent them from obtaining any share in those humble enjoyments which are within their grasp? Of what use is it for you to make grants for educating the people, if you give them no time for study? By the long confinement in close atmospheres, these labourers are rendered almost incapable of enjoyment; and they have no means of cultivating their minds, or improving the slender education they may have received in childhood. The females, also, are not fit for their situations as wives and mothers, as they have no means of mental improvement. These evils are constantly increasing; and I believe that the only effective remedy that could be applied would be, to prevent the factories being worked more than a certain number of hours a-day. What I should propose would be, that there should be a uniform time for working for all persons in factories; and that all ages should be placed on the same footing, and the same principle applied to them. I also do not see why silk or lace mills should be exempted, and not be placed under the operation of the Act. I am told that there are many of these mills where the persons employed in them are engaged fourteen or fifteen hours a-day; and females go on at five o'clock in the morning, and are kept constantly at work there until nine o'clock at night, with the intermission of a few minutes for meals, which they are obliged to take within the walls of their factories, at a time when the machinery is cleaning. Only consider what a temptation there is for manufacturers breaking the law! Suppose a mill works 1000lbs. of cotton a-day, by working ten hours; by working an hour longer, it would turn out 1000lbs. more in the week. What I intend to propose in this clause is, that the age should be increased of the parties who are to come within the operation of the Act, namely, from 18 to 21. I am also most anxious that a ten hours' a-day system should be adopted for all the factories, as this is quite enough for man, woman, or child; and I think that, if it were made general, it might be done in a manner to prove satisfactory to the masters. I think that, by proper regulations on this subject, the trade of the country could be carried on with advantage; and I have no doubt that, if the occupation were confined to ten hours a-day, the employment in factories would be found to be healthy, instead of being unhealthy. I am not so alarmed for the situation of the country, that I would consent to sacrifice the interests of those persons, because it is against one of the dogmas of political economy. I shall conclude with proposing that the words "under the age of eighteen years" be struck out, and the words "under the age of twenty-one years" be substituted.

LORD ASHLEY.—I have great pleasure in supporting the amendment; and I beg to remind the House that a similar amendment was proposed, in the other House, in the Bill of 1833; but this House refused to agree to it. In all other cases the interest of persons under twenty-one years is protected, and I think that the interest of those who have only their labour to depend upon should be so likewise.

Mr. P. THOMSON.—Sir, the object of my Honourable Friend evidently is, to impose restrictions on the period of adult labour in factories, and to limit the period of work in mills to ten hours. If such restrictions were allowed, the effect would be, that those parties who are dependent on their labour would be deprived of so much of the means at their command. It may be said that this is the principle of the Bill, but that in it the Legislature proposes to protect the interests of those who cannot protect themselves; but no one will say, looking to the character of the working classes of this country, that those above the age of 18 are not in a situation to protect themselves. I confess that I think one of the evils of the factory system is, the making the children independent of their parents at too early an age. I hope the House will not consent to this amendment.

Mr. O'CONNELL.—In my opinion, as a general principle, it is inexpedient to interfere between the employer and the employed. The only principle contended for, now, is, the protection of the children. The law recognises that in the Court of Chancery. But if we are going to adopt the principle, we should do so to the full extent, and, as chancellors for the children, protect them to the age of twenty-one years.

Mr. MARK PHILIPS.—I think that, if such an amendment be adopted, it will introduce a great practical difficulty into the working of the Bill. It will prevent any persons under the age of 21 from attending in the factories at such times for the purpose of cleaning the machinery. This is necessary to be done two or three times a-week, and is generally done during meal times by young men, employed by the mill-owner, who will now be liable to a heavy penalty if he thus employ any one under the age of 21.

Mr. JOHN FIELDEN.—I am quite satisfied the masters will be better satisfied with the words "twenty-one years" than "eighteen," and the operatives, themselves, will also like it better.

Mr. BAINES.—So far am I from entertaining the opinion expressed by the Honourable Member for Oldham, that I think the masters will object to the alteration. I lately called together certain manufacturers in Yorkshire; and, having previously submitted to them the provisions of the Bill, I asked them whether there was any alteration in it which they could suggest? There was not a single individual who expressed anything like an objection to the present arrangement of eighteen years. I think that Parliament should make this Bill as agreeable as possible to the masters; but I do not think that any such end would be answered by the alteration suggested.

Mr. HINDLEY.—The question is, whether the people are to be worked more than twelve hours a-day? I think that that is quite enough, in a warm cotton mill. I shall certainly vote for the amendment.

Question put, "That the word 'eighteen' stand part of the clause."

The committee divided;—Ayes 87; Noes 44;—Majority 43.

Mr. HINDLEY. — Before proceeding further with the clauses, I wish to ask the Honourable the Under Secretary for the Home Department rather an important question. There is not, on the votes, any notice of a single alteration which he intends to make. I have seen, since I entered the House, a circular of the cotton spinners respecting these alterations. What I wish to know is, whether the Honourable Gentleman has altered his Bill in accordance with the views of these cotton spinners? or whether they have had the privilege of investigating the clauses?

Mr. FOX MAULE. — In answer to the Honourable Member, I beg to state that I have listened to the remarks of the cotton spinners, but they have not seen my Bill in its amended form.

Mr. M. PHILIPS. — I should like to set my Honourable Friend right. I can certainly state that the alterations were not shown to the deputation, nor have I seen a single copy of them until to-day.

LORD ASHLEY. — Sir, I have now to move an amendment, for the purpose of including silk factories in the operation of the Bill. There are 50,550 persons employed in silk factories, many of whom are young children, and are now employed ten hours, continuously, a-day. I think, also, that lace factories should be included.

Mr. POULETT THOMSON. — I have no objection to put the young persons employed in silk factories on the same footing as the children in other factories, so far as regards the number of hours; but I think it desirable that children should be allowed to enter these factories at an earlier age than in the case of other factories, in consequence of the longer training required for this manufacture. These factories were excluded from the old Act, because it was at that time a young manufacture in this country; and there are other circumstances which, in a manner, justify its being omitted. With regard to the lace factories, it would hardly be fair to include them until the masters have had some notice.

Mr. J. HEATHCOAT. — If the Noble Lord will take up that particular part of the question, — namely, that relating to lace factories, — next Session, I will willingly support the Noble Lord in extending the operation of the Act to that branch of the trade.

Mr. SLANEY. — Do I understand the Right Honourable Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade to accede to the suggestion of the Noble Lord?

Mr. POULETT THOMSON. — What I said was this, — that I had no objection to place the children in the silk factories on the same footing with children in other factories, so far as regards the hours of labour; but I added, that I could not extend the limitation of age, because, unless children be allowed to enter silk factories while very young, they cannot acquire that delicacy of touch which is essential to the kind of work they are engaged upon.

LORD STANLEY. — I am disposed to think it would be well to limit the age of children to nine years in the case of factories, whatever may be the "delicacy of touch" required in the silk manufacture. But, at the same time, if there be any difference of opinion on the point, I would recommend my Noble Friend not to press for the exclusion of the words from the interpretation clause, but consider his proposal on the third clause.

Mr. HUME. — At this time, when the silk trade is struggling for existence, it does appear to me very doubtful policy to interfere with it, — employing, as it does, many thousands of hands. You had a great deal better make bread cheap. When the Noble Lord talks about extending our humanity to the factory children, he would do well to remember that he voted against giving them cheap bread, and giving them education.

[Cries of "Hear!" and, "No!"]

If the Noble Lord did not vote against cheap bread, I am greatly mistaken.

[Cries of "Question!"]

Ay, it is very well for Honourable Gentlemen to ride off in that way, disregarding the interest of those who give employment to the labouring classes. For my part, I have always, from first to last, been against the Bill; and I am satisfied no good has yet resulted from it, compared with its evils. I should like to know whether the Noble Lord opposite has presented any petitions on this subject; for if he has, the House ought to be made acquainted with their nature, their allegations, and the parties from whom they have come. For my part, I think this is a gratuitous interference with the trade; and I am sorry to see the President of the Board of Trade so willing to entertain the consideration of it.

LORD ASHLEY. — I wish to say that it is a mistake to suppose that the manufacturers have not had notice; I gave notice of my intention several months ago. The Right Honourable Gentleman should recollect that lace factories were included in the Bill of 1833.

Mr. BROTHERTON. — I shall postpone my amendments till the Noble Lord's amendments to Clause 9. are disposed of.

Mr. W. S. O'BRIEN. — Are we, then, really to consign children under nine years of age to the slavery of a factory for another year? Talk of evidence! — I require no evidence to prove to me that children under nine years old ought not to be put to work, in any factory at all. Where is their time for education? Are they to receive no instruction at all? I shall vote, most cordially, for the amendment of the Noble Lord.

Mr. VILLIERS STUART. — I agree with the Honourable Member for Limerick, in his sentiments; but when he speaks of education, I would ask him what means the parents have of sending these poor children to school? The true mode of ameliorating the condition of these classes is to give them the necessaries of life at a cheaper rate; but that is forbidden by the law of the land. When these children ask for bread, you give them a stone.

Mr. SLANEY. — I put it to the Noble Lord, whether the object which both he and I have, in common, would not be more likely to be obtained by giving the Right Honourable Gentleman time to communicate with the manufacturers?

Mr. DARBY. — I think we should have some assurance from the Right Honourable Gentleman that he will communicate with the manufacturers between this time and the bringing up of the Report.

Mr. POULETT THOMSON. — I have stated that I am not now prepared to admit this clause; that the parties have not had any notice, except that which is on the notice book. Neither am I prepared to negative the proposition of the Noble Lord. What I wish for is, that the parties should have time, and I will certainly communicate with them.

Mr. MARK PHILIPS. — I am not sufficiently acquainted with the details of the woollen manufactures of Yorkshire, to know whether that trade will be affected, or not, by the word "cutting" in the eleventh line of the clause. I beg leave to ask this question; and also whether any communication has been received from the trade on that point?

Digitized by Google

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I am happy to state, for the satisfaction of the Honourable Gentleman, that my attention was called to this point; and not being better acquainted with the technicalities of this trade than the Honourable Gentleman himself, I referred the question to competent persons, and I am assured that the trade will not be affected by the word to which the Honourable Gentleman has alluded.

The clause was then agreed to.

Clause 3. "Children under the age of nine years, not to work in factories."

On this clause being put, —

LORD ASHLEY said:—I beg to move, as an amendment, to leave out the words "not being in a silk factory."

Mr. BAINES. — I should not be discharging my duty, if I did not submit to the House the considerations which have been urged by the manufacturers on this point. They say that children under nine years of age are frequently running about, and contracting bad habits, in the streets; that if you employ them — under proper superintendence — in factories, you do them a benefit. They say, if a child under nine years be employed, he is at the same time receiving education. Under these circumstances, they are of opinion that it would tend much to advance the interests of humanity, that children should be employed at eight instead of nine years, and that thereby they would gain the opportunity of being educated in the factory schools. With these representations, they couple the proposal that children under nine should not work more than six hours a-day; and they conceive that, by this plan, both the children and their parents would be benefited. I submit this proposal to the House, but without any intention of dividing; and I beg to propose that the blank be filled up with the word "eight."

Mr. SLANEY. — I trust the Noble Lord will interfere, and oppose the proposition of the Honourable Member for Leeds, which, if carried, would take out of the protection of the law a vast number of children — those under nine years old — who are now protected from working in factories. The question is, simply, whether children of such tender age ought not to be protected by law against the rapacity of their own parents? for the evidence before the House shows that such has been the lamentable neglect of education, and such the depravity of feeling, in some districts, that those who ought to be the natural guardians of the children, are the first to impose labour upon them beyond their strength. I do trust the House will never sanction the principle of children under nine years of age being tasked with the labour of a factory. As to what has been said with respect to steam and water mills, I will merely ask, what is the difference between steam and water, that we should not award an equal share of protection to the children who work in machinery moved by both powers? For my own part, I trust the shield of the law will be thrown alike over all.

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — I can corroborate the testimony of the Honourable Member for Leeds; but I think, if he takes into consideration the feeling which prevails throughout this House, an the impossibility of legislating in a different way for every branch of the trade that may put in its particular claims, he will not object to withdraw his amendment; and I am perfectly willing to take upon myself any responsibility that may arise from not dividing the House upon it.

The committee then divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause:" — Ayes 49; Noes 55; — Majority 6.

The clause, as amended, was then agreed to.

Clause 4. ("No child to be employed (except in silk factories) without a surgical certificate") agreed to, with amendment.

Clause 5. "Children not to work more than forty-eight hours weekly, or nine hours daily."

On the question being put, to leave out the words "not being a silk factory,"—

Mr. BROCKLEHURST said: — I move that the clause be postponed.

Mr. F. MAULE. — As the committee has affirmed the principle of this amendment in Clause 3., I think that we ought to make the rest of the Bill uniform.

Mr. P. THOMSON. — I take the liberty of putting it to my Honourable Friend, whether he will gain anything by postponing the clause? If he have good grounds to show the House why the decision to which they have lately come should be altered, he can propose an amendment at another stage.

Amendment accordingly withdrawn.

Question put, to fill up the blank with the words "forty-eight." — Agreed to.

On the question being put, to fill up the blank with the word "nine," —

Mr. BROCKLEHURST said: — I move, as an amendment, that the word "ten" be substituted for "nine."

Mr. F. MAULE. — The effect of that would be to make all children work for ten hours a-day, and I shall certainly oppose the amendment.

Mr. MARK PHILIPS. — It would open the whole question again.

Amendment withdrawn; Clause agreed to.

Clause 6. ("Children not to work more than ten hours daily in silk factories") struck out.

Clause 7. "Children not to be employed in more than one factory on the same day."

On this clause being put, —

LORD ASHLEY said: — I presume there will be no objection to add the provision, here, that no child shall work at night in any factory. It is perfectly clear, by the tenth clause, that such is the intention; but it may be as well to add the words here.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I think it would be better to allow this clause to stand as it is, and let the Noble Lord's object be effected by the tenth clause.

The clause was then agreed to.

Clause 8. ("No young person to work more than forty-eight hours weekly, or nine hours daily, without surgical certificate") — agreed to.

Clause 9. "Or more than sixty-nine hours weekly, or twelve hours daily."

On this clause being put, —

LORD ASHLEY said: — This will be, I think, the most favourable opportunity for me to move the amendment of which I have given notice. It is not my intention to detain the House long; for, at this period of the Session, and in the present state of the House, it would be almost impossible to sustain any lengthened debate on the subject; — nor could I hope to be supported by all those friends, for whose assistance I might have looked under more favourable circumstances. Nevertheless, I cannot find it in my heart to let this opportunity go by without asserting the principles which I have so long contended for, and stating the opinions which I have so long entertained. It is no new principle that I ask for; because the House, in the year 1816, assented to a Bill (which went through a first and second reading), wherein the hours of labour were limited to ten hours and a half. That Bill was introduced by the father of my Right Honourable Friend the Member for Tamworth, and would have gone up to the House of Lords but for the sudden and unexpected termination of the Session. But if ten hours and a half were then thought sufficient, how much more requisite is it to fix that as the limit, now, when it is notorious that labour has increased, and presses with tenfold severity on the operative classes? I attempted to reassert the same principle in 1832 and 1833. No change has yet been effected; yet the motives for introducing it, now, are doubly powerful, — looking to the great mass of evidence which has been collected with respect to the moral and physical evils endured, exhibiting an increase of suffering and mortality unprecedented in any other country. Let me point out the vast numbers of persons engaged in manufacturing labour. By a late Return it appeared that the population employed in these mills amounted to 419,590, — of which 242,296, or 57¾ per cent., were females. Between the age of 13 and 18, — the period to which my amendment extends, there were 98,174, — of whom 56,792 were females, being considerably more than half. Now, the age of 13 for a female is very critical; and with respect to their mental and moral improvement, Mr. Inspector Horner says, "I restricted myself to children of 13 and 14 years of age, who, by working twelve hours a-day, could have no time for their mental and moral improvement." Unless, therefore, the House are prepared to maintain that, after the age of 13, young women have nothing further to acquire in the way of mental, moral, and religious improvement, they must agree to my proposition to shorten their hours of labour, so as to afford them a better opportunity than they now enjoy for attaining some degree of education. I have often, in this House, heard expressions of an anxiety to limit the period of labour, provided that could be done with benefit to the working population; but the great obstacle to the limitation of labour in this country, it is constantly asserted, is, the existence of the corn laws. The corn laws, it is said, necessarily give rise to long hours of labour. But is it really so? Do we find shorter hours in other parts of the world, where no corn laws exist? Quite the reverse. I hold in my hand a series of Returns, from which Ministers, at least, cannot dissent, these having been furnished by their own officers, exposing the whole system of the cotton manufacture in all parts of Europe, as connected with the state of the handloom weavers in this country. The necessary inference from the data thus supplied, is, that the abolition of the corn laws, so far from abridging, would rather extend the hours of labour. What are the hours on the Continent, where no corn laws exist? In Argovia, the hours in the cotton mills are 12½; no children under 14 being admitted. In Zurich, the hours of actual labour are 13 per diem. In Austria, they vary from 15 to 17; and, with regard to Austria, I may observe that these same Gentlemen reported, that cries of complaint were heard from all parts of the empire, and there was reason to suppose that they had reached the ears of the Emperor, and a remedy would be applied shortly. Why, even in Mr. Kennedy's factories, in the Tyrol, the hours are from 13 to 14 a-day. In Alsace, 13 to 14; Lyons, 12 to 15; Normandy, 80 to 84 per week; Elbœuf, 13½ hours actual work; and in Belgium, always quoted as our greatest and most formidable rival, the hours are, generally, 13 daily; and at present — the Report is dated March, 1839 — they vary from 14 to 15, — the commissioners adding this most important statement, that "the cheapness of labour" in Belgium — which is held out to us in terrorem — "is overstated; and that while combinations are on the increase among foreign workmen, the rate of wages, &c. is approximating to the English." In no one of those countries do corn laws exist; and therefore it is impossible to maintain that there is any necessary connection between the corn laws and long hours of labour. But there is another country always held up as a very formidable rival — Prussia. What was the course lately adopted there? That great and good prince, who always takes the lead in everything which affects the welfare of his people, — the King of Prussia, — has lately issued an ordinance, limiting the hours of labour in the factories throughout his dominions to the period for which I have contended during so many years of my life — ten hours a-day. And with credit be it spoken of the master manufacturers of Elberfeldt, the proposition first came from them, in the shape of a petition to the King; who replied, that their prayer was so entirely in accordance with his own wishes, that he should certainly grant it; adding, however, that a principle so good should not be confined to one district, but should extend over the whole length and breadth of the kingdom. Sir, I do not wish to detain the House with details on this question; I will therefore content myself with resting my motion on the assertion that labour by children and persons of tender years, since 1816, when the House sanctioned the principle for which I contend, has greatly increased, bringing along with it a vast and alarming increase of suffering and mortality; and holding myself ready, if called on, to prove this statement by most indubitable authorities. At present, I will merely move that the blank in the clause be filled up by "fifty-eight," instead of "sixty-eight."

Mr. EWART.—I consider that the references of the Noble Lord to the corn law question were entirely fallacious, and that he has by no means given a satisfactory answer on that subject. About competition, the Noble Lord has said nothing; and I would merely ask him whether he gravely means to assert that, with cheap food, we could not better compete with foreign manufacturers? Still, I shall vote with the Noble Lord, in order to afford the female population, of a tender age, a better opportunity of obtaining mental and moral improvement.

LORD ASHLEY. — I am happy to put up with the scolding of the Honourable Gentleman, as I get his vote with it.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — The Noble Lord has attributed the disease and mortality that exist in the manufacturing towns, to excessive work. If the Noble Lord would go more deeply into the subject, he would find numerous other grounds, besides increased labour, for increased mortality. Mr. Horner describes the places of residence of the working classes as quite a sufficient cause for the increase of disease and mortality. Did it never occur to the Noble Lord to inquire whether the same disease and mortality prevail abroad as well as at home? or does the Noble Lord suppose that children born in Britain are less able to endure labour than the children of foreigners? If the committee give way to the proposition of the Noble Lord, they will most seriously endanger our competition in foreign markets with those who are already treading close upon our heels. The manufacturers of this country have to compete with foreigners, with whom the children are never worked below twelve hours and a half a day. As this subject has been so frequently discussed, I will not trouble the committee farther than to express a hope that they will reject the proposition of the Noble Lord.

Mr. VILLIERS STUART.—The Noble Lord has entirely misapprehended the argument about the corn laws. The Noble Lord said he saw no connection between long hours of labour and the corn laws. Why, the limitation of any exchangeable commodity produces a redundancy of labour, and renders it necessary that the labourer should work a greater number of hours to procure the necessary amount of food. The corn laws thus limit the field of labour in this country; and I believe that if those laws were repealed, the condition of the manufacturing labourer would be very much improved.

Mr. CAYLEY. — The real gist of this question has nothing to do with the corn laws. The medical and other evidence has proved that human nature at that age cannot possibly sustain itself under the circumstances in which it is placed. The question is one of humanity, and of humanity alone.

Mr. BAINES.—The Noble Lord seems to think that the manufacturers are in a condition to abate 20 per cent. of the labour of their workmen. I can assure the Noble Lord that neither the manufacturers nor the workmen are in a state to make such an abatement. The Noble Lord and others may talk of humanity, but such an abatement would be felt cruelly in every family and manufactory throughout the country. You must take off the corn laws, if you wish to abridge the hours of labour; but I can assure the committee, that if they carry the Noble Lord's proposition into effect, it will lead to the utter ruin of the manufacturer, and to the entire derangement of all manufacturing pursuits.

Mr. M. PHILIPS. — It appears to me that a worse opportunity could not be selected for bringing forward this question than the present, and for this reason:— Adverse circumstances have reduced the manufacturers to the necessity of working short time, without their being compelled by any legislative enactment to take that course; and I am sadly afraid, before many weeks are over, the condition of the labourer and of the manufacturer will be extremely deplorable. If you reduce the hours of labour, there must be a corresponding reduction in the remuneration given. I believe that many persons are misled in their advocacy of short hours of labour; and I am convinced that much misery would be the inevitable consequence of adopting such a system. It is perfectly impossible that the manufacturers can pay the wages they pay at present, if you lessen the amount of labour that is given for those wages. My own opinion is, that if you legislate on this subject upon the score of feelings merely, you will expose the manufacturing industry of this country to ruin. As a practical man, I feel compelled to bow to circumstances which cannot be controlled, and I must therefore vote against the Noble Lord's proposition.

Mr. BROTHERTON. — It appears to me, Sir, that human nature on the Continent is much the same as it is here. We are all anxious to get rich as fast as possible. It has been said, that if we were to abolish the corn laws, no legislation would be necessary with regard to factories; but I am of a different opinion. If you diminish the hours of labour, I admit that you will increase the price of production, unless wages be reduced; and the labourers in this country cannot at present bear any reduction in their incomes, without suffering severely. The labourers on the Continent have many advantages from the cheapness of articles of necessity; but here, if any tax is to be raised, you increase the labour of the manufacturers; and if you want to compete with foreigners, instead of reducing the price of bread, and other articles of consumption, you would increase the labour. My reason for voting for a reduction of the hours of labour is, that we may come to the point sooner. Taxation must be reduced, — the corn laws must be repealed, — the people must be made more happy and comfortable, and must have time to improve their minds. Do you believe that people are sent into this world to labour from the cradle to the grave, without any relaxation of any kind? I may be voting at the wrong end, but I trust that it will bring the question to an issue sooner.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — Sir, I should have been very glad if the Noble Lord had commenced his career of philanthropy by inducing his class to sacrifice their own individual interests, by giving the people cheaper bread. The corn laws are good for nothing to the landlords, if they do not make bread dear. But I merely rose to protest against that part of the speech of the Noble Lord, in which he eulogised the King of Prussia as a man of the finest feelings. Now, would the Noble Lord wish to see a king of this country lay hold of two archbishops? and how would the Noble Lord relish seeing one of these imprisoned in a fortress for two years, without trial or investigation? The Noble Lord would not eulogise any sovereign of this country, who should so treat the Archbishops of Canterbury and York. But there was no occasion at all to introduce the subject.

LORD ASHLEY. — If the Archbishops of Canterbury and York had acted as the two archbishops alluded to by the Honourable and Learned Member had done, I should have considered that they were treated precisely as they ought to be, if my Sovereign had followed the example of the King of Prussia.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — The sole crime of the two archbishops was — that of being quite consistent with their principles, and maintaining that discipline which it was their sworn duty to maintain. The conduct of the King of Prussia towards them was, therefore, doubly tyrannical.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Perhaps I may now be allowed to make one observation on the question itself. It seems to me that the Noble Lord has not answered the question put by my Honourable Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, — namely, whether, having reduced the hours of labour, the Noble Lord can provide at the same time that the same remuneration shall be given for the shortened hours of labour? Does the Noble Lord mean to carry his principle to the extent of fixing wages by law? or does he not? If he do mean to do so, the committee know, of course, the impossibility of adopting such a course; and if he do not, the committee must equally know, that whatever shortens the hours of labour, and, with the present high price of provisions, reduces the rate of wages, instead of being a proposition of humanity, would be a proposition of the greatest inhumanity. Therefore, as I think the proposition, if carried into effect, would be cruel in its operation, I must vote against it.

LORD ASHLEY. — There is nothing in my proposition which goes to the extent of defining the amount of wages. As to the question of the Honourable Member for Wolverhampton, I must say that I do not entertain the same apprehensions as that Honourable Gentleman; because, in 1818 and 1819, when the hours of labour were limited, precisely the same arguments were used. It was then said, that if we reduced the hours of labour, we must reduce the amount of wages, and thus occasion great consequent misery to the manufacturers. What was the result? The hours of labour were greatly reduced by the Bill of 1819; but were the wages reduced? Not in any one single respect. They continued at the same amount for four years afterwards, and were reduced from other causes. It was found, also, that the reduction of the hours did not lead to any diminution of production.

Mr. PEASE. — All practical men know that, when the hours of labour are shortened, the children are over-driven to keep up the amount of production.

Mr. SLANEY. — I regret, on this occasion, to be obliged to give my vote against the Noble Lord. The Noble Lord quotes an instance in which the hours of labour were reduced, yet no diminution took place in the receipts for wages; but then he ought to consider that the circumstances of that period and those of the present are very different. I feel bound to oppose the amendment.

Mr. JOHN FIELDEN. — If the Ten Hours' Bill of 1833 had been passed, the manufacturers would have been in a much better condition than they are at present.

The committee then divided on the question, "That the blank be filled with sixty-nine: — Ayes 94; Noes 62; — Majority 32.

the word "wholly," to insert the words, "or partially."

On the question being put, —

Mr. FOX MAULE said: — The effect of that would be, that there would be no end to the questions of loss that would arise.

Mr. JOHN FIELDEN. — I think this clause ought to be omitted altogether.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — There may, perhaps, be some difficulty as to this clause; still, I do not think there is any justice in making the proprietor of the factory suffer for what he cannot control. If the proprietor could control the course of the water, and regulate the flood, I should say this clause ought to be omitted. I, however, do not see the necessity for the introduction of the word "partially," as proposed.

LORD STANLEY. — The Honourable Gentleman admits, that where there is a stoppage of water which prevents the working of the machinery, — the machinery being moved wholly by water power, — the proprietor ought to have the lost time made up to him: then, why should he not be equally entitled to compensation when a stoppage takes place in his machinery — if he have a small steam engine to assist the water power?

Mr. AGLIONBY. — You say it is not just to punish the manufacturer for that which is the fault of the elements; then, where is the justice of punishing the child? The principle on which this Bill proceeds, is, that the working hours in each week shall be limited to forty-eight; but this clause provides that the child shall be employed to make up that loss, which is not occasioned by him, by working fifty-one hours in the week. That is a deviation from the principle on which the Bill proceeds.

Mr. GOULBURN. — As the clause now stands, the lost time can only be recovered at the rate of three hours a-week, — and it is to provide against a casualty that will but seldom occur. I do not think it can with reason be objected to.

LORD STANLEY. — I would add, too, that although the week's work may be increased by three hours, the maximum of labour in each day will be the same. The only difference will be this, — that instead of working three hours on the Saturday, the children will be liable to work during six hours on that day till the lost time shall have been made up.

Clause 12. "One hour and a half shall be allowed for meal times."

On this clause being put, —

Mr. WAKLEY said: — I have to move in this clause, That instead of "no child or young person shall be employed more than six hours in any one day without an interval for meal time of at least thirty minutes," the words "children or young persons" be substituted.

Agreed to.

Mr. HINDLEY. — I have an amendment to move, — namely, That in addition to the words "and during meal time no child or young person shall be employed or allowed to remain in any room in which any machinery is in motion," the words "at any time" be inserted; to stand, "any machinery is at any time in motion."

Question put, "That the words 'at any time' be there inserted."

Digitized by Google

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I do not see the ground for this amendment. I should say, it would be a great convenience to the children, to allow them to take their meals in the factory when the machinery was not in motion.

Mr. W. PATTEN. — I look on this provision for allowing children to take their meals in the mill in which they are employed, when the machinery is not in motion, as most humane. If they had a distance to walk, the whole of their time would be consumed in walking.

LORD ASHLEY. — It is absolutely necessary that the children should be removed from the place where the machinery is employed, or they would be worked at the machinery the whole of meal times.

Mr. M. PHILIPS. — There are many factories which do not possess any outhouses or rooms unoccupied, where the children could go to; and the effect of such a provision would be, to turn them out into the snow, for instance, in an inclement winter, to get their meals.

The committee then divided: — Ayes 46; Noes 109; — Majority against the amendment 63.

Clause 13. "Eight half holidays to be allowed in the year."

Mr. M. PHILIPS. — I do not clearly understand the clause as it now stands; I think it should be made more distinct, and would suggest to it, — as an amendment, — to omit the word "and," at the latter part of the clause, and instead of the words "and that in England and Ireland no child or young person shall be allowed to work in a factory on Christmas-day or Good Friday," to insert, "that in addition to such eight half days no child or young person shall be allowed to work in any factory," &c.

Amendment put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 14. "Children to attend school. Occupier of every factory entitled to deduct not more than in each week from the wages of the child, towards payment of the schooling of such child."

Mr. FOX MAULE.—I propose to fill up the blank with the words "threepence."

LORD ASHLEY.—Threepence a-week is too much to deduct from the wages of the child. I think one penny would be quite sufficient.

Mr. M. PHILIPS.—There are many of the manufacturers, who will provide and support schools of their own for the education of the children employed by them; but there are many of the smaller masters, who will not be enabled to do this; and so, recollecting that the Government assistance may not be extended to schools in the neighbourhood of these factories, we have to consider whether, by proposing so small a sum as one penny per week, we should not materially interfere with the education of the children?

Mr. HODGSON HINDE.—I shall certainly object to threepence. At present the charge to the child is, in most cases, one penny a-week—another penny being made up by contributions in the neighbourhood; and the twopence a-week, so obtained, is generally found to be sufficient for the purpose.

Mr. FOX MAULE.—I believe that, in very many cases, threepence a-week will be no more than is necessary. I should, therefore, prefer to fill up the blank with that sum.

Mr. FRESHFIELD.—I think twopence is quite as much as will be required in any case, and I must object to a larger sum being deducted from the child's wages for this purpose. Twopence a-week is what is usually charged in such schools for the whole day's schooling; and in this case the children will attend but two hours each day.

Question put, "That the blank be filled up with 'threepence.'"

The blank was then filled up with "twopence;" and the clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 15. "Certificate of attendance at schools required."

Clause 16. "How children absenting themselves from schools may be employed."

Severally put, and agreed to.

Clause 17. "Inspectors may declare schoolmasters incompetent."

Upon this clause being put, —

Mr. COLQUHOUN said:—This clause provides that no school certificate shall be valid, which shall be given by any person who shall have been declared by an inspector unfit to teach children, or whose school shall have been declared by the inspector unfit to be used as a school. But you have, here, no guarantee as to the kind of education that will be afforded in these schools. What security have we that the instruction, to be given, will have the slightest complexion of religion? None, except the opinions of these four inspectors. I think it would be even better to leave this matter of the education of the children to their parents and guardians, than to the inspectors. Considering that you ought to have some guarantee in this case, I shall move that that part of the clause which confers this power on the inspectors be expunged — that is, all the words from the word "enacted" to the word "that," in page 5. line 1.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out, stand part of the clause."

Mr. FOX MAULE. — If the Honourable Member had taken the trouble to read the Report of the inspectors of factories on the subject of schools, he would have known that this clause was a very considerable improvement on the existing system. Under the present law, all that is required is, that the child should produce a certificate of having attended some school. It is the object of the parents or guardians to get the schooling in the cheapest manner they can; and they generally care very little about the education, provided they can get the certificate of attendance; and it very often happens that those who teach the factory children, are, themselves, utterly incapable of comprehending the instruction they profess to administer. The only means that we have within our reach, to see that the schools be well ordered, is to give to the inspector the power of saying whether the schoolmaster is or is not fit to discharge his duties — those duties being merely to give instruction in reading and writing. This is all the education that is given to the child during five days of the week; the religious instruction which they derive, is usually given on the Sunday at the Sunday school, at which almost all of them attend. I admit that it would not injure the principle of the Bill to exclude this clause; but still I think it a useful clause, and I shall therefore retain it.

LORD STANLEY. — I regret the power that this Bill confers on the inspectors; and on no account do I regret it, more, than on this — of the schools; for, although the gentlemen appointed to that situation may be excellent inspectors, I cannot suppose that they are the most fitting persons to be intrusted with the superintendence of the schools. But, suppose there be but one school within a reasonable distance, and that that be objected to by the inspector; look at the position in which you place the millowner. If he neglect to send the children to school, he is liable to a penalty; and if he do send them, he is equally liable for sending them to a school which the inspector will not certify. Suppose the inspector should have a grudge against the schoolmaster, he might say, "I do not think this man qualified to keep a school, therefore I will not grant a certificate." What, in this case, is the millowner to do? and what is the schoolmaster to do, when you thus take away his character, and pronounce him incompetent in the profession he follows? You must look at the case thus; — the school is not confined to the instruction of the children employed in the factory, — it is open to all; and the schoolmaster's means of living depends upon his keeping up his character in the neighbourhood. And do you mean to tell me that it is just to deprive the man of his daily bread upon the mere ipse dixit of a factory inspector, who shall declare him incompetent to teach? I am sure, when the House consider the effect of this, they will never consent to place a power in the hands of any man, by which, upon his own mere word, he may ruin another. The Honourable Gentleman (Mr. F. Maule) admits that this clause does not affect the principle of the Bill. I trust, therefore, that he will not press it, when I show him that it may be made subservient to favouritism and ill-feeling.

Mr. POULETT THOMSON. — An extreme case, like that the Noble Lord has put, might be urged against the adoption of any plan. Undoubtedly, the inspector might act in the way the Noble Lord has stated; but is it at all likely that he would do so,— especially when it is considered that there is a remedy against him, by complaining of his conduct? Then, Sir, is there any remedy suggested by those who object to this clause, to the evils described in the inspectors' Report? For my own part, I am satisfied, that if this clause were omitted, the children employed in factories would, in many cases, go uneducated. The Honourable Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Colquhoun) says he would rather leave the education with the parents. But their only object is to get the children into the mill as speedily as possible; they will take no interest in the establishment or conduct of schools. All they would care for would be, how to obtain the certificate of attendance with the least trouble. I admit that there is a power given by this clause that might be abused; but I think the probability of abuse is not to be compared with the disadvantages that would result from the omission of this clause; for if the clause were expunged, the other education clauses of the Bill would be perfectly useless, and the children would be deprived of the benefit of education.

LORD STANLEY. — The case I put, is that of a factory, in the neighbourhood of which there is but one school; and this declared by the inspector unfit. How would the Honourable Gentleman obviate that difficulty?

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I will introduce words to meet it.

LORD TEIGNMOUTH. — I have paid considerable attention to the Report of the committee; and the conclusion I have arrived at is, that the present system is working extremely ill, and is tending to retard, rather than promote, education among the factory children; and I believe that this attempt to bolster up that system will entirely fail. To show the sort of education which will be taught in those schools, under the superintendence of the inspectors, I will refer to the report of Mr. Horner, — one of the factory inspectors, — a gentleman who has been highly, and, I have no doubt, most deservedly eulogised; and to the result of my own observation. Mr. Horner, in speaking of the schools, alludes particularly to that kept by Mr. MacConner, and singles that out as the best. He says, in that school, the children are not only trained in habits of religion and morality, but of good order and breeding; while, at the same time, there is a sort of special instruction in religion by which the children are instructed, generally, without interfering with the religious feelings of their parents. Now, I, in company with a clergyman of the established church, paid a visit to this same school; and we found, certainly, that so far as a secular education went, the children were well taught, but religious instruction appeared to be altogether lost sight of. Upon inquiry, we were told that the New Testament was not introduced, because some of the scholars were Socialists. In another school, I found that the New Testament was not used, because there were Roman Catholics in the school; and in one instance, there was neither Bible nor Testament in the school. Such is the system of instruction carried on in the schools, which have been so complimented by Mr. Hornet. I say, that any man who will read the Report now on the table, and consider it impartially, must come to the conclusion that the existing system is defective at the root; and that, by giving grants to continue that system, you are only bringing upon yourselves a still heavier responsibility than that you have already incurred, by introducing an irreligious and unconstitutional system of education in this country, — a system which is fit only for Prussia or Massachusetts. If you were to introduce a good national system of education, based upon the principles of the Church of England, and supported at a moderate expense by grants voted in a constitutional manner, you would attract the children to your schools, and you would find the millowners ready to co-operate with you; but in this attempt to bolster up that which is a most defective system, I am quite sure you will experience only failure and disappointment.

Mr. LANGDALE. — As the clause stands, I confess that I am not very favourable to it. I think it is not sufficient for the inspector to say, in general terms, "I object to such a school, or to such a schoolmaster," without stating the precise nature of his objection. I should wish, therefore, if the clause is to remain, to see some limit placed upon the power of the inspector, in this respect. I think the least that should be required of him would be, to give a written notice to the master or mistress of the school, stating precisely the nature of the objection he entertains; and, if the clause should be carried, I shall move a proviso to that effect.

Mr. GROTE. — Although I do not think that the amendment suggested by my Honourable Friend the Member for Knaresborough would materially change its effect, I trust the House will not be induced to abandon the clause as it stands; for, in my opinion, this is one of the most salutary provisions in the whole Bill. The principle of this clause is not new, for, by the 23d section of the existing Factory Act it is provided — that if, on any examination or inquiry, it should appear to the inspector that the master or mistress of any school is unfit to instruct the children, he may then make an order for withholding their salaries. I am aware that this clause has been, in a great degree, nugatory in practice, because the schools have not been generally established; but the principle of making the inspector the judge of the schoolmaster's capability for the office, was distinctly admitted in that Act. I am quite sure that no person can read the Report which has been laid before the House, without admitting that some supervision over the schoolmasters is necessary. Then, where will you turn for it, if not to the inspectors, who are constantly overlooking the district for other purposes, and who must be the best acquainted with the circumstances of every case? To whom else would you consign the duty? By the returns which have been made to the House by the inspectors, it is clearly established that the education now given to the children employed in factories, is, in the majority of cases, merely nominal, on account of the inefficiency of the schoolmasters by whom it is administered. This is an evil which the power conferred on the inspector, by this clause, is calculated to remedy. I admit that there is some chance of abuse: but I must choose the lesser of the two evils; and I have no hesitation in saying that this power, which it is now proposed to give to the inspectors, is as little likely to be abused as any power which we are capable of conferring, and for this reason, — there would be no temptation to the inspector to exercise it improperly.

Mr. DARBY. — The Honourable Under Secretary of State (Mr. Fox Maule) has by no means answered the objection as to the power of these inspectors. They are irresponsible.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — They must report.

Mr. DARBY. — But suppose they should ruin a schoolmaster by pronouncing him incompetent, and then report that they had done so; — what would that be in the way of responsibility? I believe that no Honourable Gentleman present will say that reading, writing, and ciphering are all that should be taught the children in the schools, — no one will say that religious instruction ought to be altogether excluded; — and yet it will be in the power of these inspectors to pronounce that reading, writing, and ciphering are all that is necessary to be taught.

Mr. POULETT THOMSON. — I would call the attention of the committee to what is the present state of the law. Under the existing Act, the inspector may, if he think the schoolmaster or schoolmistress incompetent to teach the children, disallow the order for payment of the salary, — which amounts to pretty much the same thing as keeping the children from the school. The Noble Lord has referred to the school of Mr. MacConnell; and knowing him as well as I do, the Noble Lord will excuse me for saying that I think he is, in some way, mistaken in the statement he has made.

The committee then divided: — Ayes 67; Noes 58; — Majority 14.

Mr. REDINGTON. — I move that a proviso be inserted in the clause, declaring, that in any case where the inspector declares a schoolmaster to be incompetent, he shall furnish, in writing, to such schoolmaster, the grounds upon which he so pronounces him to be incompetent.

Mr. BAINES. — Should we not, by inserting such a proviso, subject the inspector to the same inconvenience to which the House itself has been recently subjected, — that is, should we not leave him open to an action at law for publishing a libel?

LORD STANLEY. — Admitting the force of the objection of the Honourable Member, it would apply equally to the former part of the clause, by which the inspector has to make a declaration of the incompetency of the schoolmaster.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — I think I may venture to assure the House that no such proceedings as those referred to would be successful, even in the Court of Queen's Bench; although, after what has recently taken place, I certainly feel some diffidence in advising upon what the decision of that court would be upon the subject.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — I conceive that the communications of the inspectors would be privileged, as being directed to be made by Act of Parliament.

The proviso was then put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. DARBY. — I move, Sir, that you do now report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Upon the question being put, —

LORD J. RUSSELL said: — I trust that the committee will proceed with the remaining clauses respecting education? I certainly shall feel it to be my duty to resist the proposition of the Honourable Member.

LORD STANLEY. — I cannot understand why my Noble Friend cannot as well consent to the Chairman's reporting progress, now, as after these clauses. The next clause will take some time to discuss, as several Honourable Gentleman have amendments to propose in it, and, I believe, the sense of the committee will be taken upon it; and as we have, now, been sitting in the committee from half past five o'clock to nearly one, I do not think it at all unreasonable to propose the adjournment till to-morrow.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I do not conceive that there will be any lengthened discussion on these clauses, after the time the last clause has engaged the attention of the committee. If we now adjourn, the whole subject of education will be reopened the next time we go into committee.

LORD ASHLEY. — Many Honourable Gentlemen on this side of the House, and myself among the number, have now been sitting here eight hours, and have had no opportunity of leaving, in order to obtain refreshment. I therefore do not think that the motion for adjournment is at all unreasonable.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I have been frequently charged, by the Noble Lord, and other Honourable Members, with unnecessary delay in regard to this Bill; and it has even been insinuated that I as actuated by sinister motives with respect to it. Now, although I have often had similar charges thrown out against me, it can hardly be expected that I should be altogether indifferent to such accusations; therefore, I am anxious to embrace the opportunity now offered, to proceed with the consideration of the remaining clauses, or, at least, of those clauses which relate to that part of the subject we have been discussing.

[Cries of "Divide!"]

At all events, it will be seen that it is not the Government that is to be charged with delaying the progress of the public business.

LORD ASHLEY. — I would remind the Noble Lord that there is a vast difference between postponing a Bill from the 14th of February till the 1st of July, and only postponing the further consideration of it, after eight hours' sitting, till the following day.

The committee then divided upon the question, "That the Chairman do now report progress, and ask leave to sit again:" — Ayes 34; Noes 49; — Majority 15.

INLAND WAREHOUSING.

Bill, "for the Warehousing of Foreign Goods at Inland Towns," presented, and read a first time; to be read a second time on Friday, and to be printed.

TOWN COUNCILS.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I rise, Sir, to ask for leave to bring in a Bill for giving additional powers to the councils of corporate towns. Under the present law, the town councils can only tax themselves for particular purposes; but there are many other purposes for which it is very desirable that funds should be raised by local taxation — such, for instance, as the building of a town hall, providing fire engines, and other similar objects. This additional power it is proposed to confer by the present measure.

Question put, and agreed to; Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Fox Maule and Lord J. Russell.

CATHEDRAL AND ECCLESIASTICAL PREFERMENT BILL.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I rise to move for leave to bring in a Bill for further suspending certain cathedral and other ecclesiastical preferments, and the operation of the new arrangement of dioceses upon the existing ecclesiastical courts. As I stated the other evening, it is not my intention to proceed further, this Session, with the Ecclesiastical Duties and Revenues Bill, and therefore it is necessary to continue the Act now in force for the suspension of ecclesiastical appointments for another year. There will be some slight alterations from the present Act, in the Bill I now propose to introduce. It is proposed to give power, in certain cases, to renew leases,—the want of this power being, at present, greatly complained of; and power is, therefore, given, where there are vacancies in ecclesiastical preferments, to dispose of them, on the same principle as was intended by the Revenues Bill. Thus, if there be two vacancies in the dignitaries of the cathedral of Canterbury, and another vacancy should occur, we propose that the third vacancy shall be filled up.

Question put, and agreed to; Bill ordered to be brought in by Lord John Russell and the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — The Bills of Exchange Bill, which was passed by this House, and sent up to the House of Lords, has been returned with certain amendments, which will render other amendments necessary on the part of this House. I have therefore thought it better to introduce an entirely new Bill, embodying the wishes of both Houses, than to adhere to such a piece of patchwork as the Bill would be if the alterations of both Houses were inserted. It is, however, my desire that both Bills should be before the House at the same time, so that Honourable Gentleman may judge between them. I will now move for leave to bring in a Bill "to amend and extend the Provisions of an Act of the first Year of her present Majesty, for exempting certain Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes from the Operation of the Laws relating to Usury."

Question put, and agreed to; Bill ordered to be brought in by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Mr. Baring.

Bill subsequently presented, and read a first time; to be read a second time on Wednesday, and to be printed.

BANK OF IRELAND.

JAMAICA BILL.

On the Order of the Day for the House going into committee on this Bill being read, —

LORD LYNDHURST said: — It is my intention to move that the first clause of this Bill be expunged. In stating this intention to your Lordships, it is necessary that I should declare the grounds on which I propose such an amendment; and I must, therefore, though not at any great length, enter into some exposition of my views on this most important subject. I think it appears from the Bill which was brought into the other House of Parliament, and afterwards abandoned, — from the speech of the Noble Marquess opposite last evening, — from the spirit and general tone of his address, — and also from the speech of the Noble Viscount opposite, — that there is a disposition on the part of her Majesty's Government, if possible, to abolish the Legislative Assembly of Jamaica, and to substitute a new form of government in lieu of that which has existed in that island for nearly 200 years. A similar attempt was made in the arbitrary reign of Charles II., and was defeated. That attempt has been repeated by the Liberal Government of the present day. Up to this time these efforts have been fruitless; but I assure your Lordships that, if this Bill be adopted by you, that will be accomplished by a side wind, which the Ministers have been unable to carry by an open and direct attack on the Legislative Assembly of Jamaica. I do not, for a moment, deny that your Lordships have power to pass laws for the government of Jamaica. I do not dispute that you have the right, in cases of emergency, — in cases of extreme necessity, — to pass such laws; but I say this; — that you have no right whatever to pass laws for the internal regulation of the affairs of Jamaica, or of any other colony, except in the cases I have cited, — namely, in cases of extreme exigency. That doctrine has been always held by all statesmen who have given an opinion on this subject, and for the plainest of all possible reasons, — which is, that our colonies are not represented in the Imperial Parliament. Your Lordships, therefore, have no right to pass laws for the internal regulation of this colony. The Legislative Assembly of Jamaica have, as it appears to me, been most unjustly treated in every part of this transaction. If I look to the preamble of the Bill, I see, there, reasons assigned why your Lordships are called upon to pass this measure; but that preamble is not properly and correctly worded. It is stated in the preamble, that the House of Assembly have refused to exercise their legislative functions except for passing Bills of Supply. That is laid down without any qualification; the position is unlimited in point of time; there is no condition attached to it. That is not the effect of the resolution passed by the House of Assembly: that resolution is of a different character. It declares, that they will not exercise their legislative functions, except as to Bills of Supply, unless they have the free enjoyment of their rights as British subjects. It is quite clear that they have a ground of complaint; that they call for redress; and it is quite clear, too, that, if that complaint had been attended to, — if they had been assured, in conciliatory language, that what had been done up to that time should not be made a precedent in future, — that which has taken place would not have occurred, but that they would have resumed their functions. I do not stand, here, to justify the resolution of the House of Assembly, — I think it is most reprehensible; but I cannot help recollecting that, on a former occasion, when their rights were infringed, precisely the same course was adopted by their predecessors, — and that course led to the grievances which have since taken place.

There is another circumstance which I could notice, arising out of what fell from the Noble Marquess yesterday, — I mean his allusion to the protest which was passed by the Legislative Assembly. I think that, considering the circumstances under which that protest was made, it ought not to have been insisted and descanted on so much, and at such length, by the Noble Marquess. There is no person who condemns more strongly than I do the insulting language used in that document; but I do not think it fair for the Noble Marquess to appeal to that document with a view of exciting in your Lordships a feeling against the Assembly, on a subject that is totally unconnected with it. Let me be allowed to remind your Lordships, that that protest was adopted at the close of the Session, when a great number of the Members of the House of Assembly had gone to their respective homes — when, indeed, there were only twelve Members remaining at Kingston. That protest was the act of those twelve Members; it was drawn up by them; and I understand it was disapproved of, and condemned, by the great body of the Assembly. I am aware that that fact was known to the colonial officials immediately after the document arrived there; and I therefore think it most unjust to rely on that document so much, and to descant on it at such length, as the Noble Marquess has done, without, at the same time, offering that explanation which I have just given. Another circumstance is this;—that protest was made and adopted long before the measure which gave rise to the resolution was passed: it was long before the Prisons Bill was enacted, and of course long before that Bill could be known in Jamaica; yet to the effects of that Prisons Bill, and the consequences resulting from it, is the resolution to be referred. What has been the foundation of the Bill now before your Lordships? The protest, I have shown, had no connection at all with the transaction. With respect to the Prisons Bill, I must say that another attempt has been made, calculated to excite a prejudice — an unfounded prejudice; and that is, the connecting the Prisons Bill with the abolition of slavery. This measure has nothing to do with the abolition of slavery; it is a mere transcript of the Bill that was in your Lordships' House in the year 1835, and the whole of which was adapted to a state of freedom. When we are talking of the conduct of the Legislative Assembly of Jamaica, let me remind your Lordships of this circumstance: — The Prisons Bill consists of only three clauses. The first clause gives to the Governor and Council the power of laying down rules and adopting regulations for the management of the gaols in the island; the second clause gives the Governor and Council the power of appointing inspectors of the gaols; and the third clause gives them the power either to visit or to appoint persons to visit, on special occasions, the gaols of the colony. Those are the three several provisions of the Bill. Under the first provision, the Governor and Council may adopt such regulations, and lay down such orders and rules, for managing the gaols, as they think fit; and it is remarkable that the Governor and Council have adopted precisely those rules and regulations which form a part of the Colonial Bill of 1834. It is only in some very slight and trivial circumstances that they have differed from those rules, and have not offered to violate that Act to which I refer. Again, the Governor has the power of appointing inspectors under the former Bill. If he think fit to exercise that power, that power is vested in him by the Bill of 1834. That I distinctly assert. Whom have the Governor and Council appointed as inspectors? The stipendiary magistrates. Those stipendiary magistrates are local magistrates, and therefore the power is within the Bill of 1834. Again, under the Bill of 1834, the Governor has the same power which he has under the English Bill to visit the gaols of the colony, or to appoint any person to do so, whenever he may think proper to exercise such power. All the power of the English Bill was previously in the possession of the Governor and Council under the Bill of 1834, in the case of his choosing to exert it. That I distinctly and positively assert. Now, we, on my side of the House, are charged with having taken an active part in the Prisons Bill. I admit that charge to be well founded. I was in the House when the Bill was introduced; but I took no part in the discussion of it, and did not oppose it — and why? Because I was not, then, aware of the circumstances under which it was introduced; because I was not acquainted with those facts which now appear in the papers on your Lordships' table, nor was I in possession of that information which I have since derived from other sources, and of which, if I had been apprised at that time, I should have not only not been silent, but should have given to that measure my most warm, zealous, and determined opposition.

With regard to the House of Assembly not resuming their legislative functions, the Noble Marquess expressed great surprise, last night, on the subject; but I think that there is not the slightest imputation resting on the Legislative House of Assembly, on that account. With respect to that, I say they have done all they could be expected to do. It is not my intention to go through all the arguments brought forward by counsel at your Lordships' bar; but I will allude to a few circumstances connected with this case, to prove that what was stated by the learned counsel at your bar, was correct, and that he cannot be impeached for stating anything which was not well founded. In the year 1834, the attention of the House of Assembly was called to the subject of prisons. They presented an Address to the Marquess of Sligo, the then Governor of the colony, telling him that they would direct their attention to the subject immediately. They fulfilled that pledge, by appointing a committee to consider the matter. That committee prepared a Bill, which was passed that Session, and which was at once pronounced by the Marquess of Sligo, himself, to be a most beneficial measure. That was the first step. What followed? The Marquess of Sligo, soon after, informed the House of Assembly that in some parishes the Bill could not be carried into operation from want of funds. Another inquiry was then instituted; and the result was, that a sum of 42,000*l.* was voted by the Assembly in aid of the parochial expenditure for the purposes of the Bill. But that was not all. The Assembly evinced its disposition to carry out the principle of the Bill by a readiness to pass any subsidiary Act to promote that object. Can it, then, let me ask — can it, in fairness — be objected to the House of Assembly, that it has given no attention to the improvement of prison discipline, because its first attempts on the subject were in some points defective? Your Lordships, in this House, have been engaged for a period, now, of thirty years on a similar course of proceedings with respect to the prisons of this country, and I believe it cannot yet be said that your system has been brought to perfection. The Assembly has done all in its power, — all, in fact, that could be done within the time during which its attention has been directed to the matter: when some imperfections in its first Bill were pointed out, it did its utmost, to remove them, by passing subsidiary Acts. This was in 1834. In 1835, the Marquess of Sligo informed the Assembly that the Bill was still imperfect. Another committee was then appointed to enter into further inquiries. The Noble Marquess caused to be laid before the Assembly a copy of a despatch which had been received from the Colonial Office, together with the copy of an Act of the Imperial Parliament for effecting greater uniformity of practice in the government of the several prisons of England and Wales, and for appointing inspectors of prisons in Great Britain, and three Reports from the committee of the House of Lords appointed to inquire into the state of the several gaols and houses of correction; but in eight days from that time, and before any progress could be made in the inquiry, the House of Assembly was prorogued, on the 3d of February, 1836,—the message of the Governor having been sent down only on the 26th of the January preceding. Was it the fault of the Assembly that this prorogation took place? No; it was the fault of the Marquess of Sligo himself. It appears that Governors can commit errors as well as Houses of Assembly; for the Marquess of Sligo was, himself, on three distinct occasions, guilty of a flagrant violation of the privileges of the House. The Assembly met again in the following year; when the Governor, having received instructions to that effect from the Government at home, made that reparation to the Assembly, for the breach of privilege he had committed, which the Assembly deemed sufficient. This was in 1836. I now come to 1837, which brings me to the most important part of the case. Sir Lionel Smith, who was then Governor, directed the attention of the Assembly to the views of her Majesty's Government respecting the introduction into the island of an improved system of prison discipline. A committee was soon after appointed to consider the message of the Governor, and also some regulations which had been laid before the House relating to treadmill punishments. Now, what course did the committee take? In the message from the Governor it was stated, that "Returns connected with this subject (prison discipline) have been called for from the different parishes, which, when prepared and condensed, will be duly submitted to the House." That was not done. Sir L. Smith did not redeem that pledge. Here, then, is a committee appointed by the Assembly to consider the subject recommended to its attention by the Governor, himself; he promises that certain documents, deemed, no doubt, of importance, shall be laid before the committee; but that promise is not kept. How, then, let me again ask, can any delay in the matter be said to be the fault of the Assembly? But more than this, — in the message of the Governor, to which I have just called the attention of your Lordships, there was the following passage, given as the concluding one of a despatch from Lord Glenelg: —

The present Act (the Negro Apprenticeship) will expire in the year 1840; and at that period, if not before, it will devolve upon you to give your most serious consideration to the improvements which may be introduced into it.

From this extract it would appear that the Colonial Office did not expect that any Act on this subject should be immediately prepared by the Assembly. The committee, however, went on with its inquiries; and while thus engaged, and at no long time subsequently to its appointment, Captain Pringle arrived in Jamaica, as a commissioner appointed by her Majesty's Government for the inspection of prisons in the West Indies, — to make such inquiries into the actual state of the prisons in those islands, and to suggest such improvements, as might lay the foundation of a better system of prison discipline. On the arrival of this gentleman, and for such a purpose, it would, and did, naturally occur to the committee, that they could not well proceed to prepare a Bill on the subject until they should have before them Captain Pringle's Report; but that gentleman returned to England without having made any. His Report was drawn up and laid before the Government, here, but no copy of it was sent out to the House of Assembly. In the mean time, the committee were waiting for that information on the subject which they had a right to expect would be laid before them; but, to show the disposition of the local authorities to remedy defects already admitted to exist, there were two parishes in the island in which the prisons were condemned, and funds were voted by the vestry for new buildings. The plans of the intended prisons in these two places were submitted to Captain Pringle, and his opinion was requested respecting them; and what was his answer, as stated in his Report? —

I suggested postponing the expenditure of so much money until the plans approved, for the construction of new prisons in England, could be forwarded, — or until some general system was adopted.

Why, then, I will once more ask, should blame be thrown on the committee, or on the House of Assembly, for not doing that for which due means had not been afforded to them? Yet, notwithstanding this neglect on the part of the Government, the committee did apply itself to the consideration of such communications as had been laid before it; and the chairman was preparing part of a Bill which it was the intention of the committee to recommend to the House, when, to the astonishment of everybody, the Prisons Bill, which in the interim had passed the Imperial Parliament, arrived in that island. This was an Act interfering with the internal affairs of the colony, — and, as such, Parliament had no right to pass it. It was an encroachment, unwarranted by the facts, on the privileges of the House of Assembly, which, for all purposes of internal arrangement, was, and ought to be, independent. Can your Lordships be surprised, then, after such an encroachment on its rights and privileges, — knowing, as you do, what has been done by the best constituted popular assemblies when they have found their privileges violated, — can you be surprised that, under such circumstances as I have stated, the House of Assembly of Jamaica should have passed the resolution so often referred to? I repeat, that I do not stand here to defend that resolution; but I think that, looking at all that has taken place, it affords no slight palliation for the course pursued by the Assembly. But this was not all: the Government not only invaded the privileges of the Assembly, — it added insult to injury. The Prisons Bill arrived out in Jamaica in September, but was not published till about the end of November, — a period of nearly three months. No communication was made to the Assembly, — no explanation offered of the course pursued by Government. What a contrast was here, between the conduct of the Governor of Jamaica and that of the Governor of Barbadoes, though both were placed, as regards the Prisons Bill, in the same circumstances! That Bill was sent out to Barbadoes, accompanied by a most conciliatory despatch from Lord Glenelg, and was communicated to the Assembly by a most conciliatory message from the Governor. These facts became known in Jamaica; and it was naturally expected by the House of Assembly that they would have the same courtesy extended to them; — but nothing of the kind. The law was passed in England; it arrived out in the colony; and the Assembly were left to find the facts out as any private individuals might do. Are not these circumstances which ought to remove from the minds of your Lordships any surprise at the subsequent course taken by the Assembly? But it is said that this law, and the regulations it enjoins, are necessary under the great political and social change which has recently taken place in the condition of the great mass of the population in the colony; and that the Assembly will not pass such laws for the benefit of the negro population as that change demands. What right, let me ask, have the advocates of the Bill before your Lordships to assume that the Assembly will not pass such laws? Has the Governor, or the Government at home, tried them? Has any message been sent to the House of Assembly, to know whether they will or will not pass the required laws? Oh! but Sir Lionel Smith has declared that he thinks they will not. If they have not had the opportunity given to pass the required measures, they are the advocates of the Bill, and not the Assembly, who are the wrongdoers. But what reason have the promoters of this Bill for believing, or for saying, that the Assembly will not pass the necessary laws? They have already, by their own voluntary act, passed a Bill for abolishing negro apprenticeship: to be sure, that may be said to be only a choice of difficulties; but still it was the voluntary act of the Assembly; and the Governor, Sir Lionel Smith, thanked them for their conduct on that occasion. I will maintain, then, that when this was done by their own voluntary act, the supporters of this Bill have no right to assume that they will not consent to other measures, which the altered circumstances of the colony may require. Let me for a moment recal to the recollection of your Lordships what was the language of Sir Lionel Smith, himself, addressed to this same House of Assembly, when he had not been more than about a year in the government of the colony. Speaking of their conduct during a protracted Session, he thus observes: —

I acknowledge, with great pleasure, the ready attention you have bestowed on all my communications; and the adoption of the suggestion for classing the apprenticed population under legal enactment will, I think, fully provide for the contemplated emergency. In bearing my testimony to the zeal with which you have applied yourselves to the public business, I cannot omit expressing the gratification I have experienced at the good understanding which has been apparent in all your proceedings, during a Session of unusual duration. I attach the greatest importance to the continuance of this feeling, which it will be the constant endeavour of my administration to promote.

I use this as an example — by no means the most striking that could have been selected — of the approving language that has been addressed to the Assembly, as well by the Marquess of Sligo as by Sir Lionel Smith, — two authorities by no means prejudiced in favour of the Assembly. Why do I press these arguments on the attention of your Lordships? Is it because I object to the whole Bill? No; my objection goes only to a part of it; — but it is to that part, by which it is sought to give to the Governor and Council the arbitrary power of passing Acts which shall be binding on the whole colony, and to take the power of legislation from the three branches of the Government to vest it in the two. The laws to be enacted will be without the power of repeal by the Assembly. How would the matter stand, then, if this Bill should pass into a law? Suppose the House of Assembly and the Governor and Council do not agree upon the passing of a particular Act before the 1st day of October, or any day that might be fixed by this Bill; — then, in that case, the Governor and Council are to be empowered to pass a law on the subject, which shall have all the force of a law passed by the three united branches. Now, suppose the Assembly to have, after mature and bonâ fide consideration, passed a Bill which, in their opinion, will be beneficial to the colony; it is sent to the Governor, but he rejects it; and if that, or some measure on the same subject, be not passed by a certain day, then the Governor may, by his own act, with the advice of the Council, pass a law on the matter. Why, this is as complete an annihilation of the powers of the three branches, as such, as if the Governor were at once made absolute and despotic. In such a state of things, what will be the instructions sent out to the Governor of this colony? Why, I must shut my eyes and my ears to what is passing around me, if I do not believe that such instructions will be sent out as will place the whole legislative power of the colony in his hands. Am I not right, then, in showing that this Bill would take away the whole power of the Assembly, and vest it in the Governor? or rather, that it would substitute the act of the Governor for that of the three branches? Here is a power of passing acts which cannot be repealed or altered by the Assembly. This is a power which, I am sure, your Lordships will not feel disposed to vest in the Governor of any colony which has hitherto had the advantage of a free constitution. I will not enter into any detail of the clause, as it relates to local and complicated laws; but there is one thing which refers to the law of contracts, on which I will say a word. It is the law, that no contract between master and servant shall be deemed valid in Jamaica, unless it be in writing, signed in the colony, and that it shall not be enforced for a longer period than twelve months from the time it is entered into. Now, it is well known, that it would be difficult to persuade artisans and mechanics to engage in service here for Jamaica, unless the contract were signed before they went out, and unless it was to be in force for a longer period than twelve months. See, then, what your Lordships would be doing, if, by adopting the first clause, you should renew this law!

There is another clause in the Bill, to which I will advert only for a moment, — I mean the second clause. I will put it to Noble Lords opposite, whether they will not see the propriety, of their own free will, of abandoning that part of the Bill? Seven of the Bills there renewed are Money Bills. I am told by persons acquainted with the island, that it is not necessary to renew them at present; that there are funds, ample to provide for all the civil service of the island without them. Passing these Bills by the Imperial Parliament is a direct violation of the Declaratory Act, which has been over and over again referred to and sanctioned. You violate that law distinctly, by legislating for the renewal of these laws. But it is unnecessary; you are doing a great injustice; you are violating that law gratuitously, because the House of Assembly, in their resolution, have stated that they will exercise no legislative functions, except those which are necessary for the purpose of preserving faith with the public creditor. They are content, therefore, to renew these laws, themselves. How can your Lordships interfere, then, and violate a principle, in order to enforce the renewal of these laws, when they, themselves (the House of Assembly), say that they are ready to renew them? Can you undertake that they will not renew them? Can you make such an assertion, in the actual face of the state of things which exists? The House of Assembly say that they are ready to renew these laws. How are you to decide that fact? Give them an opportunity of doing so. Their prorogation has prevented them from doing this, hitherto. From the 20th of December to the present day they have had no opportunity of renewing these laws. You give them no opportunity of renewing them, while you renew them yourselves by your own authority, and so, — violate a fundamental law of the empire. I am not going to submit any motion on this subject; I merely throw these suggestions out for the consideration of Noble Lords opposite. I think, that if Government cannot with any decency retain these Bills, it should be their part to abandon them. I now move the expulsion of the first clause. Under these circumstances, what is the course I recommend? I recommend a course of conciliation. I disapprove of the resolution of the House of Assembly: I wish to give them an opportunity of rescinding that resolution, and of retracing their steps. Let your Lordships give them that opportunity. You have begun to conciliate; you have removed Sir Lionel Smith from the Government, who is a warm partisan; — that is the first step towards conciliation. Let the new Governor deliver a conciliatory message to the House of Assembly; and I pledge myself, from all the information which I have received with respect to the temper of that House, that an end will be put to this unfortunate dispute between the parent state and the colony. Let your Lordships give them an opportunity of rescinding that resolution;—if they do not avail themselves of the opportunity, your position then is changed. You are, now, in the wrong: they will, then, be in the wrong, and all parties in this country will unite for the purpose of remedying the evil; but, at least, let your Lordships give them a trial. What are the objections to this course of proceeding? I have heard none. It is said these Bills are urgent — time is material — they ought to be immediately passed. I deny that. They cannot take effect before the month of November. If the House of Assembly hold out, and do not avail itself of your offer, long before Parliament meets again you will be apprised of that conduct, and by the unanimous advice of both Houses of Parliament these laws may be imposed. What will be the loss of time? But four months. Is that an object, considering the nature of these regulations? — considering the objects to which these Orders in Council are directed? Let your Lordships look at them. A law for the prevention of vagrancy, — that is one of the Bills. Would any inconvenience result from the delay of that law? I see no vil; there is no vagrancy at present in he Island of Jamaica. Vagrancy may radually grow up, and the negroes refuse o work; but no vagrancy exists at present. What necessity is there to pass an immeiate law to prevent vagrancy? A law assed in four months would meet the lifficulty. Am I without authority in what I state? Lord Glenelg sent to Jamaica for the purpose of ascertaining the number of vagrancy cases up to the end of last year. What were the returns from every district? Nil. Not a single prosecution — not a single case of vagrancy. What authority have your Lordships for assuming that this law against vagrancy is so pressingly required? It is proved to be not urgent, by reference to documents now lying on your table, to which I refer. Then, another law — for the prevention of the illegal occupation of lands — comes within the same denomination. When the negroes will not work, they become by degrees what is called "squatters." It may be necessary to remedy that evil; but it must grow up by degrees. A delay of four months can do no injury; it cannot grow up before that. What evil, then, will result from delay? Then there is the law for the regulation of contracts for hired service. In that case what injury can a delay of four months do? By that delay your Lordships will be acting wisely; you will be acting judiciously by it; instead of being in the wrong, you will be placing the colony in the wrong, if they do not avail themselves of the opportunity of passing that law. I am convinced that they will pass it, and that your Lordships will extricate yourselves from the difficulty in which you are now placed. It is on these grounds that I propose the rejection of the first clause. I propose the rejection of the first clause in toto, on the ground that your Lordships ought not, under the circumstances I have stated, to force those laws on the Assembly of Jamaica. My object is, to give the Assembly time for rescinding their resolution, and to pass laws according to their own local knowledge. I am sure your Lordships will pursue a wise course, in pursuing a temperate and conciliatory path. It is the forbearance of the powerful towards the comparatively weak; it is a dignified conduct, — it is a wise conduct. The Imperial Parliament, after all that has passed, I am satisfied, ought to adopt it.

LORD GLENELG. — I had not the advantage of hearing all that has fallen from the Noble and Learned Lord. The Noble and Learned Lord has said that the Prisons Bill was no part of the Abolition Act. What I ventured to state yesterday evening, was, that the Prisons Bill was, in fact, identical with the Abolition Amendment Act, which was passed last year with the complete concurrence of this House. Perhaps I misapprehended the sort of reasoning of the Noble Lord; but it seemed to me as if he supposed me to have argued that the Bill was necessarily a connection of the first Abolition Act. But my argument, yesterday, was, to contend that the Prisons Bill was, in truth, the same Bill as the Abolition Amendment Act, because the merits of that Bill had been discussed in passing that Act; and the same approbation which had supported the Abolition Amendment Act, had also supported the passing of the Prisons Act. But I take the liberty of saying, notwithstanding what the Noble and Learned Lord has urged, that it is not to be disputed that the House, in acceding to this Prisons Bill and the Abolition Act Amendment Bill, did, in truth, undoubtedly, and in fact, give its approbation to the Prisons Bill. The Noble and Learned Lord has said that the Prisons Bill is, actually, nothing more than a transcript of the Act of 1835 of this country. But the observation to which I am particularly adverting, is, that passage of his speech in which the Noble and Learned Lord, adverting to the Jamaica Bill of 1834, stated that in that Bill were contained the substantial provisions embodied in the Prisons Bill; and the Noble Lord would argue, therefore, that it was a superfluous infraction of the West India constitution to introduce that Prisons Bill. What is the difference between these two measures? The Act of 1834, in its general provisions and enactments, was not an exceptionable measure: it received the sanction of the Government; and, in a despatch which I sent out in 1834, I stated that many of its provisions met with my entire approval. But I said, yesterday, — and I beg your Lordships to observe this distinction, — that the great evil of the Prisons Act of 1834 was this; — not that it failed in enactments — not that it failed in principle — not that it failed in provisions, — all was right, all perfectly correct, in classification, in cleanliness, separation, ventilation, religious instruction, — all this was as strongly provided for as could be in any Act cast in any Parliament; but I stated, — and, with submission to the Noble and Learned Lord, I will restate it, — that, with all these most just provisions, that Act was a dead and powerless measure, because it had no principle of execution; — because it had no adequate executive principle. The Noble Lord tells your Lordships that that Act has precisely the same provisions which the Prisons Bill has,—namely, that it gives the Governor the power of appointing inspectors. With the greatest deference, I beg to deny that position, from first to last. There is not even a loophole for giving that power to the Governor.

LORD LYNDHURST.—The Noble Lord does not understand what I said. What I said was, that the visiting magistrates were local magistrates. The stipendiary magistrates are, now, inspectors; the stipendiary magistrates are now local magistrates; and the moment they were appointed local magistrates, they became visitors and inspectors under the Bill of 1834. That is what I stated. The Noble Lord was not present at the time.

LORD GLENELG.—I believe I was. But the Noble Lord then enumerated three particulars in which he said the Prisons Bill exactly corresponded with the Act of 1834. I think I am correct in stating that. I thought that the Noble Lord said that the Prisons Bill allowed the Governor to make regulations for the prisons?

LORD LYNDHURST.—No; I did not state that. Does the Noble Lord wish that I should repeat what I then stated? I said that, by the new Act, —the West India Prisons Act,—passed by this House, the Governor and Council were authorised to make rules and regulations for the government of prisons. I stated that the Governor and Council, under that Act, exercised that power, and adopted the very rules and regulations which formed part of the Act of 1834.

LORD GLENELG.—I was just going to say so. But there were two other particulars in which the Noble Lord said the Prisons Bill did no more than the Act of 1834.

LORD LYNDHURST.—One, only—that the Governor had a power of visiting gaols.

LORD GLENELG.—And, under a local magistracy, the power of inspecting?

LORD LYNDHURST.—Yes.

LORD GLENELG.—I admit the fact of the transfer of these rules from the Act of 1834; and it does not in the slightest degree militate against my statement, that though the regulations of that Act were unobjectionable, there were no means of carrying them into effect. In a despatch of mine, dated May, 1837, I stated,—

The Gaol Act of the Jamaica Legislature, passed in 1834, recognises in the preamble,—as the basis of prison regulations,—classification, separation, superintendence, regular labour and employment, and religious and moral instruction, as essential to the discipline of a prison, and to the reformation of offenders; but the salutary provisions of this statute appear to have been imperfectly administered, and those principles would seem, in practice, to be almost entirely disregarded.

And I afterwards stated,—

I cannot close this despatch without adverting, in a more direct and especial manner than I have hitherto done, to the evidence afforded by a comparison of the law respecting prisons, with the practice and the actual condition of them; that the legislation on the subject is paralysed throughout by the fatal circumstance of the Act containing no adequate executory provisions. Its execution depends upon the parochial authorities and the justices; and it appears to be proved by experience, that so long as it shall be solely intrusted to those functionaries, it will be inoperative. Were it possible to anticipate that a fair degree of operation would be obtained for such enactments, through this agency, there is no way in which his Majesty's Government would more gladly see the objects accomplished; for it is of great importance to every community, that the gentry and other persons of respectability should be engaged in voluntary efforts of this nature, and that those efforts should be assisted by the Government, rather than that any other agency should be substituted; but if no such efforts can be relied on, it then becomes the duty of the Government, to consider what other means can be adopted for the accomplishment of purposes which cannot be abandoned or neglected without incurring a grave responsibility.

Now, that was precisely the statement which I made yesterday, and which I beg leave to repeat. I assert that the Act of 1834 had no one provision for its execution whatever. It was impossible for the legislative authority, in any manner, to carry out the efficient execution of that Act; and the result proved this to be the case; for while that Act was in operation, it was continually disregarded, as is notorious from our despatches, and from all the letters to the Governor. The fact is, that the Prisons Act was utterly powerless. The Marquess of Sligo and Sir Lionel Smith brought before us, instances of workhouses and prisons in which the regulations adverted to in that Act were utterly unknown; and Captain Pringle, on a subsequent inquiry, stated precisely the same thing,—that, with few exceptions, the codes of rules were not known in the prisons and workhouses. The various regulations respecting cleanliness, ventilation, and separation, were really unheard of; and therefore the Act was, in a manner, perfectly powerless. It was an Act on our statute book, to which the House of Assembly could refer, and so assert that there was an Act for the government of prisons; but if they were asked where were the workhouses and the prisons in which the beneficial effects of this Act were to be seen, in any cleanliness, or in any religious instruction?—the answer was,—the mass of the prisons and workhouses were as utterly ignorant of the existence of this Act, as if it had never existed. Therefore, that Act wanted an executive principle, and therefore it is not extraordinary that the Government should take the regulations from the Act of 1834; the point was, to execute them. But I beg to state, further, that the Noble and Learned Lord has omitted to advert to two very material enactments in the Prisons Bill, which are not at all touched in the Act of 1834: the one is—that the Governor has the power of dismissing the officers and workmen on their being guilty of misconduct,—which is a most material enactment; and the other clause is—that the Governor is to signify when any prison is unfit for receiving prisoners, and that, from that moment, that prison shall not receive any more. That was an exceedingly beneficial measure, and for this reason;—it was not an uncommon practice that the prison-houses and workhouses were so ill built, that the prisoners were obliged to be put in chains and attached to each other, and to be kept during the night in chains and in stocks; in short, in addition to the sentence of imprisonment, they added the sentence of torture. The population were crowded day and night into hothouses, into workhouses, into prisons, into cells, and other places, not by the sentence of any magistrate, and not punished at the direction of any superior authority, but at the direction of the prison keeper, who, by his own will and command, inflicted on any person whatsoever degree of confinement and pain he might think it right in his discretion to do. And who were the persons intrusted with the care of the gaols? and what were they in respect of character? They had each a gaoler and a supervisor, either of whom might be of respectable character; but the person generally intrusted with the management of these prisons, was an individual who was termed a "boatswain," who was generally a convict for life. It appears from the Report of Captain Pringle, that sometimes the gaoler, the supervisor, and their wives were absent on business for three or four days; and the whole of the prisoners were then left in the charge of the officer called the "boatswain," who was generally a man of bad character. It was notorious that the sexes were not separated, except at night; that they were, during the whole day, together; and that the person who locked the females in their cells at night, and let them out in the morning, was the boatswain. This was the species of religious instruction given to them. Look to the earnest and strong appeals which have been made, year after year in succession, by the Marquess of Sligo and by Sir Lionel Smith. What were those appeals? Were they for a new Bill? No. They were distinctly for such specific measures as might suffice to remove a state of things, not of doubtful or questionable tendency,—not of a nature about which there ought to have been room for any, the smallest, hesitation or delay,—but a state of things, the existence of which could not but be deemed disgraceful and atrocious by any man, or any set of men. What were the subjects of complaint? They were—the flogging of females; cruelty to males; they were, deaths, by starvation, of offenders in the prisons of the island. What is complained of, by the successive Governors of Jamaica, is this:—you send a female to prison for certain offences; and while you think that you thereby impose a sentence, proportioned in severity to the nature of her offence, it is, in effect, and, in fact, torture to which you subject her—it is the infamous curse of the lash which you cause her to endure. I will refer to a despatch of the Marquess of Sligo. The Noble Marquess wrote to me, in 1836, to this effect:—

I will apply, in pursuance of your instructions, to the House of Assembly, to concert some remedy for the evils connected with the subject of prisons and prison discipline in this island; but there is no chance of their acceding to any satisfactory measure.

The Noble Marquess afterwards applied to the House of Assembly; and what was the result? He said, "I did apply to them, and the subject has been referred to a committee; but since I applied to them, no fewer than forty cases of an aggravated description, arising out of the state of the prisons, have occurred. There have been, among these, cases of the grossest cruelty to females; cases of the grossest cruelty to males; cases of persons who have died in confinement from the treatment they have received; cases of persons who have been left four days without food; cases of persons who, having had medicine ordered them, have suffered severely because the-medicine was not administered to them, in consequence of the boatswain being absent, although the gaoler and supervisors were at their posts. These, and such cases as these, are what have occurred, and are enough to harass and outrage the feelings of every man." Having thus repeatedly required the House of Assembly, — not to go out of their way, — not to pass a new Bill, — but, to do barely what the simplest dictates of humanity pointed out, — the House of Assembly was called upon by the Governor to enact some measure providing that females should not be subjected to the lash and to insult in these prisons; that the male prisoners should not be subjected to cruelty; that human beings should not meet their death in prison from the want of necessary medicines, which could not be administered because the boatswain did not do his duty. Is it not deplorable to find that, when people died in consequence of their treatment in those prisons, the grand jury should return for verdict, "Died by the visitation of God?" A glance over the particular points which were again and again referred to the House of Assembly of Jamaica by the Governor, under instructions from the Government at home, will more particularly show the imperative necessity which arose for interference on the part of the Imperial Parliament, to effect some remedy for this state of things, which it was disgraceful to suffer to continue, because it was so revolting to the commonest humanity. As the Marquess of Sligo said, the Prisons Act, when it was communicated to the House of Assembly, was, by them, referred to a committee of their body. Now, on this, your Lordships will observe, that, all through every Session of the House of Assembly, for three or four years, references of important subjects were continually made by the House of Assembly to these committees. But the cases to which I have referred were marked with atrocities such as could not be suffered to go on, and I said that they must be put an end to. But how was this to be done? If, as the Learned Lord (Lord Lyndhurst) alleges, the special magistrate, invested with power from the Governor, and armed with all the means that he had at his disposal, repeatedly endeavoured to penetrate these receptacles of horrors, but was repeatedly repelled, — and repelled, as it is said, according to law, — then the particular result of this statement of the Noble and Learned Lord is an admission that, under this Act of 1834, the Governor had no power of inspection over the prisons. But the cases I have referred to are not all. In 1836, came out the most atrocious case of all the atrocious cases that occurred in these workhouses. Well, to the House of Assembly, which met in 1835, and which continued in existence throughout the whole of 1836, the subject was again referred, — but referred in vain. They excused themselves. The medical inspectors of workhouses, they said, had failed to perform their duty. On the 21st of February, 1837, Sir Lionel Smith sent a message to the House, recapitulating all the atrocities of the prison system which had come to the knowledge of Government; calling attention to the despatch of the Secretary of State, in which reference was made to some correspondence between the Marquess of Sligo and the Secretary of State relative to the adoption of means for the improvement of the condition of the apprenticed labourers generally; and expressing a wish that the House would enter upon the subject of prisons and workhouses, and that they would take some method of putting a stop to the system of treatment which apprentices met with, when committed to prison. In March following, the Assembly returned, for reply, the following statement: —

> If the House were at all cognizant of the existence of abuses in the gaols and houses of correction, which require legislative interference, they would most readily go into a revision of the laws which regulate those establishments; but without such facts before them, — impressed as they are with the belief that the Marquess of Sligo was much misled, that the representations put forward by him of workhouse punishments were greatly exaggerated, and that the existing laws, if duly enforced and fairly acted upon, were sufficient to prevent abuses, — the House deem it unnecessary to deal with the subject at present, particularly as the Session is so near its close.

They went on to state that they believed the inspectors had been legally excluded; and they concluded that, on the whole, it would be better to defer the consideration of the subject until the next Session. This was in March, 1837. During the succeeding twelve months, fresh instances of most atrocious cruelty came to light; — among others, was the case of Williams, which I have mentioned to your Lordships before; — and the Governor consequently returned word that the existence of these cruelties had been completely proved to exist. With respect to the case of Williams, I protest that, when I first heard it, I could not believe that anything so atrocious could be possible. Now, this document of the Governor was public and patent to all Jamaica; the facts stated in it were made the subject of animadversion in the British Parliament, — they were made the subject of general conversation in the island, — they were held up to notice by two most honourable magistrates there, — they were the theme of every man who advocated humanity in Jamaica; — and yet, when Sir Lionel Smith suggested that the House of Assembly should adopt some measure to take away the stain which these cases had affixed upon their country, — to abolish this perpetual torture to which they subjected the black population, — what did they do? They referred the matter to a committee. That committee made a report, on which I will remark, presently; but, in the mean time, I will take upon me to say, that, under this evasive method of proceeding on the part of the House of Assembly, the Act of Emancipation was a perfect mockery, unless the Legislature of this country stepped in, and took measures for carrying it into execution. But what steps did the committee of the House of Assembly take? I ought to say that, before they concluded their sittings, I wrote to Sir Lionel Smith, desiring that some measure might be recommended to the House of Assembly for putting a stop to these abuses; and intimating that, if something were not done by the Assembly, a Bill, having that object, would be proposed to the Imperial Parliament. In November, Sir Lionel Smith announced this to the Assembly, — who referred it to the same committee. And Sir Lionel Smith told me, that, though he could not communicate, officially, what was the decision of the committee, their report not having been then made, there was very little hope of coming to a decision favourable to the wishes of the Government at home. And so it turned out. The committee recommended no measure. The House adjourned, in December, until the 20th of February; which was tantamount to putting off the settlement of the question till then, as the committee could not report sooner. Indeed, according to the established usage, it might be questioned whether they could report at all, — not having reported before the adjournment; for the House was in the habit, on making recommendations of subjects to the consideration of committees, never to reappoint those committees after adjournments. In this case, too, the committee met in November, and sat great part of December without making any Report. The House separated for the holidays, and not one word was heard of this Bill. In 1838, the Imperial Parliament passed the Prisons Bill; and then it was, according to the Noble and Learned Lord, that a committee of the House of Assembly was appointed on this very subject. But, in fact, not one word was heard about it. Last year, when they met, the House of Assembly — then, for the first time, discovering it — expressed hostility to the Prisons Act: then, for the first time, transpired the state of their feelings as to that statute. Then it was, I believe, that Mr. Jordon, the chairman of the committee, I have mentioned, — to the surprise, I apprehend, of the House, — stated that he had, in consequence of what had taken place in the committee, prepared a Bill; that it was nearly completed; but that he had met with so many difficulties as had greatly retarded him, and rendered it impossible for him to present the Bill before the succeeding Session, when he was resolved to bring it forward. That is precisely the course which the House of Assembly have pursued from year to year. Under these circumstances, I should have been negligent of my duty, if I had deferred any longer to press upon your Lordships the necessity for interposing to take effectual measures to carry out the Emancipation Act. I am not aware that there is any other topic to which I ought to refer, except it be the subject of the proclamation of the Prisons Act. That proclamation, according to the Noble and Learned Lord, did not take place till November, — the House of Assembly having met on October 30. But Sir Lionel Smith said, in his despatch of the 25th of September, that he had received the Act on that day, and the proclamation bore the same date.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — When I gave way to my Noble Friend (Lord Glenelg), I was not aware that he was about to confine himself so exclusively to one part of the subject; but still, after the ample discussion of the whole matter, yesterday, I do not think it necessary to go into many of the topics which have been touched upon by the Noble and Learned Lord; and I feel quite absolved from entering upon that part of the question which has been so fully and ably developed by my Noble Friend, — I mean the question of the Prisons Act, — and the little effect which would have been given to the provisions of that Act, but for the intervention of the British Parliament. The Noble and Learned Lord has alluded to the way in which the Bill passed through the other House of Parliament, and also to the tone and temper in which I put forward the arguments I felt it my duty to address to your Lordships in moving the second reading of it. As to this, your Lordships are aware that I never did conceal that the most effectual and best remedy for the present cri which the conduct of the House of Assembly has brought on in the state of affairs in Jamaica, was — not, as the Noble and Learned Lord states, a complete and perfect change, but — such a suspension of the constitution of Jamaica as would have given to the black population that security for the enjoyment of their just rights which would have effectually changed their situation, and changed it for the better; and when the House of Assembly absolutely refused to take, not only any measures for effecting this object, which was so much desired by the Government and by the Parliament, and which was not only absolutely necessary, but of immediate and urgent necessity to the success of the great measure of negro emancipation, I must say I did think that the best measure which could have been adopted was that which was lately before the other House of Parliament. But, whilst I adopted that opinion, I also thought it necessary, in justification of the course I was taking, to state to your Lordships in detail, when asking your consent to the second reading of this Bill, what had been the course of the House of Assembly for a series of years, and what their conduct with respect to the non-adoption of the measures which were necessary to carry out the Emancipation Act. For I never did contemplate, in the case of any representative body,— not even in that of the House of Assembly of Jamaica (which I cannot call, as the Noble and Learned Lord does, a popular assembly) — not even in case of that, did I ever contemplate — a total abrogation of their privileges. This I thought was no light matter. In asking your Lordships' assent, therefore, to the second reading of this measure, I felt it necessary to recur at some length to the former acts of the House of Assembly of Jamaica; but, in speaking of those acts, I am not conscious of having said anything to merit the Noble and Learned Lord's term "intemperate," — a word which I think the Noble and Learned Lord will, upon consideration, admit was misapplied to anything that I stated. On reflection, I cannot think that I used language which ought not to have been used. The term employed by the Noble and Learned Lord was applicable, not to what I said, but to what the House of Assembly had themselves said, — to the language of their laws, — to the wording of their resolutions; and these I quoted and referred to in furtherance of the object I had in view, — which was, to convince your Lordships of the necessity for parliamentary interference in this case. In this view it was, that I quoted the words of an Act of the House of Assembly, as shewing the temper in which it was passed; and hence I endeavoured to call your Lordships' attention to the spirit in which they had passed their Prisons Acts.

My Noble Friend (Lord Glenelg), who has the circumstances all fresh in his memory, has answered much of what the Noble and Learned Lord has brought forward. The Noble and Learned Lord says that the House referred the Prisons Act to a committee. Yes, they referred it to a committee: that is the thing of which I complain: they referred the whole matter to committee after committee. But the Noble and Learned Lord says that the House of Assembly were well informed of this matter. Why, then, they were, in fact, a party to the atrocious and disgraceful cases, the particulars of which have been gone into by my Noble Friend, but which I will not harrow up your Lordships' feelings by alluding to further. I will only remark that, in the papers on your Lordships' table, and in the reports of the stipendiary magistrates, your Lordships will find detailed acts of cruelty perpetrated, not only on males, but on females, which would perfectly horrify the feelings of any man. But the pretext was, it seems, that delay was necessary. Was the flogging of females necessary for delay? It was not necessary, surely, for the House of Assembly to suspend the operation of the law for four years, before they could determine whether the flogging of females in prisons should be continued, or not. With reference to the amendment now proposed, the Noble and Learned Lord says that he cannot admit that the clause is absolutely requisite; and if it were requisite, he would leave it to the House of Assembly of Jamaica to enact. "How do you know," says the Noble and Learned Lord, "that the House of Assembly will not pass a satisfactory measure?" Why, I know it, because the House of Assembly have told us so. They have declared that they will not touch any matter of legislation until the Imperial Parliament will own itself to have been in the wrong, because it has legislated for Jamaica in a way which my Noble Friend has abundantly shown to be necessary. That the measures which were then passed were measures that were absolutely necessary to complete the Emancipation Act, I have from the mouth of the Learned Gentleman who spoke at your Lordships' bar so ably and so eloquently, and that the House of Assembly will never consent to pass any Acts which will allow contracts to be enforced by the stipendiary magistrates. I speak from my own experience, and that of the people of this country, who have always felt so much, and expressed so warmly their feelings, in favour of the unhappy black population of the colonies, when I say that the time is not yet come at which the negro can be left to the care of those who consider not their negroes' interest, but their own. I feel the firmest conviction that the interests of both classes of the inhabitants of Jamaica must henceforth be the same; but I feel the absolute necessity that there should be an impartial tribunal to which the negro might be able to appeal. I am satisfied that it is essential to the interests of the planter, that he should have it in his power to procure continuous labour, — and that cannot be acquired without some settlement or contract; but into such a contract, under the present order of things, the reports of the special magistrates prove that the negro will not enter. Almost every one of them assigns the absence of such a contract as the reason why labour is at present so irregular in Jamaica. It being absolutely necessary to have an impartial tribunal for the regulation of those contracts, and the Assembly refusing to pass any Contract Law for such purpose, I contend, a fair case arises for the interference of Parliament — with respect, at least, to this subject. As to the manner in which the authority for the protection of the negro ought to be exercised, whether through the medium of the stipendiary magistrates, or by what other functionaries, — that will be matter for subsequent consideration. I trust that the feelings which make it necessary to provide, in this manner, for the interests of the negro, may not long continue, and that the time may arrive when such transactions will be left to the usual mode of adjustment in well-settled communities; but, till that time arrive, I, for one, will not consent to abandon the population, perhaps to ignorance, perhaps to a want of due consideration.

With respect to the observations of the Noble and Learned Lord on that part of the ordinance relating to artificers, I will only say that it is a point fairly open for subsequent consideration. It is not necessary that I should, now, enter into a reply to the arguments of the Noble and Learned Lord on the subject of the second clause. I rather expect that some motion will be made in reference to that clause when it comes under consideration; but I completely dissent from the opinion that the present fund would be sufficient for the public service in Jamaica, — especially when items, which can by no possibility have been provided for by the Assembly, are taken into account. I allude, particularly, to the sums due to the public creditor. There are many other items of great importance unprovided for, and which the people of this country will have to pay, unless special provision be made for them in Jamaica. I will only say one word on the subject of the phrase used by the Noble and Learned Lord when speaking of Sir Lionel Smith. The Noble and Learned Lord said that Sir Lionel Smith was a violent partisan.

LORD LYNDHURST. — I said that he was not a violent partisan.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — That he was a partisan?

LORD LYNDHURST. — The expression I made use of was, that he was certainly not a partisan of the Assembly.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — When the Noble and Learned Lord alluded to the ——

LORD LYNDHURST. — I beg to say I do not know anything of Sir Lionel Smith; and if I used an expression too strong on the occasion, I readily retract it.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — I am perfectly ready to accept the matter as the Noble and Learned Lord states it. All the evidence that has come before me proves that Sir Lionel Smith has discharged the duties of Governor with the greatest ability and zeal; and I do hope that the country will have the benefit of his services in another colony.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I am sure that if any Noble Lord had entered the House after my Noble and Learned Friend had spoken, and had thus lost the satisfaction of hearing the whole of his speech, — in the same way as the Noble Lord behind me (Lord Glenelg) says he entered the House while my Noble and Learned Friend was speaking, and thus lost the satisfaction of hearing a great part of his speech; — and if, consequently, he had only heard the speech of the Noble Lord (Lord Glenelg); he would have said it was a most impressive, a most eloquent oration upon a subject of great importance, but which was all over some years ago, — an oration upon what had passed in Jamaica in 1834, and in England in 1838. For it consisted of an attack of the proceedings of the Assembly of Jamaica in 1834, and of a defence of an Act of the British Legislature in 1838; but my Noble Friend did not say one word on the present question, — on the Bill, the details of which we are discussing. At the same time, I do not think it at all unnatural that my Noble Friend should have entered into those subjects to which he has addressed himself. He, having reprobated the Assembly for the passing of an insufficient Act in 1834 — which, I entirely agree with him, seems defective from not having an executive principle in it,—and, also, having brought in a supplemental Act to supply that defect, by introducing the Prisons Bill of last year,—nothing could be more natural than that he should have adverted to those measures; but, undoubtedly, I agree with the Noble Marquess that the speech of my Noble Friend did not touch the present question, except very remotely. The Noble Marquess, having no connection with the Act of 1834, and very little with the Act of 1838, after hearing a most impressive and powerful attack upon the present Bill, upon almost every point of constitutional law, and upon almost every point of fact, addressed himself exclusively to — what? To a vindication of the measures with which he had had no connection; but he said not a word in reference to the proposal now under the consideration of the House. I do not think that the Noble Marquess has succeeded in giving any tangible reason in support of the present measure, or even in justification of it. Your Lordships are now called upon to say whether you will agree to the first clause,—the most important part of the Bill. To that question, — as disposed on all such occasions to limit my assent to extraordinary remedies, which can only be justified by the pressure of extreme and overruling necessity, —as limiting, therefore, my assent to measures of the present odious and unconstitutional character and hateful aspect, beginning, continuing, and ending in illegality, violence, and usurpation,—as limiting even my tolerance of such measures to the absolute necessity of the case; —I feel bound to answer—No. When a measure comes to this House of Parliament, that has been adopted by a majority of the other,—when the representatives of the people, who ought to have as great a care of constitutional principles as the Peers of the realm, record their clear and decided opinion in its favour,—I will not say that I feel my own opinion bound by theirs; but, at all events, I approach the consideration of the measure with deference, with respect, with more than tolerance even of an unconstitutional proposition; and with reluctance and hesitation I ask your Lordships to record your dissent from the opinion of the representatives of the people. So I felt when large majorities of the other House sent up Bills, as in 1833 and 1834, —so did I feel when Bills came up recommended by smaller majorities, as in 1835,—so may I feel when other measures shall come — if, under the present dispensation, we are ever fated to see such measures come — recommended by anything like a majority, with the authority of the House of Commons clearly, decidedly, and unequivocally pronounced in favour of them, by the voices of a fair, and undeniable, a real — and not an accidental, chance-medley — majority of the representatives of the people. In such cases, though I may not feel bound to give up my own opinion, I shall treat that of the Commons with deference and respect; I shall examine it with delicacy, and wish that the examination may conduct me to a conclusion in accordance with theirs. At all events, I can have no right to treat any such measure, backed by such a majority, as if it were a new question, proposed, now, for the first time. But how is it with a measure agreed to by the narrowest majorities, — by chance-medley hap-hazard majorities, — by majorities that turn the scale with dust flung into the balance, — wavering, quivering, shaking in the wind, so that it can hardly be seen which of the two scales preponderates, when neither kicks the beam? I say that the scales in such a case hang even,—that it may more properly be said that no opinion has been pronounced, no decision given, and no authority interposed. When there is but a bare majority, that can hardly be called a majority, — when the opinion is hardly decisive, and expressed in a form hardly intelligible, — when it is scarce distinctly enunciated, so that others can hardly tell what they say, — it cannot be expected that your Lordships, who have not ears so fine as to be able to hear grass grow, can understand what is so unintelligibly muttered by those who have, themselves, no confidence in their own opinion —so that it may reasonably be doubted whether they have any opinion at all.

This statement of the case appears ludicrous. It is no fault of mine, — I but mention the fact; and if there be anything exciting laughter in quarters where a serious gravity ought always to reign, — if there be anything ludicrous in legislation carried on, or affected to be carried on, in such a way, — that is rather a melancholy than a laughable thing for a great country. It is next thing to the negation of legislative functions, to the abdication of all parliamentary privileges; it amounts to the absence of everything that deserves to be called government — government which ought to command, by deserving to receive, the respect of the people subject to its sway. Therefore, I say that it is no light or laughing matter to be so placed; and that which is only ridiculous in the statement, becomes most serious, melancholy, and grievous, upon reflection. The practical inference which I deduce from these premises, bearing upon the present matter, is of high importance. In proportion as I should be slow to urge your Lordships into a conflict with the other House of Parliament, when their opinion has been clearly expressed, by a decided and commanding majority, — in proportion as I should be slow to touch the workmanship of lawgiving, performed by a firm hand, guided by a steady purpose, in the co-ordinate branch of the Legislature, which represents the people, — in precisely the same proportion have I a right to call on your Lordships not to regard a measure such as this, — backed by a majority that is hardly more entitled to be regarded than if the other House of Parliament had never exercised its opinion, or formed its determination, or pronounced its judgment, or interposed its authority upon the question at all. I consider, therefore, with all possible respect for the Commons' House of Parliament, that I have a right to approach the consideration of this clause, — being the principal part of the Bill, — precisely as I should have done, as free and unfettered as I should have been, had it been proposed to this House for the first time by a Minister of the Crown, having only the authority of that Minister, instead of the sanction of the other branch of the Legislature. I come, now, to consider the measure itself, and the grounds on which it is submitted to Parliament. My Noble Friend (Lord Glenelg), in examining the merits of the Jamaica Assembly's Prisons Act of 1834, and the Imperial Parliament's Prisons Act of 1838, addressed himself to a question that has but a very remote connection with that now before your Lordships. I do not deny, however, that it has some connection, — and I say so, because I understand, from my Noble Friend's argument of last night, summarily repeated on this evening, that it is the conduct of the Assembly, in refusing to accept the Prisons Act of 1838, which is now made the pretence for suspending the constitution of Jamaica. Supposing that I should admit, for argument's sake, the truth of all that my Noble Friend has advanced against the Assembly's Act of 1834, and that I were to admit, also, that the Prisons Bill proposed by Ministers was entirely unexceptionable, — still, neither of these propositions would form any justification whatever for suspending the constitution of Jamaica. If these propositions were allowed to be true, it would only follow that we were right, and they were wrong, in this particular case; and instead of justifying us in abolishing the legislative powers so long exercised in Jamaica, it would only justify us in taking a course exactly the reverse of that which was taken by the Assembly of Jamaica, — as was done by those who passed the Prisons Bill of 1838, — in doing here, what had not been done there, — in performing the duties which they had neglected, and in correcting, by the wisdom of Parliament, the folly or injustice of the colonial Legislature. It has been said that the Jamaica Assembly have gone a step further, and have passed an Act abdicating their authority, — declaring that they will pass no laws, except such as are necessary for doing justice to the public creditor. On that point I beg to observe, that it forms no part of my duty, upon the present occasion, to deal in general propositions; I will, therefore, not say that there is no refusal on the part of such a Legislature to perform its duty, which would justify this country in providing a substitute. I will not now take upon myself to determine whether or not it has been guilty of a case of nonfeasance, or of misfeasance, sufficient to allow the interference of the Imperial Legislature; but of this I feel perfectly assured, — that the expediency or the inexpediency, the justice or the injustice, of passing such a Bill as that now before your Lordships, must depend upon whether such a case as I am supposing has arisen.

And here I must again advert to the narrow majorities by which the present measure was carried in the other House of Parliament. If it were a case upon which 600 rational men had no doubt, the matter would come before your Lordships in a totally different shape. But if the necessity for adopting a measure like the present be so extremely doubtful, — if the opinions of 600 rational men are poised in such equal scales — necessity in the one scale, needlessness in the other — that the scale of needlessness is almost on a level with the scale of necessity; if I find of those 600 rational men only a majority of 10 — of one sixtieth part of the whole — who think that a case has been made out against Jamaica, — am I, then, to consider myself justified in violently and despotically suspending the constitution of that colony? God forbid! If these 600 men be not only rational men, but the representatives of the people of England.

—it makes the necessity stronger, that the expression of their opinion should be clear, distinct, and unequivocal. But there is another circumstance which ought not to escape your Lordships' attention. Most of these 600 men, who say that there is no necessity for the adoption of so severe a measure towards Jamaica, are those very men, who, upon a former occasion, showed that they were disposed to listen most readily to a proposition for suspending the constitution of a colony, upon the ground that the local Legislature, the provincial House of Assembly, had refused to perform its legislative functions. What, if I find that 300 of those men, who, a year ago, at the bidding of the Government, were so ready to suspend the constitution of the Canadas, — who showed so little of intemperate zeal in support of Canadian and colonial rights — so little of indisposition to listen to statements of misbehaviour on the part of colonial assemblies, —what, if I find that 300 of those very men, who, one short year ago, had so little hesitation upon the case presented to them on suspending the constitution of Canada, are now, without exception, of opinion that no sufficient proof has been given of misbehaviour on the part of the Assembly of Jamaica, and that there is no ground whatever for suspending the constitution of that colony? Surely, whatever my own individual opinion may be, I must regard such a circumstance as affording sufficient ground to induce me to pause before I assent to such a proposition as that involved in the measure now before the House? Surely, your Lordships must regard it as affording the strongest conceivable argument against the extreme necessity which is alleged to exist in this instance? Surely, it must convince you, that the condition of the colony, and the conduct of the Assembly, are not such as to demand the adoption of so severe, so arbitrary, so despotic a measure? So stands the fact. I do not mean to say anything in vindication of the conduct of the Jamaica Assembly. I know that aforetime their conduct was not such as to entitle them to respect. I do not say that I approve of their conduct in the present instance. It does not form any part of my argument, to hold that the Jamaica Assembly have, in all respects, acted temperately, wisely, and discreetly. Far from it; — but there is a wide difference between saying that, and saying that it is so resolved upon a suicidal act — it is so determined to abdicate its functions—that it is necessary that the Crown should interfere, and invest itself with all the powers which it has abandoned. Surely I am not going too far when I assert that our colonial assemblies, generally, are not guided by the same discreet and enlightened and temperate views of public affairs which guide the Imperial Legislature; for he must, indeed, be a most romantic dreamer, — he must, indeed, be a most unreasonable judge of human conduct, — who, taking into consideration the extreme difference of circumstances between the House of Assembly in Jamaica and the Imperial Legislature in Great Britain, can expect from the former the same consistency of conduct, the same temperance and moderation, the same high and enlightened wisdom, which distinguish the measures of the Legislature at home. That Assembly will ever be, as it always has been, in conflict, — now with the Governor, now with themselves, now with the mother country, and now with the Imperial Legislature at large. The fact is, that your Lordships, if you act wisely, must overlook these temporary ebullitions of local violence, which have all the bitterness and all the littleness of vestry squabbles. Your Lordships must remember the wise lesson which was given to Parliament by the matured experience, the large sagacity, the consummate eloquence, and the enlightened genius for public affairs, which adorned the first Lord Chatham, — whose advice so given, and so recommended, was rejected in an ill-fated hour, whilst counsels were preferred, which produced all the evils of the American war, and terminated in the severance of the British empire. That wise lesson was couched in the homely language of one of our poets of the last century: —

> Be to their faults a little blind;
> Let all their acts be unconfined,
> And clap your padlock on their mind.

I know that the experience, the sagacity, the eloquence, and the genius of Lord Chatham are matters of ridicule to the more enlightened statesmen of the present day, by whom I am surrounded, — so exuberant are they in experience, sagacity, eloquence, genius — ay, and love, too, for liberty. I have, however, an old-fashioned respect for that great statesman, whom the country used to venerate, and, I believe, still does venerate; and I think that the advice which he gave, even if it had come from a less authority than his, should lead your Lordships to adopt and to pursue, as long as you can, a temperate and conciliatory course. One act, one resolution, the consequence of a single mortification, the result of a single supposed slight, is the only pretended ground for this measure, — and that is, the alleged refusal of the House of Assembly to legislate altogether. But have they ever avowed any such refusal? Why, they have offered to pass all the laws which may be necessary to preserve inviolate the faith of the public creditor; and their refusal to legislate has only been made provisionally, as my Noble and Learned Friend has well observed, until the pleasure of the Crown be known. Now, is this, I would ask, a general abdication of their functions by the colonial House of Assembly? Have your Lordships any right to suppose that, if this Bill were withdrawn, that Assembly would not come back to a sense of the duties which they owe to themselves, to their constituents, and the country at large? I contend that the part which I took, last year, upon the Canada Bill, renders it incumbent upon me to take a similar course upon this Jamaica Bill. That my Noble and Learned Friend opposite did not agree with me in opposing the Canada Bill, is a matter which I much lament. All the arguments which my Noble and Learned Friend has, this night, used against the impropriety of intrusting the governors of our colonies with arbitrary powers — all his dislike of suspending constitutions — all his abhorrence of anything like the transfer of the constitutional privileges of the colonies into the hands of a dictator, — I ventured to express, last Session — much less strongly, it is true, than my Noble and Learned Friend has expressed this evening, and much more feebly, so far as relates to the effect I intended to produce. I cannot, for my life, see why there should have been such facility, last year, in taking away a constitution from 400,000 or 500,000 whites in Canada, and so much reluctance, this year, to take it away from 30,000 whites in Jamaica. I never could discover that the House of Assembly in Canada did, last year, anything so bad as — not to say worse than — the House of Assembly in Jamaica has done, this year. But my Noble and Learned Friend did not object to the dictatorial measure of last year.

LORD LYNDHURST. — I rather think I was absent from the country.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Oh! my Noble and Learned Friend was absent from the country, was he? Then I greatly regret his absence; and still more deeply do I regret that the strong letters, the very strong letters, which my Noble and Learned Friend must have sent to his Noble Friends on the other side of the House, so full of his dislike of the suspension of free constitutions, did not produce any, the most trifling effect, either upon their convictions or upon their votes. After all the letters which, I repeat, my Noble and Learned Friend must have written to his friends and supporters on the Opposition benches, not one of them gave me any support; not one of them brought forward any of the constitutional arguments, which my Noble and Learned Friend must have urged against that most unconstitutional measure which annihilated the constitution of Lower Canada. I am glad, however, to find that I shall have my Noble and Learned Friend's support in opposing this measure of injustice towards Jamaica. I should have been still more delighted to have had it in opposing the measure for the destruction of the constitution of Canada, — a measure on which I was left so unsupported in this House, that I did not even venture to divide against it. It is a mere matter of course that I should adopt against the Jamaica Bill the same course of opposition which I adopted against the Canada Bill; and if I were to enter a protest against it, now, I should enter it in the very same words which I used in my protest of last year.

An objection has been taken to the constitution of the House of Assembly in Jamaica, by the Noble Marquess near me, which I have some difficulty in understanding. The Noble Marquess has described, in glowing colours, the badness of the constitution of the House of Assembly in Jamaica. It represents, forsooth, neither the property nor the population of the country. That is language which does not savour of "finality," at any rate. It is alleged that, because the population of Jamaica is not represented in its Legislative Assembly, we have no test that it has any right to call itself a representative body at all. Admitting that to be a correct test of representation, what are we to think of the House of Commons in this country? The House of Commons represents, it is true, a great mass of property; but as to the population, why, it is notorious and undeniable that ninety-nine persons out of every hundred are utterly unrepresented. But no one, on that account, talks of suspending its constitution. The principle of population in the representative system in this country is disregarded, spurned, trampled under foot. The best and most intelligent artisans in the empire — the most industrious and enlightened workmen in the different workshops of London, Liverpool, Birmingham, and Sheffield — are as much without votes in England, as any part of the population can be in Jamaica. Though they are quite as free as the negroes, for whom so much sympathy is now expressed at the expense of the whites, they have no votes in the election of those representatives, who have the power of taxing them to an extent far beyond that to which the Assembly of Jamaica ever can go in taxing the population of that island. And yet, no man thinks that the House of Commons is not a venerated and a venerable assembly; and no man denies that, in its corporate capacity, it deserves and commands respect. But why am I, under such circumstances, to turn my back upon the House of Assembly in Jamaica, — an Assembly which, though not, perhaps, the most perfectly constituted representative body in the world, is still known to the law, and is as much an integral portion of the constitution of that island, as the House of Commons is of the constitution of Great Britain and Ireland? Perhaps parliamentary reform is as much wanted in Jamaica as it has been in England; and if so, God forbid that I should oppose it! Perhaps its Parliament is a borough-mongering Parliament; and this Bill, which strikes at the root of its representative character, is intended to reform it. I must here be permitted to ask, whence arises this new anxiety for the rights and privileges of the negroes, which has so suddenly come over a part of your Lordships, and, I must also add, a part of her Majesty's Government? Was there ever a time in which it was more necessary than it was in the last Session of Parliament, for your new-born philanthropy to have stepped forward to rescue the negroes from the tyranny of their masters? Was no opportunity offered for such a display of your benevolent zeal in the cause of humanity? Again and again did I call upon your Lordships to interfere, and again and again was my call unanswered. There was no objection to leave these matters, last year, in the hands of the House of Assembly. The cry then was, "Oh! leave it to the House of Assembly; they know better than you do the state of the colony: don't you interfere." Again and again I wanted your Lordships to interfere, but could not prevail upon you to do so. Why should you now adopt a different course? Why should you not again listen to such an argument as this, — "Wait till the House of Assembly is in the wrong, — keep yourselves in the right; you will then have the people of England with you; and then you will compel the House of Assembly to yield to you again, as they yielded to you before, in 1836." I have, myself, no doubt but that the House of Assembly would yield, if the conduct of her Majesty's Government towards it were marked with that temper and moderation which become the governing as well as the governed party. The present Bill, however, is not the way in which I would interfere with the colonial Assembly. I lay it down as an indispensable proposition, that a constitution once given, if enjoyed for two centuries, ought not to be suspended altogether, unless in a case of absolute, extreme, overwhelming, and undeniable necessity — a necessity regarding which no two men can ever dispute. What signifies it to me that there are defects in that constitution, and that it is alleged not to be popular enough? At any rate, it is more popular than that which is going to be substituted in its stead. But be its defects what they may, it is the existing constitution of Jamaica; the people are friendly to it, and take part with it against the Government of this country. I admit that the Assembly is not so well constituted as it might be; but it is an elective body, — and must, to a certain degree, be taken as representing the feelings, the wishes, and opinions of the people of the colonies.

Now, as to the conduct of the House of Assembly on the Prisons Bill, — I admit that they were wrong, and we were right. I admit this, for the sake of argument, and, to a degree, in point of fact. But what happened on that occasion? What was the majority which rejected the measure? Was it a small one? Was this step taken in consequence of the preponderance of a single vote? No such thing. The opinion pronounced, broadly, clearly, definitely, and distinctly, was confirmed by a majority of 25; — a majority resembling rather our majorities of 1833 and 1834, than those of 1839. The minority, who did not adhere to the constitutional ground, relied upon by the rest of the Assembly, consisted only of five. The Governor, invested with the undoubted authority of the Crown, determined on an appeal to the constituent body; — a course which (I may remark in passing) proved that he did not think those elections such farces as some of our statesmen have described them to be. Otherwise, why should he appeal to the people? He expected that the people would give a different verdict from the Assembly, and thus appoint another Assembly more suited to his views. What happened? As in Canada, the minority was, on a dissolution, changed into a majority; instead of the minority in Jamaica increasing, it was lessened five-fold. That minority, which was 5 before the dissolution, after the appeal to the people, and as the result of that appeal, amounted to just 1; so that, instead of there being 25 to 5, the majority became 29 to 1. The sense of the people having been taken, what was before carried by a great and overwhelming majority, was now carried with one single, solitary dissentient. It is no light matter, to treat a community so unanimous as this, in the way you are now called upon to do. It is a course not to be recommended,— infinitely to be deprecated, — anxiously, by all possible means, to be avoided, — only to be embraced in the last instance, and after every means of delay, — if conciliation and negotiation have been tried and exhausted in vain. But it is said you are not legislating for the colony yourselves, — you are only delegating its legislative functions. That is my objection to this measure. If they will not do their duty, we can do ours and theirs for them in one and the same Act, at one and the same time; — if they will not pass the proper laws for the protection of the negro, — if they will not pass the Squatting, Vagrants, and Contracts Bills, let us pass those Bills; that is the proper course: at all events, I dislike it far less than that which is now proposed.

I differ from my Noble and Learned Friend, entirely, in the doctrine he has laid down — more widely in appearance than in reality — as to the right of internal legislation. I maintain that we have an undoubted right of internal legislation over all the colonies of the Crown. If there were any doubt, the 6 Geo. III., independent of the common law of the constitution, is most explicit on the subject. No words can recognise the right more completely; the words are, "that the Parliament hath, has had, and of right ought to have, full power and authority to make laws and statutes of sufficient force and validity to bind the colonies, plantations, and people thereof, being subjects of the Crown, in all cases whatsoever," internal, as well as others. That has never been repealed,— never doubted; it has only in one solitary instance been departed from, by the 18th of Geo. III., which is confined to taxing exclusively. The right is undeniable to legislate for the colonies; and if any precedent were wanting, the most recent, as well as the most striking that could be adduced, is the Emancipation Act itself. Having, then, this entire and absolute right of legislating internally for the colonies, my proposition is, that, instead of delegating powers to a dictator, you ought to legislate yourselves. And why not? Is there any difficulty to forbid you? It is said the details are such, that they cannot be rightly entered into on this side of the water. Why, the preamble of this very Act contains within its own bosom a complete contradiction of such a proposition. Vagrancy, squatting, and contracts for labour are made the subject-matter of detailed and anxious legislation for all the Crown colonies, in the very first clause of this Bill. If you chose, you could put your Orders in Council into the form of Acts of Parliament; you might bring them in and pass them, after submitting them to the wisdom of the Legislature. This would, at all events, be the course least objectionable, the least irritating, the most grateful to the colony. You are now taking the most offensive, the most galling, the most grating, the most insufferable course, — investing the Governor with absolute and despotic power — making him a tyrant over her Majesty's free subjects. I do not like to trust any man with absolute power; I know too well the frailty of human nature, and the corrupting tendency of unconstitutional power. The stoutest head is apt to be turned by it; the tenderest heart is apt to be steeled by it. I would not trust either the man's feelings or judgment, who has long been armed with powers as dangerous as noxious, — as bad for him who possesses them, as fatal to those over whom they are to be exercised. In the next place, I confide in the wisdom of Parliament. I would infinitely rather have any measure, to be enforced on our fellow subjects in the West Indies, brought into Parliament, opened and discussed by the representatives of the people, undergoing the scrutiny of the Peers of the realm, with all the lights of information, of experience, of knowledge, of liberal attainments, which belong to such assemblies, than place in the hands of a single man, who, though the wisest of men, is always liable to err, the extreme powers to be vested in the Governor of Jamaica by this Bill. The course proposed to be taken under this measure is the very worst that could be devised. To interfere you have an undoubted right; and to interfere in this way, if necessity absolutely requires it. No such necessity can be pretended to exist, as entitles you to suspend the representative, and substitute in its place a despotic, form of government.

Such are the grounds on which I have come to an opinion, that it is impolitic, unjust, and therefore highly inexpedient, and altogether unjustifiable, to adopt the first and leading clause of this Bill. There are other objections I entertain to the measure, some of which have been alluded to by my Noble and Learned Friend. There is one which I believe my Noble and Learned Friend has not stated; it is this; — the Act does not work out its own purpose, nor anything like it. It professes to do one thing—it does another, wholly different. It professes to suspend the constitution,— ay, and until the Legislature of Jamaica shall pass certain Acts, it professes to arm the Governor with despotic power only in the event of the Assembly continuing to abdicate its functions; but suppose the Assembly, under the provision made, should declare, "We are willing to retrace our steps; we repent what we have done; we will no longer persist in the applications we have made; we are willing to resume our functions, and to pass the Squatting, Vagrancy, and contract Bills;"— does it follow that the Governor would not have the despotic power? Nothing of the kind. The Governor has only to refuse his assent to those Bills, and whatever may be the ground of his refusal, whether general, or confined to one single particular, if the Bills are not passed into Jamaica law, the Governor has the absolute control of legislation. He may leave the odium to his Council, or he may divide it with them; the Council may refuse to pass these measures; and still, this preposterously ill-constructed Act, which does not mean to give the power but in one event, gives it in every event. One other observation, and I have done. If kindness towards the emancipated slave was the origin of this measure,— if your Lordships want only to help the slave, and not to hurt the master, — it is odd you should only have selected one colony. Is the Assembly of Barbadoes more respectable than that of Jamaica? What becomes of all the smaller islands; —Nevis and Montserrat, for instance,— where by far the greatest atrocities have been committed under the former system, — where the Hodges live, — where the Hugginses forfeit their lives, — where society is so constituted, that, instead of taking part with the victim of cruelty, they take part with the master who inflicts it, — juries refusing to find bills, and planters' wives and daughters associating with the murderous felons. There is no such Bill for Montserrat, — no such Bill for Nevis, — no such Bill for the countrymen of Hodges — for the patrons and patronesses of Huggins, — no such Bill, but for Jamaica alone; and this confined, casual, accidental, capricious legislation, is for the purpose of demonstrating that your views are large and enlightened and liberal in favour of the negro, and not against the whites. This observation throws some light on the impolitic and most unjustifiable course your Lordships are now called on to pursue. I hope and trust, however, that, whoever may have neglected their duties, your Lordships will do yours. You will refuse to suspend the Jamaica constitution, because you have come once in collision with the Jamaica Assembly; but if you see, in point of fact, a ground for resorting to extreme remedies, you will take a remedy formed according to the nature of the mischief, calculated, as professing to be designed, to meet that specific mischief; — you will interpose with the wisdom of Parliament, not by the appointment of dictators, and teach my Noble Friends behind me — the heads of the liberal Whig constitutional Government — this memorable lesson: — to leave the suspension of constitutions,— to leave the abrogation of the people's rights, — to leave the extinction of representative government,— not for every occasion—the easy remedy to which, to save trouble, they should have recourse,— but for extreme cases of absolute, overruling, and undeniable necessity.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — The Noble and Learned Lord opposite (Lord Lyndhurst) has spoken at great length, and stated very clearly, fully, and distinctly, his objections to this Bill; the first clause of which he proposes to omit. There has been much debate in another House of Parliament, and there has been laid on your Lordships' table a great variety of papers, and a vast mass of information, relating to this subject; and yet, I declare, I do think there never was offered to the consideration and determination of the Legislature, a more short, clear, simple, and distinct question, than is submitted to your Lordships upon the present occasion. I entirely, utterly, absolutely, and completely deny the assertion with which the Noble and Learned Lord opposite commenced his speech, that there is, either on the part of myself or of any of my Noble Friends, any disposition whatsoever to abrogate and abolish the Jamaica House of Assembly, or to interfere with the rights either of individuals or bodies of men in this country, or in any of the colonies. What we have done, we have done with the utmost regret and concern, with the utmost reluctance and unwillingness. We made our former proposition with the greatest reluctance; we make our present proposal with equal unwillingness and sorrow;—the course we call upon your Lordships to pursue is forced, absolutely forced upon us by the conduct of the Jamaica House of Assembly;—and I declare before God, were the same conduct to be pursued by any other House of Parliament, aristocratic or democratic, be it where it might, I would not hesitate to advise the same sort of measures, in order to supply and secure the discharge of the functions and duties which have been abandoned, in this case, by those to whom they were committed. I respect the rights of all parties; I respect the rights of all individuals; I respect the rights of all bodies, whether elective or hereditary; I respect them, as I respect and reverence all constituted authorities in every country;—but all constituted authorities,—whatever their dignity, their weight, their power, their privileges, — hold their power, privileges, and dignity by the tenure and condition of performing the duties they have to discharge; and if they desert and abandon them, they commit suicide of themselves. It is not the Government that is, here, putting an end to the Assembly, — it is the Assembly putting an end to itself. It is the Assembly which imposes on us the necessity of fulfilling the duties the Assembly has left vacant; of providing for the powers they have not exercised; and for the exigencies and necessities which they, themselves, admit to exist. That is a duty absolutely imposed on us — a duty which it is absolutely necessary for us to perform; and for the measures to be taken under such necessity and exigency, not they who are compelled to undertake them should be held responsible, but those whose conduct has imposed the task, upon the remaining powers of the state, of carrying on the duties of the Government. The House of Assembly have, in their Address to the Governor, admitted, distinctly, the absolute necessity — particularly in the present circumstances of that country — of legislating on the very points provided for in this Bill; and then they go on to say, they will not legislate upon those or any other subjects, until their privileges are respected and the Imperial Parliament shall have withdrawn from the course which it has already pursued. That this amounts to a complete dereliction of their duties,—that it is an entire disregard of all their functions, a total neglect of the whole interests of the state,— it is impossible for any one to deny. And if the Assembly do not perform the duties which are incumbent on them, and which they admit to be absolutely necessary, it remains for the Imperial Parliament to provide for the exigency. The Noble and Learned Lord (Lord Lyndhurst) says "this refusal is limited — they offer to pass certain Bills." What right have they, my Lords, to say they will perform part of their duties? To abrogate one great part of those duties, I maintain, is the same as abrogating the whole. It is the respublica, the whole interest of the community, that is committed to their care, — and they have no right to withdraw themselves from any part of it. But then it is said that all this is conditional; if the Imperial Parliament will withdraw what they consider an attack on their privileges, they will proceed to legislate. What right have they to make the performance of their duty conditional? Will your Lordships sanction such a proceeding? The conduct observed in reference to this subject by some Noble Lords, appears to me most strange and extraordinary. One Noble Lord says that he was not present on the occasion of discussing the Prisons Bill. The Noble Duke opposite says that he has not paid any attention to the subject. The Noble and Learned Lord under the gallery affirms that he is ignorant of the circumstances of the case; and another Noble and Learned Lord says that, though he attended the discussion, he disapproved of the proceeding altogether. Now, I beg to ask, is it fitting, is it becoming, is it suitable, that your Lordships should follow such courses, and hold such language, upon occasions so important and momentous? Is this the way to uphold your dignity — to sustain your authority? Is this the way in which you stand by your Acts? That Bill, however, was passed by the House of Lords; and yet those are the terms in which it has been spoken of, by persons of weight and importance in this House; and it is not altogether certain that persons out of doors may refrain from insinuating that this is your usual mode of legislation, and that it is the manner in which you generally deal with the important interests intrusted to your charge. It is not fitting, then, I will repeat, that persons of weight and authority should permit themselves to use such language, in order to serve a present argument, or advance a present purpose. It is evident enough, and quite natural, that Noble Lords on the other side should wish to maintain the measures which they have passed; but I affirm that the course which they are pursuing is not the best calculated to effect such an object.

The question now before your Lordships is as plain as it is important, — it is the plainest question possible. The House of Assembly in Jamaica, themselves, admit the absolute necessity of some' being done. This suspension of the progress of public affairs in that colony has become a matter of the highest importance, and of the greatest possible urgency. Is the House of Lords, then, prepared to take upon itself the great and serious responsibility of leaving it to the House of Assembly of Jamaica to determine whether they will, or whether they will not, adopt certain proceedings? Your Lordships cannot say that the Prisons Bill is a measure which is not to be drawn into a precedent; if it was not to be a precedent, why was it passed? A precedent it must be considered, and it cannot cease to be viewed in that light. Then I come to the question, — What ground have your Lordships to think that the House of Assembly will not legislate? Because they tell Parliament that they will not do so unless they are satisfied as to their privileges. Yet they can only be satisfied with respect to their privileges, by the repeal of that Act of Parliament through which they were originally infringed. It is clear that that cannot be granted; and it is equally clear, that if you leave the House of Assembly of Jamaica to proceed, or not to proceed, as they think proper, all possible risk will thus be incurred, without the least advantage. Why should the House of Assembly give way, when they are supported and defended and encouraged as they have been, and that by so large a party in the country? They would be mere children, were they to give way. The House has, this night, heard much as to the majority by which the Bill now before your Lordships has been carried in another place. Upon that subject I do not propose to trouble your Lordships at any great length; it is a matter of serious consideration. I admit that I think so, — not only on account of the great question to which it more immediately relates, but on account of its indirect effects upon the great colonial interests of the country. I view it as a matter of serious consideration, not more on the one account than on the other; for unanimity amongst the constituted authorities of the parent country must, at the present moment, be regarded as of the very highest importance. If there be not some degree of general concurrence, how can you expect the measure to succeed? — how can you look forward to its being respected? The House will observe that I have carefully abstained from making any allusion to party on the present occasion. I have no wish to do so; it has been disclaimed on both sides; no person seeks to sustain or to object to the present measure upon party grounds. There is no intention of using it to aggrandise party on the one hand; nor do I mean to say that, on the other, it is intended to be used for the purpose of seizing upon power; though, in the absence of those motives, I profess myself unable to understand the conduct pursued by the opponents of the measure. The absence of those motives may render their conduct more praiseworthy; but it therefore only makes it appear the more senseless and unintelligible. Their thwarting such a measure I can understand, if they have a party object in view; but without that, I cannot regard their proceeding otherwise than as sheer mischief or sheer folly. I do not attribute mischief or folly to the Noble Lords opposite; but to account for their conduct I feel utterly at a loss. The Noble and Learned Lord, opposite, appears to suppose that the House of Assembly has shown a disposition to resume its functions, — but he observes, at the same time, that even though it should, still the arbitrary power of the Governor would remain. But, surely, your Lordships cannot consider that power as one fraught with any danger. It may be very well for the Noble and Learned Lord to use such general topics as the corrupting nature and tendency of excessive power; but does he really and seriously suppose that, under the superintendence of Parliament, any Governor would dare to abuse such power? I admit that, pro tanto, the Bill goes to the suppression of the House of Assembly; but, at the same time, I contend that the conduct of the House of Assembly has rendered that course unavoidable. If your Lordships do not pass the Bill, you will lose the whole of the intervening time, and incur all the dangers which any other possible course must involve.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I really must beg to dissent from the proposition laid down by my Noble Friend, — that, because any individual, or set of individuals, oppose a measure without party motives, they are acting foolishly or mischievously. Then, with regard to the performance of legislative duties, — my Noble Friend says that if any legislative body, be it where or what it might, were to refuse to perform the duties of its functions, he would adopt the same measures against it as are now proposed against the Assembly of Jamaica. My Lords, of course, this threat must apply to your Lordships and the other House of Parliament; and you may expect to see a body of grenadiers marched in to drive you from your seats, if you do not do your duty. But what is your ıty? and who is to be the judge of it? presume the Government, of course. In ıort, if you pass the measures proposed y Government, you will be exercising our functions, and doing right; but if ou presume to differ with Ministers upon ny of them, you will be acting foolishly nd mischievously, and at once lay yourelves open to the threats of my Noble 'riend.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — What meant to say was this,—that every conıtituted body, in every state, is bound to ɔerform the duties assigned to it; and if ıny such authority of the state, whatever t may be, abdicate — or declare that it will ıot perform — those functions, then the ɔther authorities of the state are bound o interfere and supply the deficiency. 'Si non vis judicare, cessa regnare," were the memorable words once addressed ɔo a high potentate; and they have ever been considered as announcing a very just constitutional doctrine. I see no reason why other constituted authorities should not be subjected to the same laws; and if they neglect or refuse to perform their duties, they may depend upon it they will lose their power.

The EARL of MANSFIELD. — I certainly think, that, if the expressions which have fallen from the Noble Viscount and the Noble Marquess be made known to the Assembly of Jamaica, they will do much to prevent reconciliation. With respect to this measure, I should have been glad if such modifications could have been made in it as would enable your Lordships, consistently with your duty, to pass it; but I confess I have not heard anything, in the course of this debate, which encourages any hope for such a result. I do not defend the conduct of the Assembly; but, at the same time, I think, if more of the spirit of conciliation had been shown towards them by the Government, they would have, ere this, resumed the due exercise of their functions. As to the right of Parliament to legislate on such a subject as the present, I never for a moment entertained the least doubt. With regard to the Prisons Bill, I certainly must say that I, amongst others of your Lordships, take blame to myself for not having paid sufficient attention to that Bill; at the same time, from no information that I received had I any reason to suppose that it would have given such offence, and have created the suspicion — perhaps the natural consequence of that offence — that it was sent out for the purposes of irritation, and in order to further the views of those who wish to see the Legislature suspended. Now, the opposition which has been given to the first of the two Bills brought forward this Session has been grounded on the propriety of allowing the Assembly to retrace their steps. But I would appeal to what fell from the learned counsel at the bar, in asking whether the present measure is not, if possible, more objectionable than the former? and whether, if the opposition to the first measure was well grounded, your Lordships should not be equally strenuous in opposing this? The Bill before your Lordships is nothing more than a pretext for continuing the powers of the Legislative Assembly, while it, in fact, suspends them. It empowers the Governor to indicate not only what measures the Assembly are to pass, but what are to be the minutest points of those measures. If, then, the Assembly were to accept and pass such measures, in defiance of their own opinions, what would that be else than the mere mockery of legislation, — the mere appearance of deliberation, without the exercise of any such power? It would be better to have their functions entirely abrogated at once. With such a measure as this, I despair of our being able to proceed with success; and therefore hope it will undergo considerable modification. I trust your Lordships will evince some spirit of coolness and conciliation in dealing with it; and, with equal sincerity, do I hope that, when it should come into operation, it will meet with no resistance, nor give rise even to any intemperate expressions.

LORD SEAFORD. — As I have the misfortune to differ from many of my Noble Friends on this question, I am anxious to say a very few words. I must declare, in the first place, that I think the arguments of the learned counsel whom your Lordships heard at your bar against the Bill, as regards the Prisons Act, were most fallacious. Now, the whole question appears to me to rest upon this point, — namely, whether the rights of the Assembly have, or have not, been violated? If they have not been violated, then is the refusal of the Assembly to discharge their legislative functions an unprovoked dereliction of their duty. The first thing to be considered is,—the nature and extent of those rights which they conceive themselves to possess, inherently, as British subjects. In their protest against the Bill for the amendment of the Abolition Act, they state, — "Jamaica is dependent on the Crown of England, and she admits the right of the English Parliament to regulate the commerce of the empire; but she rejects, with indignation, its claim to make other laws to govern her." Now, notwithstanding what has fallen from the Noble and Learned Lord opposite, I am disposed to think that there is a connection between that protest and the third resolution of the House of Assembly. If they have correctly stated their rights in that protest, the Prisons Bill is undoubtedly a violation of those rights; and although your Lordships all concurred as to the principle of that Bill, when it passed, no point of honour should prevent you from repealing it, if you believe the statement contained in that protest. When I consider that the highest legal authorities, and all the eminent statesmen in both Houses of Parliament, supported that Bill, while not a single Member, in either House, offered a word in opposition to it, — when I contrast the apathy that was evinced towards it, with the hostility which is shown against the present, and was, against the previous Bill, — I think I am justified in saying,—whatever may be your Lordships' opinions now,—that when the Prisons Bill was before you, you did not consider that Parliament, in passing it, would be exceeding their constitutional powers, or violating the inherent rights of the colony of Jamaica. There appears to be but one opinion, among all parties, as to the inexpediency of repealing the Prisons Bill. But if the House be not prepared to repeal that Act, it refuses to make the reparation which the House of Assembly specifically demands. I am aware that it has been said, that such a demand is not made,— that such words as "a repeal of the Prisons Act" are not to be found in the resolutions;—that they are not in the bond. I must, however, say, that I see very little force in that argument, which is entirely refuted by the tenour of the resolutions. In them, the Assembly set forth, both positively and negatively, the conditions upon which it will consent to resume its functions. It states, that it will not do so until her Majesty's gracious pleasure shall be made known, whether her subjects of Jamaica are thenceforth to be treated as subjects with the power of making laws, which they have previously had, for their own government. Now, what is meant by the power of making laws? Why this,—that they should have the privilege of passing Bills, as a Legislature holding directly from the Crown, and independently of the British Parliament,—whose right to make laws for them "they reject with indignation." Then, is the House prepared to admit the right of the House of Assembly to legislate to that extent? If it be not, it refuses the condition which is annexed to their resuming their functions. Then, look at the other alternative mentioned in the resolutions; it is this,—"or whether they are to be treated as a conquered colony, and governed by parliamentary legislation, Orders in Council, or, as in the case of the late amended Abolition Act, by investing the Governor of the island with the power of issuing proclamations, having the force of law, over the lives and properties of the people." That is precisely the power which is given to the Governor by the Prisons Bill; and therefore the repeal of that Bill is necessary, in order to satisfy the requisitions of the House of Assembly. If these conditions be not complied with, what reasonable ground is there for expecting that the House of Assembly will resume its functions? And will the House, without any such expectation, consent to run the risk of prolonging the evils arising from the absence of all legislation in the island? I believe that many of your Lordships have been induced to go into committee upon this Bill, in the expectation of being able to render it palatable to the House of Assembly. I firmly believe that all such hopes and expectations are illusory. The counsel for the Assembly told your Lordships that the present measure was a more obnoxious and offensive violation of the constitution of the colony than the former Bill. The Assembly, through their counsel, object, not to the details, but to the principle, of the measure. Their objection would not be removed by the proposed omission of one clause; and the result of the amendment would be, that the British Parliament would incur all the odium, while it would not accomplish half the good, that would arise from passing the Bill in an unmutilated state. With these views, I think that your Lordships would not act wisely by concurring in the proposition of the Noble and Learned Lord (Lord Lyndhurst).

VISCOUNT ST. VINCENT. — At this late hour of the night, it is not my intention to detain your Lordships with more than one observation. With reference to many of the evils which have been alleged to exist in Jamaica, my opinion is, that they might have been corrected if the Colonial Office in this country, and the Governors of Jamaica, had fully known their duty and powers. It is not a fair interpretation of the language used by the House of Assembly, to say that that body intends to set up a claim in opposition to the authority of the British Parliament.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — I wish to say one word as to the question put by the Noble and Learned Lord (Lord Brougham), touching the reason why this Act, intended for the benefit of the negroes, does not extend to some of the smaller colonies? My answer is, that there exists an assignable cause for interfering in the case of Jamaica, while no such cause exists with regard to the other colonies. One island to which the Noble and Learned Lord has referred — Barbadoes — has proceeded to legislate in a satisfactory spirit; and from Tobago and St. Vincent accounts have been received to the effect that the Legislatures of those colonies have adopted measures in conformity with the Orders in Council.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I applied my observation only to one particular argument of the Noble Marquess, — which was to the effect that the House of Assembly of Jamaica was so badly constituted as to make it desirable to take any opportunity of abolishing it as a sort of nuisance. In answer to that argument, I referred to other colonies, as falling equally within the scope of it.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — That was not my argument. My argument was, that the Assembly, having abrogated their functions, had established a case for a temporary suspension.

LORD BROUGHAM.—If what I have just stated was not the argument of the Noble Marquess, what was the meaning of his description of the ill conduct of the House of Assembly? and of his alleging that they represent neither population nor property?

The committee then divided: —

Clause expunged accordingly.

On Clause 2. being proposed, —

LORD BROUGHAM said: — My Lords, this is the first time since 1778 that Parliament has ever attempted to tax a free colony without the consent of that colony; and, now, how do you propose to do this? Not in an open, straightforward manner, — by your own act; but, you send out a person to do it for you. But I hold, my Lords, that the Imperial Parliament has no right to interfere in the manner proposed, — that such an interference would be a direct violation of the Act of 1778. I say, it is most unconstitutional in principle to give to any Governor the power to tax a colony by his own act. You say, "Can it be supposed that any Governor would abuse his power at the present day?" But if that principle be once admitted, — if we are to intrust persons with the powers of the Legislature, only because it is not likely they will abuse those powers, — the Parliament may as well suspend its functions, and leave it to the Government to make laws, by Orders in Council — and allow the Privy Council to legislate for the empire. The old principle of the constitution was to withhold confidence where there existed the possibility of abuse. I say, my Lords, this clause is in direct contravention of the spirit of the Declaratory Act of the Imperial Parliament, the 18th of Geo. III.; and in proposing it, the Government do not even adopt the usual form of reciting that Act in the preamble of the Bill, as is customary when it is proposed to alter, amend, or repeal any existing law. My Lords, entertaining the strongest objections to the unconstitutional powers which this clause would confer, I consider it my duty to submit the following amendment, and to take the sense of your Lordships upon it. I propose to insert this proviso: — "Provided always, that nothing in this Act contained be construed to enable the said Governor, without the assent of the said Council, to continue or renew any Bill for the receipt of money, or the appropriation of the same, which may have heretofore been passed by the Assembly, and expired in its operation in the colony."

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I conceive that the proper course for the Noble and Learned Lord to pursue, in conformity with his argument, would be to move that the clause be omitted altogether. If it be intended to concede any powers to the Governor for the renewal of Bills, I really cannot see why Bills of the description mentioned by the Noble and Learned Lord, in his amendment, should be excepted.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I wish to have the whole of the second clause remodelled. It is my firm belief that this portion of the Bill will rankle more than any other in the minds of the colonists. I feel assured that it will be looked upon as the very sting of the measure. With the omission of the first clause and the modification of the second, I entertain a most confident belief that we shall attain to that satisfactory conclusion for which all parties are so desirous.

The EARL of DEVON. — I think it would be desirable to omit from the clause all that portion of it which refers to Money Bills.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — If I could believe that this power to renew the Money Bills was not necessary, I would accede to the amendment with pleasure. But I have received information from persons connected with the island, and who are well acquainted with the subject, which convinces me that it is absolutely necessary, in order to provide for the public service, civil and military, to revise some of these annual Bills. Then I would beg to remind your Lordships that the interest on the loan made by this country is chargeable on the fund in the hands of the Receiver General. Therefore, if you strike out this clause, you will throw the burden of supporting the public establishments of Jamaica upon the revenues of this country.

LORD BROUGHAM. — That is a burden which would not rest upon this country more than a couple of months. I understand, from persons well acquainted with the subject, and who, I know, would not deceive me, that the phrase, "keeping faith with the public creditor," signifies, in Jamaica, providing for the public functionaries. I think, however, that it would be better to suffer a loss, than to break through a great constitutional question.

VISCOUNT CANTERBURY. — My Lords, I do not think that such an alteration in the clause as that proposed by the Noble and Learned Lord opposite (Lord Brougham), would be considered in the other House of Parliament as fatal to the Bill; because, looking at the clause itself, I find that it is extremely general, and that it does not give any information as to the number or character of the Acts which are about to expire. But I also find, in the clause which was sent up from the House of Commons, and which has just been expunged by your Lordships, the following proviso:—"That no such ordinance shall impose any rate, tax, or duty, save only in so far as it may be necessary to impose any fine or forfeiture to enforce the observance, or as a penalty for the non-observance, of the provisions of any such ordinance." I contend, my Lords, that the fair inference from the second clause, however vaguely it may be drawn, is, that the drawer of the Bill in the House of Commons never had in contemplation the renewal of any tax whatever. Under these circumstances, I would venture to suggest to your Lordships, that, at all events, it would be rather premature to come to a decision at this moment, either as to the rejection or adoption of the amendment of the Noble and Learned Lord. I would much rather have a little more time to consider a point which is of such importance as affecting the privileges of the House of Commons.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — The Noble and Learned Lord opposite (Lord Brougham), in the discussion on the first clause, said he dealt with that clause with freedom, because it had been adopted only by a majority of 10 in a large House, elsewhere. Now, my Lords, the second clause (that which is now under our consideration) comes before this House under very different circumstances. No objection whatever was taken to it,—no division took place upon it,—not a word was said against it,—and it passed the House of Commons unanimously. Then, if your Lordships should deal with this clause in the way suggested by the Noble and Learned Lord, can it be supposed that the House of Commons will at once wholly change their mind, and agree to this amendment? They may consider the clause as connected with their exclusive privilege, and the consequence will be, that the amendment will be unanimously rejected; and if your Lordships persevere in this amendment, the result will be fatal to the passing of the measure. This, I think, ought not to be the case. It is necessary that something should be done:—some measure should be passed, for the purpose of carrying on the government of the colony of Jamaica. I cannot consider the House of Assembly justified in the position they have taken up; and I am ready—nay, I think it necessary, not only in justice to your Lordships, and our own dignity and authority, but also in mercy to the people of Jamaica—to give them an intimation that the British Parliament are determined to exercise their right of superintending the whole government of that colony; and that, though the House of Assembly may, the British Legislature will not, abrogate the duties it has to discharge. Therefore, my Lords, I think it would be impolitic wholly to throw out the measure; and, viewing the question in this light, I do hope the Noble and Learned Lord will consent to postpone his amendment for further consideration in another stage of the Bill, in order to afford time for the mature consideration of so important an alteration.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Being in the hands of the House, and perceiving the general feeling, I will postpone my amendment until the Report shall be brought up; — at which stage I shall feel it incumbent upon me to take the sense of the House upon it.

House resumed. Report to be received on Thursday next; and the Lords summoned.

EDUCATION.

The BISHOP of LINCOLN. — I have been requested by my Most Reverend Brother (the Archbishop of Canterbury) to state, for the information of your Lordships, the nature of the motion of which the Most Reverend Prelate has given notice, on the subject of the Government scheme of national education, for Friday next. The motion will be, "To move resolutions (to be communicated in an Address to her Majesty) to include an expression of opinion upon the appointment of the Committee of Privy Council, and upon the plan proposed by them; and to pray her Majesty that a measure so deeply affecting the highest interests of the people may not be finally adopted without affording to this House an opportunity of considering it."
